MEYERS v. RAILROAD COMMISSION.

S. F. 14653.

Supreme Court of California.

1. Commerce ⇨12.

State may enact reasonable police regulations to govern local operations of instrumentalities engaged in interstate commerce, but may not under guise of police regulations place unreasonable burdens on interstate commerce (Gen. Laws 1931, Act 5129, § 9).

2. Commerce ⇨61(1).

To deny certificate of public convenience and necessity to interstate carrier other than in interest of public health, security, safety, convenience, and general welfare is to place unreasonable burden on interstate commerce contrary to Federal Constitution (Gen. Laws 1931, Act 5129, § 9).

3. Commerce ⇨61(1).

That person engaged exclusively in interstate or foreign commerce does not leave state does not give state right to require him to desist until he obtains certificate of public convenience and necessity (Gen. Laws 1931, Act 5129, § 9).

4. Commerce ⇨33(1).

Origin and destination of a shipment determine its character, and once the interstate character attaches, it remains throughout the movement of the goods (Gen. Laws 1931, Act 5129, § 9).

5. Commerce ⇨61(1).

Railroad Commission's order requiring person engaged exclusively in interstate and foreign commerce within state to desist until he should have obtained certificate of public convenience and necessity held direct burden on interstate and foreign commerce and void (Gen. Laws 1931, Act 5129, § 9).

WASTE, C. J., and LANGDON and SHENK, JJ., dissenting.

Petition by Alex Meyers, doing business as the Western Transportation Company, to review a decision of the Railroad Commission of the State of California, finding that petitioner was operating a trucking service in the vicinity of Los Angeles as a common carrier and directing him to cease and desist such operations until he shall have obtained a certificate of public convenience and necessity.

Order of commission annulled.

Sanborn & Roehl and Frank B. Austin, all of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Arthur T. George, Ira H. Rowell, and Roderrick B. Cassidy, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice.

Petition to review a decision of the Railroad Commission which finds that petitioner is operating a trucking service, in the vicinity of Los Angeles, as a common carrier, and directs him to cease and desist such operations until he shall have obtained a certificate of public convenience and necessity. Conceding that he operates as a common carrier, petitioner attacks the order on the sole ground that the operation is in interstate and foreign commerce; hence it is not subject to regulation by the commission. The evidence shows that petitioner is engaged only in the business of transporting goods from the docks of Los Angeles harbor to points in and around Los Angeles or from such points to the docks, all of which goods have been shipped in from or are consigned to destinations outside the state. A local trucking service, formerly carried on as a small part of petitioner's business, has, he avers, been discontinued.

[1,2] The order of the commission was made pursuant to the Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act (Deering's Gen. Laws, 1931, vol. 2, Act 5129, p. 2534), section 9 of which provides that it shall not be construed to apply to interstate or foreign commerce save as permitted by the Federal Constitution and acts of Congress. The commission, however, is given power to prescribe reasonable regulations in aid of public health, security, safety, convenience, and general welfare. This provision is in accord with the law as set forth in recent years by the United States Supreme Court. A state may enact reasonable police regulations to govern the local operations of instrumentalities engaged in interstate commerce but may not, under the guise of police regulations, place undue and unreasonable burdens upon interstate commerce. To withhold a certificate of public convenience and necessity is to prohibit or limit the right to engage in commerce; hence to deny such a certificate to an interstate carrier, other than in the interest of public health, security, safety, convenience, and general welfare, is unreasonably to burden interstate commerce, and such action by a state commission is in violation of the Federal Constitution. Buck v. Kykendall, 267 U. S. 307, 45 S. Ct. 324, 69 L. Ed. 623, 38 A. L. R. 286; Bush & Sons Co. v. Maloy, 267 U. S. 317, 45 S. Ct. 326, 327, 69 L. Ed. 627; People v. Yahne, 195 Cal. 683, 235 P. 50.

[3,4] It is urged that the principle above announced should not be applied here as, although petitioner operates exclusively in the transportation of goods in interstate or foreign commerce, he does not himself travel outside, but remains wholly within, the boundaries of the state of California. On principle, as well as authority, no such dis-

tion will apply by reason of that fact. A link in the travel of goods in interstate commerce may be wholly within a state or partially within and partially without it. The origin and destination of the shipment determine its character and once the interstate character attaches, it remains throughout the movement of the goods, though the point of destination be within, yet very far removed from the boundaries of, another state. The identical point here raised was before the federal District Court in the case of Galveston Truck Line Corporation v. Allen, 2 F. Supp. 488, 489. There a distinction was contended for between trucks traveling from a point within to a point without the state of Texas and trucks moving wholly within that state, all engaged in interstate commerce. The court held that no such distinction existed and, in so doing, used the following language: " * * * No difference in principle can, we think, be drawn between a link in interstate commerce which operates wholly within a state, and one which crosses the state line. Since, therefore, the refusal by the commission to issue a permit is based, not upon considerations, of traffic safety, or of the protection of the highways from injury to them, or from congestion thereof, but only of the commerce itself and the business of those who transport it, that is, of whether there is already adequate provision for handling such commerce and the effect upon those engaged in it which the granting of the permit will have, the ruling necessarily operates as a burden on interstate commerce and may not stand." This decree was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States on May 15, 1933 (53 S. Ct. 694, 77 L. Ed. —), in a per curiam decision citing the two federal cases first hereinabove noted as well as many other opinions of said court. In fact, in the recent case of Bradley, etc., v. Public Utilities Commission of Ohio, 53 S. Ct. 577, 77 L. Ed. —, decision rendered April 10, 1933, the United States Supreme Court incidentally, if not directly, approves this holding.

[5] As already pointed out there is involved in the instant case no question of local regulation in the interest of public health, security, safety, convenience, and general welfare, the question presented being solely as to the power of the Railroad Commission to determine who shall engage in the business of facilitating the transportation of goods in interstate commerce within the state of California. Clearly, in such a situation, the action of the commission operates as a direct burden on such commerce.

The order of the commission here involved is annulled.

We concur: CURTIS, J.; IRA F. THOMPSON, J.; SEAWELL, J.

LANGDON, Justice.

I dissent. The general principles that a state may not unreasonably burden interstate commerce, and that the requirement of a certificate of public convenience and necessity of an interstate carrier is such a burden, are, of course, well settled. The point at issue in this proceeding is, however, simply one of fact, whether the mere carriage of goods which are in the course of interstate and foreign shipment makes petitioner a carrier engaged exclusively in interstate and foreign commerce. In my opinion it does not. In the cases cited in the majority opinion, with one exception, the actual physical operations of the carriers were interstate; that is, their trucks moved between states. In the Galveston Truck Line Corporation Case (D. C.) 2 F. Supp. 488, no facts appear in the opinion to show precisely what type of transportation was involved, although the phrase "link in interstate commerce" indicates that it was part of some system of carriers which operated between states. In the instant case, petitioner operates a common carrier system independently of any other creditor of those same goods. His trucks do not go outside the borders of the state. His operations are therefore intrastate. The goods, it is true, are in the course of interstate and foreign transportation, but no attempt is being made to hinder or regulate their movement. The action of the commission is directed at the carrier and not at the goods. No unreasonable burden is placed upon interstate commerce by regulation of a carrier whose physical operations are entirely within this state.

There is authority which is completely in accord with this view. In Stephenson v. Binford (D. C.) 53 F.(2d) 509, P. U. R. 1932A, 1, affirmed by the United States Supreme Court, 287 U. S. 251, 53 S. Ct. 181, 77 L. Ed. 288, the intervener made the identical contention that petitioner makes herein, namely, that "though he hauls between points entirely within the state of Texas, the goods which he hauls have moved into Texas interstate, and that he hauls them as part of their uncompleted movement." 53 F.(2d) 509, 511. The court said (page 516): "We do not * * * agree with the intervener Finnegan that he is an interstate carrier. His contract is made in Texas; his carriage is in Texas. Whether the goods which he is carrying have really come to rest before he picks them up, or are in the course of continuous transit, the record does not show. But, if it did show the facts to be as he contends, we think it would be a straining of the point to say, because the goods he handles intrastate have come from outside of it, that the requirement that the carrier who contracts wholly in Texas, and who carries wholly there, procure a permit to do so, and submit himself to the regulations which the state requires, constitutes a burden on interstate commerce." It is to be noted that the United States Supreme Court, in affirming the judgment, made no criticism of this language, and presumably the intervenor Finnegan is now under regulation as a result of that decision. The Ohio Public Utilities Commission expressed itself to the same effect in the case of In re Railway Express Agency, Inc., P. U. R. 1931A, 177, 193: " * * * the operation of the truck proposed in the present case is purely intrastate, regardless of the fact that it may handle shipments that are in interstate commerce. The various decisions such as the Daniel Ball Case and others cited by applicant apply simply to the questions as to whether or not a certain shipment is an interstate movement and do not in any way affect the fact that the proposed operation herein is an intrastate operation of a truck governed by the Ohio Motor Transportation Law and the rules of this commission."

I am satisfied that the decision of the respondent commission properly characterizes petitioner's business, and I think that the order should be affirmed.

PEOPLE v. FLEMING.

Cr. 3609.

Supreme Court of California.

1. Homicide ☞244(1).

Evidence held sufficient to support conviction of first degree murder as against contention that it showed self-defense.

2. Homicide ☞231.

Evidence held sufficient to justify jury's implied finding of malice warranting conviction of first degree murder.

3. Homicide ☞231.

To sustain conviction of murder, personal enmity of defendant against deceased need not be shown.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Charles L. Allison, Judge.

John C. Fleming was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

Paul Peipers and R. E. O'Neill, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., William F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Stanley Mussell, Dist. Atty., of San Bernardino, for the People.

CURTIS, Justice.

Defendant was accused of the crime of murder, together with three prior convictions. The first prior conviction of which defendant was charged was burglary; the second, robbery; and the third, assault with intent to commit murder. All of said convictions were under judgments rendered in this state. Defendant admitted the prior convictions, but pleaded not guilty to the charge of murder. He was tried by a jury which rendered a verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree without fixing the punishment for said crime. The court thereupon rendered judgment imposing the death penalty. From this judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial the defendant has appealed. Appellant in his brief has set forth thirty-two specifications wherein he claims that error was committed, and upon which he relies for a reversal of the judgment. These specifications are discussed quite fully in a lengthy brief in which each is given attention in detail. The argument of appellant may be properly divided into four general divisions in which the following contentions are respectively made:

(1) That the evidence is insufficient to support a verdict of guilty in that it shows that defendant took the life of the deceased in defense of his own.

(2) That the evidence is insufficient to support a verdict that defendant was guilty of the crime of murder, or any other or greater crime than manslaughter.

(3) Misconduct on the part of the district attorney which was prejudicial to the rights of the defendant.

(4) That the court erred in the admission and rejection of evidence.

[1] The contention of the defendant that the evidence is insufficient to support a verdict of guilty against the defendant, in that it shows that he acted in self-defense in the killing of the deceased rests upon the claim of defendant that the deceased, at the time defendant drew his gun, held in his hand an automobile crank, and that he was then in the act of striking defendant over the head with said automobile crank when the defendant shot the deceased to protect himself from death or great bodily injury. This claim is unsupported except by the uncorroborated testimony of the defendant. It is inconsistent with the evidence of all the other witnesses in the case present at the shooting. Mrs. Leece, the wife of the deceased, Amos Leece, was the only eyewitness to the shooting other than defendant and deceased. She was in deceased's machine, and the shooting took place on the opposite side of the machine in which she was sitting. She was evidently in a greatly agitated and excited state of mind due to the tragic death of her husband, and her account of the affair was conflicting, incomplete, and exceedingly indefinite. Her testimony will be referred to later. At the time of the shooting four people were in the Midway Gas Station, in front of which the deceased was killed. One of them, Peggy O'Day, was so intoxicated that she was in no condition to give any account of what happened, and she did not attempt to do so. The other three persons in the building, Charles Adcock, the proprietor of the station, Marie Young, his housekeeper, and Angus Kerr, a patron at the station, immediately rushed out of the building on hearing the shots from defendant's gun onto the front porch of the building where the shooting took place. They saw nothing of any automobile crank in the hands of the deceased or on the floor of the porch, or in the vicinity of the porch. Adcock and Kerr had seen deceased as he left the front room of the building and went out onto the porch just prior to the shooting, and neither of them saw any automobile crank in his hand. The defendant himself, who came into the room from the porch just as the deceased turned to leave the room, also says that he saw no weapon of any kind in Leece's hand as the latter walked toward the door to go out onto the porch. The defendant's testimony is that he was standing some two steps within the room in front of the door, and that the deceased pushed him backwards through the door, and then followed him onto the porch, and that, as soon as he (the defendant) recovered himself, "Mr. Leece had this crank in his hand coming toward me with it." But how or where Leece secured the crank the defendant does not attempt to show. The whole affair happened within a few seconds of time. The shots were fired, according to Adcock, a couple of seconds after the men went through the door onto the porch. Angus Kerr testified that "they had scarcely disappeared out of the door when two shots rang out; just as they disappeared out of the door two shots went off." The testimony of the defendant that deceased assaulted him with an automobile crank taken by itself is not at all convincing, and, when we consider it in connection with the other evidence in the case, we are of the opinion that it is completely overcome and discredited. The facts immediately preceding the shooting will be given in detail in discussing another phase of the case. It is not necessary to state them here. The verdict of guilty, therefore, finds ample support in the evidence.

In connection with the automobile crank, however, it should be said that Mrs. Leece, after denying that her husband had any such crank that evening, testified that, when her husband came out to the machine after paying his bill in the station, he went to the rear of the machine where the crank was kept and took it out of the machine for the purpose of cranking his machine. She did not, however, see what her husband did with the crank when he re-entered the building. Some hours after the killing the crank was found on the floor of Leece's machine. If we disregard the testimony of the defendant, as the jury evidently did, and we think properly so, then the only reasonable construction to place upon the acts of Leece is that, when he decided to return to the barroom, he returned the crank to the machine, where it remained until found there some hours later. This construction harmonizes with all the evidence in the case, including that of the defendant that Leece did not have the crank with him when he was last in the front room of the station.

[2-5] We now pass to the consideration of the second general contention of the defendant that there is no evidence in the case that justified a verdict finding defendant guilty of murder, or any crime greater than manslaughter. In support of this phase of the case, the defendant contends that the evidence is insufficient to show either malice, premeditation, or an intent to kill on his part before or at the time he fired the shots which resulted in the death of Amos Leece. A consideration of this contention will require a somewhat more extended reference to the events leading up to the shooting than has, heretofore, been given.

The Midway Service Station is about a mile north of the town of Red Mountain on the highway from Atolia to Randsburg. At the time in question it was conducted by Charles Adcock, who lived at the station. There was also living there at the time Marie Young, who acted as his housekeeper, and Peggy O'Day. The latter had been brought by the defendant from Long Beach, her home, to the Midway Service Station some time in the month of January, 1932. The homicide occurred on May 21, 1932. Peggy O'Day was stopping at the station, ostensibly for her health, although the evidence shows that she was engaged in prostitution during her stay at the station. The Midway Service Station was located on the westerly side of the highway. The main building consisted of a large front room generally referred to as the front or barroom. Across the northerly end there extended a counter or bar. There was a cement porch in the front part of the building with solid walls, except an eight-foot opening in the center through which entrance from the driveway was gained to the porch. A door opposite this entrance opened from the porch into the front or main room of the building. There was a kitchen and some four bedrooms in the building. Besides gas and oil, Adcock kept for sale at the station soft drinks, tobacco, cigars, and other small articles of merchandise. The gasoline pump was located in front of the eight-foot opening in the porch, and between the pump and the porch was a driveway. After bringing Peggy O'Day to the station in January, the defendant had visited her on two or three occasions. The last of these visits was on the day of the tragedy. He arrived late in the morning, and, after having "breakfast" with Charles Adcock and Marie Young at 12 o'clock, he and Peggy O'Day left for Red Mountain, where they visited friends and imbibed rather freely of intoxicating liquors, with the result that, when they returned to the station in the evening, Peggy O'Day was in an intoxicated condition, and the defendant was not far from that state. They returned to the station at about 7:10 in the evening and entered the building through the rear door. Some fifteen minutes before their return to the station, the deceased, Amos Leece, and his wife drove up to the station for the purpose of getting some gasoline and making other minor purchases. Leece was in charge of the pump of the Randsburg Water Company at its plant some six or seven miles distant, where he lived with Mrs. Leece. On the evening in question he drove into the station, and stopped his machine in front of the building with the rear of his car near the gasoline pump. After securing a supply of gasoline, he and Mrs. Leece went into the front room of the building where Mrs. Leece made some small purchases, and Mr. Leece paid his bill. He was standing in front of the counter or bar settling the bill when Peggy O'Day entered the room through the rear entrance of the building. She immediately approached Leece, and asked him to buy her a drink, and on his refusal began to abuse him and apply vile epithets to him. Leece seemingly disregarded her, but, as he turned to leave, he remarked to her, "I think you are a cheap, chippy whore," and left the room through the front door for his car. Mrs. Leece had preceded him and was sitting in the front seat of the car as Leece came out of the room. As Leece was leaving the room, the defendant entered through the rear door. He had heard the remark which Leece had made to Peggy O'Day. He followed Leece out to the latter's car, and there demanded of Leece that he apologize to Peggy O'Day for the remark just made to her. Leece declined to do so, and reiterated in substance to the defendant the remark which he had previously made to Peggy O'Day. He then returned to the barroom, and complained to Charles Adcock, who was behind the counter, that if he could not come to the station without being insulted he would quit trading there. After making this complaint to Adcock, he turned to leave the room again through the front door. As he approached the door, the defendant was standing in the room about two steps in front of the door. Deceased pushed defendant out of his way, and in doing so pushed him through the door, and then stepped through the door himself, when the three shots were fired as already stated. Adcock, Marie Young, and Angus Kerr immediately rushed to the porch, where they found the defendant standing over the deceased. He had hold of his gun by its handle and the two men were struggling for its possession. The deceased was down on the porch either on his knees, or, as one witness described his position, "he was lying on his right hip with his left hand down on the cement and his right hand up over the hammer of the gun, shut down tight." Adcock and Marie Young joined in the struggle for the gun. Adcock finally succeeded in securing possession of it. He gave it to Marie Young, who hid it. The defendant in a few minutes left in his machine, but returned after an absence of four or five minutes. He asked Marie Young for his gun, but she refused to give it to him. He then lay down in one of the clothes closets of the house, where he was found and taken into custody by officers upon their arrival. After the shooting, the deceased, without changing his position, lay on the floor some ten minutes. He died later without making any statement regarding the shooting. He did not speak after he was shot. Upon the examination of his body after his death, it was found that he had one wound in the upper part of his body, evidently made by a bullet, which entered his right armpit and ranging downward left the body about eight inches below the point of entrance. The other wound was in his abdomen, the bullet entering the body about one inch to the left of his navel, ranging backward and downward, and leaving the body through the left buttock. In its course the bullet perforated the muscles of the stomach and the small intestines as well as other parts of his body. There were large hemorrhages of blood from this wound, and in the opinion of the doctor who performed an autopsy on the body of the deceased it was a fatal wound. Holes were also found in one of the legs of deceased's trousers which evidently had been made by the third shot. The pistol used by the defendant was a .45-caliber revolver. There was also found on the porch recent evidence of bullets striking the cement floor of the front porch and then glancing off and embedding themselves in the wall of the porch, showing that evidently two of the bullets fired by the defendant, after going through the body of the deceased, had force enough to plow holes in the cement floor and then bury themselves in the adjoining wall of the porch. The occupation of the defendant for some months prior to and at the time of the shooting was acting as floor manager on the Rose Isle, one of the gambling boats anchored on the high seas off of the coast of Long Beach. He also acted as guard on Friday and Saturday night in taking the cashier of the boat to his home. He was an intimate friend of Peggy O'Day. In fact, he testified that they were engaged to be married.

We think that a mere recitation of the foregoing facts shows that there was ample evidence to justify the implied finding of malice. While it is the law of this state that, in order to sustain a conviction of murder it is not necessary to show personal enmity on the part of the defendant against the deceased (People v. Sainz, 162 Cal. 242, 121 P. 922), we think the evidence is sufficient in this case to show that the defendant at and just prior to the deadly assault did entertain a strong feeling of resentment against the deceased. In the first place, it plainly appears that the defendant took offense at the remark made by the defendant to and concerning Peggy O'Day, as the deceased left the counter or bar to go to his machine. This is shown by the defendant following the deceased to the front porch and there demanding of the deceased that he apologize to Peggy O'Day. Not only did the deceased refuse to make such an apology, but he reiterated his statement to the defendant, and later pushed the defendant out of his way as he (deceased) left the front room through the door opening out onto the porch. It was then that the defendant drew his pistol and fired the fatal shots. Evidently the defendant keenly resented the conduct of the deceased toward Peggy O'Day and towards himself, and, acting under the spell of this resentment, shot the deceased. Evidence of previous difficulties between the parties is always admissible to show the state of mind of the defendant and that he acted with malice. People v. Bradfield, 30 Cal. App. 721, 159 P. 443. With much greater force would evidence of present and pending difficulties show the presence of malice on the part of the defendant toward the deceased. While the conduct of the deceased in pushing the defendant out of his way and through the door was uncalled for, it afforded the defendant no justification in taking the life of the deceased. The deceased was unarmed at the time, and defendant was not in peril either of death or bodily injury. His act in taking the life of the deceased under these circumstances was, therefore, not justifiable. As before observed, however, the pushing or shoving of the defendant through the door by the deceased evidently added to the resentment of the defendant already aroused in him by the remarks of the deceased concerning Peggy O'Day. Smarting under what the defendant evidently felt was a twofold injury, he drew his gun and killed the deceased. The jury was justified under this state of facts in drawing the inference that the defendant acted with malice in taking the life of Amos Leece.

might have reasonably or logically inferred that the killing was wilful, deliberate or premeditated." With this statement we cannot agree. It is true that no great interval of time elapsed from the time the deceased pushed the defendant through the door until the defendant drew his gun and shot the deceased. But this court has said on innumerable occasions that in order to prove premeditation in one charged with murder it is not necessary to show that any appreciable space of time elapsed between the intention to kill and the act of killing. It is only necessary to quote from People v. Hunt, 59 Cal. 430, 435, the following statement of the law on this subject: "There need be no appreciable space of time between the intention to kill and the act of killing; they may be as instantaneous as successive thoughts of the mind. It is only necessary that the act of killing be preceded by a concurrence of will, deliberation, and premeditation on the part of the slayer, and if such is the case, the killing is murder in the first degree, no matter how rapidly these acts of the mind may succeed each other, or how quickly they may be followed by the act of killing." The precise language of this decision has been repeated on numerous occasions by this court, and the principle there enunciated is irrevocably established as a part of the law of this state. People v. Belton, 180 Cal. 706, 710, 182 P. 420. In the instant case, while the testimony, already quoted shows that the defendant shot almost, if not immediately, after the two men went through the door, still there was time for the defendant to think before he acted, to deliberate between the intention to kill and the act of killing. Defendant had time to draw his gun and fire the shots. He formed the intention to draw his gun, and then acted upon that intention. He drew his gun with some intention—either to defend himself, to frighten the deceased, or to kill the deceased. After forming the intention, whatever it was, he acted upon it by firing his gun. He thus had time to think and to act. This is all that is necessary in order to show premeditation.

[8-10] If the intention thus formed was to kill the deceased, he is guilty of murder in the first degree. Appellant contends that the evidence fails to show any such intention. This contention is based almost wholly upon defendant's version of the shooting. In addition to his evidence as heretofore given, he also testified that he drew his gun and hit the deceased over the head with it; that the deceased grabbed the gun and in the struggle for its possession it was discharged three times. There was a wound on the side of deceased's head about three or four inches above the left ear. This could have been made in the manner described by the defendant. On the other hand, Angus Kerr, who was standing by a window opening out onto the front porch, testified that on hearing the shots he looked out of the window, and the deceased was down on the floor of the porch and defendant was striking him over the head with his gun. The wound on deceased's head could, therefore, have been caused by the defendant striking deceased on the head after the shots were fired. Then again we think that both the element of time and the quick succession in which the shots were fired render defendant's testimony highly improbable. As stated already, those in the room at the time the shots were fired testified that two shots were fired in quick succession immediately after the two men went through the door, which were followed in a slightly longer interval of time by a third shot. This testimony would appear to refute the testimony of the defendant that the shots were fired in a struggle for the possession of the gun after he had hit the deceased over the head with it. Then if the two first shots were fired in quick succession, followed almost immediately by the third shot, as was shown by the evidence, it is not likely that they were discharged as a result of a struggle over the possession of the gun. In support of defendant's contention that he hit the deceased over the head with his gun, and that the deceased was on his knees when the gun was first discharged, defendant further relies upon the location and courses of the wounds found upon the deceased's body and testified to by the autopsy physician. Defendant contends that the wound in the right armpit was made by the first shot, and that as it ranged downward and left the body some eight inches below the point of entrance, the course taken by the bullet causing the wound would sustain the theory that it was fired while the deceased was on his knees and the defendant was standing over him. There is nothing, however, to show which wound was inflicted by the first shot. If we take the wound in the deceased's abdomen as inflicted by the first shot, it could well have been made while the two men were standing facing each other. In fact it could hardly have been made with the men in any other position. The direction of this wound was to the rear and slightly downward. It was undoubtedly a fatal wound and caused the defendant to fall to the floor and either while in the act of falling or after he had fallen, the wound in his armpit was received as the result of either the second or third shot. The nature of the wounds on the deceased's body and their courses through the body do not, in our opinion, help the cause of the defendant. On the other hand, the evidence regarding these wounds, taken in connection with that given by those in the room at the time the shots were fired may well have indicated to the jury that the shots were fired by defendant intentionally and as soon as the defendant was able to draw his gun after being pushed through the door by the deceased. Where one assaults another violently' with a deadly weapon and takes his life, the presumption is that the assailant intended death or great bodily harm. 13 Cal. Jur., p. 683. And where, as in this case, the assault was made in a manner that was reasonably certain to produce death, and which actually did cause death, the only rational presumption to be drawn therefrom is that the assailant intended to take the life of the person assailed. We have already referred to the deadly character of the weapon used by the defendant. The circumstances of the killing show that defendant deliberately fired a bullet from this .45-caliber gun into the vital organs of the deceased, causing almost instant death. This evidence plainly shows an intent on his part to take the life of the deceased, and thus a clear case of murder is made out against the defendant.

[11] Defendant seeks to compare this case with the case of People v. Kelley, 208 Cal. 387, 281 P. 609, and People v. Howard, 211 Cal. 322, 295 P. 333, 71 A. L. R. 1385, and asks that in its decision this court should follow the course pursued in those cases and reduce the judgment of murder in the first degree to one of a lesser offense included in the charge of murder. We see no similarity between the instant case and the two cited cases. It is not necessary to occupy space here in order to show wherein the difference exists. A reading of the two cases cited we think will show that they can be readily differentiated from the case now before us, and that they furnish no true test for the determination of the instant case.

[12, 13] The claim of defendant that the judgment should be reversed by reason of misconduct on the part of the district attorney prosecuting the case rests upon certain questions propounded by the district attorney on cross-examination to the defendant while the latter was a witness in the case. By these questions it was brought out that the defendant had no permit to carry a gun; that he had filed off the number of the gun which he was carrying on his visit to the Midway Service Station, and that he had filed two notches on the barrel of said gun. No objection was made to any of the questions eliciting this evidence, nor was any motion made to strike out this evidence. The defendant claims that he was prejudiced by the evidence that he had no permit to carry a gun and that he had filed off the number on his gun, for the reason that being a former convict it was unlawful for him to own or have in his possession a firearm like the gun in evidence, and also that it was unlawful for anyone to have in his possession a pistol or revolver the number of which had been obliterated. The position of the defendant is that by the introduction of this evidence the prosecution was permitted to prove other crimes than the one of which he was charged and which were unconnected with the crime charged. But this evidence came in without objection on defendant's part and it is now too late to raise the point that it was inadmissible. The defendant admits this, but claims that it was misconduct on the part of the district attorney to elicit such evidence in the presence of the jury. The point is without merit—if we concede that the evidence was inadmissible—for the defendant had it within his power by proper objection to exclude this evidence. Failing to do so at the time, it is now too late for him to complain. The criticism of the district attorney in asking the defendant whether he had made the two notches on the gun is equally without merit. The gun was in evidence as belonging to the defendant, and we must assume that the two notches were apparent to the members of the jury. Whatever inferences prejudicial to the defendant the jury might draw from the presence of these two notches on the gun might arise as readily without the admission of the defendant that they were made by him as with such evidence. Naturally the jury, if they were disposed to draw any prejudicial inferences from the fact that two notches had been made on the defendant's gun, in the absence of any evidence as to how the notches came to be there, would assume that the defendant was responsible for their existence, and his admission to that effect would not materially aggravate their state of mind in that respect. We are therefore of the opinion that the defendant was not in any way prejudiced by any act of the district attorney in the prosecution of the case.

[14] The final claim of defendant is that the judgment should be reversed by reason of errors on the part of the trial court in the admission and rejection of evidence. The evidence which the defendant contends was improperly admitted concerns those matters which we have already alluded to, and relates to the notches on defendant's gun and that he had no permit to carry the same. We have sufficiently discussed these matters under the claim that the eliciting of this evidence was improper and that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct in bringing it to the attention of the jury. It is not necessary to reiterate what we have already said upon this subject. The evidence which defendant claims was erroneously excluded was attempted to be brought out by the defense on the cross-examination of Mrs. Leece, the wife of the deceased. She was asked by counsel for the defendant when and where she was married to Mr. Leece. The court sustained an objection to the question, and the defendant now contends that this action of the court was error. Although the defendant has devoted a number of pages of his brief in attempting to show that the court erred in refusing to permit Mrs. Leece to answer this question, we fail to discover one good reason stated in all these pages for upholding this claim of the defendant. Mrs. Leece's evidence was not of vital importance to the case, and, even if it were, we cannot perceive how the place or date of her marriage to Mr. Leece, or whether she was married to him at all, would either aid or detract from the defendant's defense. Ordinarily a point of such slight merit as the one now before us would hardly deserve any discussion whatever, but, due to the seriousness of the charge of which the defendant stands convicted, we did not feel warranted in ignoring the point altogether. The same may be said of a number of other points relied upon by the defendant. After fully considering them and all other grounds advanced by defendant for the reversal of the judgment, we find no reason which would justify us in disturbing the judgment of the trial court. We are therefore of the opinion that it should be affirmed.

The judgment and order denying motion for a new trial are affirmed.

LANGDON, Justice (dissenting).

I dissent. The facts which appear from the record do not, in my opinion, justify a judgment of murder in the first degree. I can find no evidence from which it may be inferred that there was premeditation. The defendant and deceased were strangers, and their contact consumed but a few minutes. The deceased, it is clear, was the aggressor; as he passed through the barroom door, he pushed the defendant. The shooting commenced almost immediately afterwards. The only direct testimony concerning the shooting was given by the woman who called herself the wife of the deceased, and, as the majority opinion points out, "her account of the affair was conflicting, incomplete and exceedingly indefinite." It was, moreover, decidedly different from that given previously at the coroner's inquest. The "gas station" in front of which the deceased was killed was a combination of a bootleg place and house of prostitution, and all of the characters involved in this case, either as witnesses or principals, were frequenters of the place.

Under these circumstances, I think it probable that the jury permitted the criminal record of the defendant to warp its judgment, and that the proper verdict, and the only one justified by the evidence, would have been murder in the second degree. The absence of premeditation seems to me so obvious that a judgment of murder in the first degree is unwarranted.

I am of the opinion that the judgment should be modified, under our statutory power (Pen. Code, § 1181, subd. 6; People v. Kelley, 208 Cal. 387, 281 P. 609), to murder in the second degree, and that the defendant should be sentenced therefor as prescribed by law.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Albert Lee Stephens, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Sabrina L. B. Farrow, deceased. From an order, directing W. S. Allen, administrator of the estate, to distribute funds in his possession to Dewitt Adkins, administrator of the estate of William J. Farrow, deceased, and others, Allen appeals. On respondents' motion to dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

Lawrence W. Allen, of Los Angeles, for appellant W. S. Allen, Administrator.

IRA F. THOMPSON, Justice.

The respondents, heirs of the deceased Sabrina L. B. Farrow, have made a motion to dismiss the appeal herein, on the ground that the same is frivolous, and also on the ground that no order that this court might make could affect the interest of the appellant administrator. On July 15, 1930, the appellant filed a petition in the probate court to have ascertained and declared the rights of all persons to, and their interests in, the estate of the deceased. Subsequently the court made an order requiring notice to be served upon all persons claiming any interest in the estate, in accordance with the provisions of section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Thereafter the court made its order determining the interests of the respondents in the estate and ordering the appellant to distribute the funds in his possession to the respondents, the final account of appellant having theretofore been filed and approved.

The appellant contends that the petition to determine the interest of heirs having been filed by the administrator and not by one claiming to be an heir, the court should have ordered notice to be given under section 1668 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and not under section 1664 of said Code. The appellant further contends that the court should have made a written order establishing proof of the service of such notice, and that it should have entered an order adjudging the default of all persons who did not appear. Since the appeal herein, and on the 31st day of January, 1933, the probate court removed the appellant herein as administrator of said estate, and appointed a special administrator for the purpose of making distribution.

[1-3] It is apparent from the foregoing recitals that the appeal should be dismissed. First, there is no contest between the respondents concerning their proportion of the estate, and appellant has no interest therein; second, we find no provision in section 1668 of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to a petition for a decree determining heirship, that section referring to the petition of an executor or administrator, or any other person interested in the estate, for distribution of the estate of a decedent who is not a resident of this state at the time of his death; third, it does appear from the transcript that the court made an order establishing that due and legal notice had been given, and made an order in open court adjudging the default of all persons who had not appeared within the time required by section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure and the notice given thereunder. Consequently the appeal is without any merit.

The appeal is dismissed.

PATTERSON v. CLIFFORD F. REID, Inc., et al.
Civ. 4832.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

1. Vendor and purchaser ⇨16(1).

Where prospective purchaser signed land contract and other instruments on printed form with material portions left blank, and it was agreed instruments would not become effective until purchaser gave approval, and purchaser subsequently communicated intention not purchase, there was no contract; there being no acceptance or meeting of minds (Civ. Code, § 1585).

2. Contracts ⇨16.

To make contract, there must be express or implied offer which must be accepted according to its tenor (Civ. Code, § 1585).

3. Contracts ⇨22(1).

Intention to accept offer must be expressed in positive terms (Civ. Code, § 1585).

4. Contracts ⇨39.

Writing is incomplete as agreement, where blanks as to essential matters are left therein.

5. Cancellation of instruments ⇨4.

Where signed land contract never became valid contract, and note and trust deed executed by prospective purchaser on own property were allegedly sold to innocent third party, prospective purchaser held entitled to bring equitable suit for cancellation of contract and recovery of amount of note (Civ. Code, § 3412).

Prospective purchaser was entitled to invoke provisions of Civ. Code, § 3412, which provides that written instrument, in respect to which there is reasonable apprehension that, if left outstanding, it may cause serious injury to person against whom it is void or voidable, may upon his application be so adjudged and ordered to be delivered up or canceled.

6. Cancellation of instruments ⇨37(5).

Prospective purchaser's complaint alleging facts showing signed land contract was never valid, and alleging that defendant sold plaintiff's note and trust deed to innocent third party, held to state cause of action for cancellation of contract, though not alleging reasonable apprehension of serious injury (Civ. Code, § 3412).

7. Courts ⇨472(6).

Prospective purchaser's suit for cancellation of signed land contract which never became valid, and for recovery of $900, amount of note and trust deed of plaintiff sold to third party, held properly brought in superior court; municipal court having no jurisdiction because relief sought under statute was equitable (Civ. Code, § 3412; Const. art. 6, § 11).

8. Cancellation of instruments ⇨24(1).

In suit to cancel signed land contract which never became valid, brought under statute authorizing cancellation of instrument in respect to which there is reasonable apprehension that it might cause serious injury if left outstanding, statute requiring party rescinding to do so promptly and restore property received held inapplicable (Civ. Code, § 1691, subs. 1, 2; and § 3412).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harry R. Archbald, Judge.

Action by Annie L. Patterson against Clifford F. Reid, Incorporated, and another. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, of Los Angeles (Robert F. Schwarz, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellants.

Marshall Stimson and Noel Edwards, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

TUTTLE, Justice pro tem., delivered the opinion of the court.

This action was brought to cancel a written instrument and to recover the sum of $900. This relief was granted, and defendants appeal from the judgment.

The complaint alleged and the trial court found the following facts:

That defendant bank, through its agent defendant Reid, negotiated for the sale of a lot to plaintiff, who was a widow without previous experience in business matters and especially in relation to the execution of deeds of trust; that as a result plaintiff signed a contract for the purchase of said lot for the sum of $3,725, payable $900 down and the balance in monthly installments; that the agreement and the note and the deed of trust were on printed forms, and when plaintiff signed these documents, the date, description of the property, and amount and terms of payment were not filled in; that the deed of trust covered real property owned by plaintiff, and it was represented to plaintiff by Reid that it would be accepted as the first payment on the purchase price; that after signing these documents, plaintiff informed Reid that she would consider the matter; that plaintiff did not accept the agreement; that Reid stated to her that unless she accepted said offer, the papers signed by her would not be used, but would be returned to her; that three or four days later plaintiff informed Reid that she did not intend to accept the offer and for them not to go ahead with the transaction; that falsely and fraudulently and in contravention to its said agreement with plaintiff, defendant Reid caused the blanks in said papers to be filled in and the agreement to be signed by defendant bank, and caused the note and trust deed to be sold for the sum of $900 to an innocent purchaser, who now holds the same and threatens to cause the same to be foreclosed, and that plaintiff has been obliged to pay the interest on said trust deed; that plaintiff was induced to sign said documents through the false and fraudulent representations of defendant Reid, the agent of defendant bank.

[1-4] It is at once apparent that the purported agreement of sale is not a contract as plaintiff never accepted the offer of defendant bank. There must be an offer expressed or implied and this offer must be accepted according to its tenor, before a binding contract is formed. "The intention to accept must be expressed in positive terms. Thus a statement by the offeree that he would think over the matter, or that he would like to accept, or a promise to 'take up the matter' at a later time or that he would see what he could do and give notice later, are none of them equivalent to acceptance." 1 Page on Contracts, § 44.

"An acceptance must be absolute and unqualified, or must include in itself an acceptance of that character which the proposer can separate from the rest, and which will conclude the person accepting. A qualified acceptance is a new proposal." Civ. Code, § 1585.

According to the record, plaintiff here testified that the signing of the papers was tentative and that she told Reid "they were not to be used." She further told him that "they must notify me and see if it met with my requirements—my approval. I told him that my approval meant if the terms were agreeable to me." From the foregoing it is clear that the essential element of a valid contract, a meeting of minds on all essential elements, was lacking and therefore the writing has no binding effect upon either party. Although plaintiff signed the documents, it was distinctly agreed that they were not to be effective until she gave her approval at some later date, when the "blanks" were to be filled in. "A writing is incomplete as an agreement where blanks as to essential matters are left in it." 13 C. J. p. 308, par. 133.

Appellants agree that the pleadings are framed upon the theory that no contract was ever entered into between the parties. They also cite the cases of Chas. Brown & Sons v. White Lunch Company, 92 Cal. App. 457, 268 P. 490, and McElhaney v. W. E. Moyer & Co., 101 Cal. App. 53, 281 P. 87, wherein it is held that an action for rescission must, of necessity, rest upon the existence of a contract to be rescinded, and where there is no meeting of the minds there can be no contract and hence there is nothing which can be rescinded. Therefore, they contend, the action is merely one to recover a money judgment for an amount less than $2,000 and that it should have been brought in the municipal court. Article 6, § 11, Const.; St. 1925, p. 658, § 29, as amended by St. 1931, p. 1717.

[5] The solution of the questions here presented depends upon the nature of the action. Appellants contend that it is one at law. Respondent contends that it is a suit in equity, authorized by section 3412 of the Civil Code, which reads as follows: "A written instrument, in respect to which there is a reasonable apprehension that if left outstanding it may cause serious injury to a person against whom it is void or voidable, may, upon his application, be so adjudged, and ordered to be delivered up or canceled."

The instrument here involved is on its face a completed contract, signed and executed by all parties thereto. It could be placed upon record any time by defendants or assigned by them to a third party. That such recordation or assignment might cause serious injury to plaintiff is not open to question. We are of the opinion that the facts of this case entitled respondent to invoke the provisions of the Civil Code above quoted.

[6] It is contended that the complaint does not state a cause of action under the provisions of section 3412 of the Civil Code, in that it does not allege that "there is a reasonable apprehension that * * * it [the outstanding instrument] may cause serious injury" to plaintiff, nor does it allege facts upon which a finding of reasonable apprehension could be based. The complaint alleges that defendants had sold the note and deed of trust which were provided for in the purported contract. This indicated conclusively that appellants were claiming rights under the purported contract. In the case of Prichard v. Kimball, 190 Cal. 757, 214 P. 863, 865, the court used the following language in considering the sufficiency of a complaint under this section of the Civil Code: "Whether the appellants were using the document vexatiously or not was immaterial. If they were claiming rights under it, and their claim was groundless, respondents had the right to a decree that as to them the instrument was void, whether appellants' claim was bona fide or for purpose of vexation." This section has been applied to an action to cancel a deed upon the ground that it had never been delivered and the essential allegations of a complaint for such relief are clearly set forth in the case of Keele v. Clauser, 101 Cal. App. 500, 281 P. 1073. In the instant case there was no contract executed, nor was there any delivery of the same, according to the allegations of the complaint. We therefore hold that the complaint states a cause of action under the section of the Civil Code above quoted.

[7] The municipal court had no jurisdiction because the relief under this section of the Code is clearly equitable. Angus v. Craven, 132 Cal. 691, 64 P. 1091.

[8] It is contended by appellant that the action is "barred" by section 1691, subdivisions 1 and 2, of the Civil Code. These sections do not "bar" anything, nor should they be pleaded and treated as statutes of limitation. They simply lay down certain rules which should guide the trial court in determining whether or not a rescission has been accomplished. In any event, they have no bearing upon the issues here presented, as the action was not brought under those sections of the Code authorizing a rescission.

Other points made by appellants have been considered, but they do not warrant further discussion.

The judgment is affirmed.

Civ. 821.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

June 9, 1933.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court, Aug. 7, 1933.

1. Insurance ⇨827.

In action upon benefit certificate, judgment against insurer held supported by findings of fact (Civ. Code, §§ 452a-453).

Findings of fact were that insured was unable to read; that application was not read to her; that she was not asked any of questions contained in application as to her past or present condition of health; that all answers were written in application by insurer's agent; that insured prior to signing application was affected with disease, but was unaware of nature of disease, and had no knowledge that she was suffering from any illness, and did not know that any of answers in application related to her health.

2. Insurance ⇨724(2).

Insurer was estopped from setting up defense of fraud or negligence on part of insured in answering application questions for benefit certificate, where such fraud or negligence was on part of insurer's agent (Civ. Code, §§ 452a-453).

3. Insurance ⇨817(2).

Insurer had burden of proving that at time insured signed application for benefit certificate she knew she was suffering from physical disease and answered falsely (Civ. Code, §§ 452a-453).

4. Insurance ⇨791(1).

Beneficiary of mutual benefit certificate was entitled to money judgment on insured's death and not limited to proceeds of assessment, where certificate provided for general fund which must first be resorted to before assessment was possible (Civ. Code, §§ 452a-453).

5. Insurance ⇨141(4).

Rule that insured retaining policy is estopped from setting up fraud of agent who took application did not apply to insured who was illiterate.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Action by Harry Weiss against the Policy Holders' Life Insurance Association. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Hugh Martin Young, Thomas W. Hughes, and Charles D. Warner, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

W. O. Watters and Fred J. Rogers, both of Fresno, for respondent.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem.

This is an action to recover upon a benefit certificate issued by the defendant on the life of Theresa Weiss. Plaintiff had judgment from which the defendant appeals. The benefit certificate, dated February 18, 1930, and delivered to Mrs. Weiss, was admitted in evidence; also a copy of her application dated February 18, 1930, and proof of death of insured, dated the 11th day of October, 1930. It is conceded by counsel that the signatures on the several documents are true and correct and that all assessments and dues required to be paid under the policy had been paid. Defendant, by its answer, sets up an affirmative defense based upon the provision set forth in the application for the certificate and the condition thereto affixed, and particularly averred that the insured warranted the answers made by her in the application as to her health. Defendant further alleges that each of said statements were false and were known by the insured to be false. The trial court found in favor of the plaintiff on his complaint, and found further: "That it is true that endorsed on the back of said policy of insurance, is a copy of the application for membership signed by the said Theresa Weiss; that the said Theresa Weiss, at the time of the signing of said application, was an illiterate person, unable to either read or write. That said application was not read by her or by anyone else for her benefit, prior to her signing the same. That said application was prepared and all answers and statements therein given, were entered thereon by the appointed, qualified and acting soliciting agent of defendant. That at the time said application was prepared, the following questions were therein contained, and the answers appearing thereafter were then inserted, to-wit: 'Q. Have you consulted a doctor for any illness or ailment during the past three years? Answer on reverse of this blank—No. Q. Are you now in good health? A. Yes. Q. Have you ever had tuberculosis? A. No. Q. Have you knowledge that any physical or mental disease exists in your system? A. No.' That each and all of the answers given to said questions were not given by the said Theresa Weiss directly or indirectly, and none of said questions were asked of her by said agent or any other representative of defendant, and that said agent negligently failed and neglected through no fault of the insured, to ask said questions, and without the assistance or knowledge of the insured, entered therein all of said answers thereto negligently. That the said Theresa Weiss was not familiar with the nature of said application and did not know the objects therefor, and never knew that said false statements had been entered in said application. That none of said questions were asked and none of said answers thereto given by the said Theresa Weiss, and at the time of the signing of said application, she did not know the nature of said questions or answers thereto given, and she never thereafter learned the nature of any of said questions or answers."

And the court further finds: "That it is true that on or about the 26th day of September, 1930, the said Theresa Weiss died from natural causes and not by suicide; that plaintiff made due proof of death of the said member to the defendant, and at the time of said death, the said Theresa Weiss was in good standing under the terms of said policy and she had paid all sums due thereunder by her; and that she made no false statements, misrepresentations or concealment of any material fact in the application for membership, and at the time of her death, there was a sufficient number of policyholders in good standing in defendant's association, to pay said sum of $1,500.00 upon said death."

[1] There is no conflict in the testimony, and it fully and completely supports the finding to the effect that the insured was unable to read; that the application was not read to her; that she was not asked any of the questions contained in the application as to her past or present condition of health; that all answers were written in the application by the agent of defendant, and that the insured did not know the nature of the contents of such questions or answers; that the insured, prior to signing the application was affected with a disease; that she was unaware of the nature of said ailment, and had no knowledge that she was suffering from any illness, and did not know that any of the questions and answers were in the application relating to the condition of her health.

This disposes of appellant's contention that the judgment was not supported by the findings of fact.

Appellant next contends that the written statements made by the deceased member in her application for membership in defendant association were warranties upon which the association had a right to rely, and a failure of the warranties invalidated the application and benefit certificate. The defendant association is a mutual benefit association organized under and by virtue of the provisions of sections 452a-453 of the Civil Code. The purpose of its organization is as stated in the sections noted: "Pay benefit to the nominee of a deceased member." Members can be received into the association under written application containing a brief questionnaire designed to elicit from the applicant true information as to the condition of the applicant's health and general physical condition, both past and present, as related to be on the date of the application. This application is an essential and vital part of the contract between the association and the member.

[2, 3] Appellant contends that the deceased, Theresa Weiss, warranted the Policy Holders' Life Insurance Association that the statements and answers to specific questions made in her application for membership in the association were truthful, whereas they were untruthful declarations concerning the matters about which they were made. Appellant cites a number of cases tending to support its contention. However, the cases cited by appellant are not authorities in the case at bar, for the reason that in those cases the fraud or negligence was on the part of the insured, or, if on the part of the agent, the insured was able to read and knew that the answers to the questions in the application were false. However, in the case at bar, the situation was reversed, and the fraud or negligence is not on the insured, but it is on the part of the agent of appellant company, and the insurer is estopped from setting up a defense of fraud or negligence of its own agent. In Pacific Employers' Insurance Co. v. Arenbrust, 85 Cal. App. 263, at page 266, 259 P. 121, 122, the court says: "When an insured in good faith makes truthful answers to the questions contained in the application, but his answers, owing to the fraud, mistake, or negligence of the agent filling out the application, are incorrectly transcribed, the company is estopped to assert their falsity as a defense to the policy. The acts of the agent, whether he is a general agent with power to issue policies, a soliciting agent, or merely a medical examiner for the company, are in this respect the acts of the company, and he cannot be regarded as the agent of the insured, even though it is so stipulated in the application. [Citing cases.]" If it could be successfully maintained that the erroneous answer to a question contained in the application became warranties, it was incumbent upon the appellant to show that, at the time she insured signed the application, she knew she was suffering from physical disease that existed in her system. In the case of Chase v. Sunset Mutual Life Association, 101 Cal. App. 625, 281 P. 1054, 1055, the court says: "The material and controlling findings of the trial court in this case are those in which it is found that the insured was not in possession of knowledge as to his condition such as would lead him to apprehend that his life or his health was seriously endangered. The evidence in the record is such as to justify the conclusion that up to and including the time he made application for life insurance he considered himself a hale, hearty man. * * * It appears that the heart affection might have existed for some period without the patient being aware of any serious condition. * * * While the unlikelihood of a patient in the condition the insured was in at the time of the operation having reached that stage of the disease without becoming aware of some serious ailment, is apparent, it is purely a matter of inference, as there is no direct evidence to support appellant's contention that the insured knowingly misrepresented his condition, or that the insurance company was misled by any conscious or intentional concealment on his part."

[4] Appellant next contends that the court erred in granting a money judgment to the plaintiff, and claims that under the by-laws and benefit certificate the beneficiary of the deceased, Theresa Weiss, was not entitled as of right to an absolute money judgment at law, but is entitled only to the pecuniary proceeds of an assessment levied in accordance with the terms of the by-laws upon the surviving members of the association, and cites a number of cases, the facts of which are foreign to the case at bar. In this case the contract between the parties was set forth in the certificate as follows: "This certificate is issued to Theresa Weiss by The Policy Holders Life Insurance Association, a corporation, hereinafter called the Association subject to the following terms and conditions: * * * The full amount collected on each death assessment shall be placed in the Benefit Fund and can be used only in payment of death claims. The death assessments can only be made upon the death of a Policy Holder in good standing, and then only when death claims have reduced the amount in the Benefit Fund below the sum of one dollar for each member in good standing in the Association. * * * It is understood and agreed that should more than the amount necessary to pay a claim be collected from an assessment, the excess above the amount required to pay the death claim for which the assessment was made, shall remain in the Benefit Fund and there accumulate to be used in payment of further or other death claims for which no assessment shall be made."

This provision provides for the general fund, which fund must first be resorted to before an assessment is possible. In the cases cited by appellant, there was no provision for a general benefit fund. The question as to whether or not there is anything in the fund available for payment of this death claim is peculiarly within the knowledge of the appellant. Under the pleadings in this case the question of assessment is not material.

[5] Appellant, in its reply brief, raises another point to the effect that respondent is estopped, by reason of the insured having received and retained the policy, from setting up the fraud or negligence of the agent who took the insured's application. The case at bar does not come within the strict rule of the authorities cited by appellant for the reason that the insured, being an illiterate person, could not read the English language. In McGuire v. Hartford Fire Insurance Co., 7 App. Div. 575, 40 N. Y. S. 300, 304, the court says: "We are unable to assent to it as a proposition of law, and much less as a principle of equity, that an insurance company may relieve itself from responsibility for the fraudulent representations of its agent by imposing upon a blind or illiterate person the obligation of seeing to it, at his peril, that the agent has fulfilled his duty to himself and to the company by making out the policy according to the terms and conditions agreed upon." When it is shown that the applicant is unable to read and write, the case does not come within the strict rule of Layton v. New York Life Insurance Co., 55 Cal. App. 202, 202 P. 958, and other cases cited and relied upon by the appellant, for the rule does not compel the insured to do something which he cannot do.

For the reasons above stated, the judgment is affirmed.

TRACY v. STOCK ASSUR. BUREAU et al.
Civ. 792.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

June 14, 1933.

1. Corporations $\S$ 123(7).

Where stock was pledged to secure loan, that pledgor executed assignment of stock contemporaneously with contract held not to transfer general property in stock to pledgee so as to entitle pledgee to deal therewith as pledgee saw fit.

2. Pledges $\S$ 21.

As between pledgor and pledgee, general property in pledge remains in pledgor, notwithstanding apparent transfer of legal title to pledgee.

3. Corporations $\S$ 123(15).

That lender to which stock was pledged as security sold stock soon after execution of contract held not to constitute conversion, where contract expressly authorized lender to sell stock at any time it saw fit.

Written contract expressly authorized lender, at any time it saw fit, to sell, assign, pledge, hypothecate, or collect whole or any part of securities or any substitute therefor at public or private sale without demand, advertisement, or notice, such demand, advertisement, and notice being expressly waived by borrower.

4. Corporations $\S$ 123(22).

Where contract required borrower, as condition precedent to return of stock pledged as security, to repay loan within certain period, and borrower did not tender repayment within such time, lender's refusal to return stock or its equivalent or to pay market value on demand held not conversion.

5. Pledges $\S$ 59.

Where collateral is placed with pledgee as security for payment of debt, pledgee selling collateral under power of sale must pay surplus to pledgor.

6. Pledges $\S$ 59.

Where collateral is pledged for debt, surplus resulting from sale of collateral is recoverable by pledgor in action for money had and received.

7. Corporations $\S$ 123(14).

Where stock was pledged as security for loan under contract giving pledgee power to sell stock whenever it saw fit and pledgee sold stock at early date, pledgor held entitled to recover only actual surplus, not greater surplus which would have resulted if pledgee had delayed sale.

8. Pleading $\S$ 49.

Complaint alleging that defendant lender sold pledged stock for specified sum in excess of indebtedness held to entitle plaintiff borrower to recover surplus, though complaint improperly stated cause of action for conversion, where it contained prayer for such relief as might be equitable and just.

9. Pleading $\S$ 49.

Plaintiff may recover if complaint, though based on wrong theory, states any cause of action which entitles him to any relief at law or in equity.

It is not essential that complaint state cause of action for relief which plaintiff seeks, provided facts stated show some right of recovery, and party cannot be thrown out of court merely because he may have misconceived form of relief to which he is entitled.

10. Corporations $\S$ 123(14).

Where pledgee, under power of sale, sold pledged stock soon after loan, pledgee held not chargeable with interest on sale surplus prior to final date when pledgor, under contract, was required to repay loan as condition precedent to return of stock, but was chargeable with interest thereafter.

Pledgor was not entitled to interest on surplus from date of sale of stock, since, under contract, pledgor's right to demand return of stock depended on repayment of amount of loan and on demand for return of pledged stock within 30-day period after a certain date which was subsequent to date of sale, and since pledgee was therefore not in default until expiration of such period.

11. Statutes $\S$ 236.

Remedial statute should be construed with greatest liberality.

12. Pleading $\S$ 235.

Trial court may permit amendment to pleadings before, during, or after trial (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 473).

13. Appeal and error $\S$ 959(3).

Court's action in permitting pleading to be amended after trial should be disturbed on appeal only when trial court has clearly abused discretion (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 473).

14. Pleading $\S$ 248(4).

In action to compel return of stock pledged for loan or recover market value thereof, on ground that plaintiff had tendered repayment of loan, amendment of complaint, omitting repayment allegation and alleging sale of stock by defendant and subsequent rise in market value, held not to change cause of action; hence permitting such amendment after trial without jury was not abuse of discretion (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 473).

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Erwin W. Owen, Judge.

Action by Charles W. Tracy against the Stock Assurance Bureau and A. M. Keene and others, copartners doing business under the fictitious name and style of the Stock Assurance Bureau, and against the Stock Assurance Bureau, a voluntary association. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed, with directions.

R. W. Henderson and W. C. Dorris, both of Bakersfield, for appellant.

Coker F. Rathbone, of Taft, for respondents.

JENNINGS, Justice.

The plaintiff instituted this action to compel the defendants to return to him shares of stock of a certain corporation or if return of said stock could not be had, to recover the market value of the stock, which was alleged to be the sum of $1,400. The original complaint filed in the suit set forth a cause of action for conversion of the stock. It alleged that on October 10, 1928, the plaintiff and defendants had entered into a written contract, which was attached to the pleading as an exhibit and by reference made a part thereof, and that in accordance with the contract and contemporaneously with its execution the defendants had delivered to the plaintiff the draft of the defendant Stock Assurance Bureau for the sum of $996.96 and as security for the repayment of said sum plaintiff delivered to defendants 20 shares of stock of the Inland Steel Company. It was further alleged that the written contract of the parties provided that upon demand by the plaintiff within 30 days after the expiration of 12 months from the date of the execution of the contract the defendant Stock Assurance Bureau agreed to return the shares of stock or their equivalent in like certificates together with dividends or interest paid or accrued thereon or at the option of either party the market value of said stock, provided that, as a condition precedent to plaintiff's right to demand the return of the stock or its market value, plaintiff was required to redeliver to the defendant the aforesaid draft unnegotiated or if the draft had been negotiated to obtain the same by paying the bank upon which it was drawn or the said defendant the amount received thereon. The complaint alleged that within 30 days from the expiration of the 12-month period, plaintiff secured the return of the draft from the bank on which it was drawn and appointed the bank as his agent to return the draft to defendant Stock Assurance Bureau and to demand and receive from defendants the shares of stock or their equivalent in like certificates or at the option of defendants the then market value of said stock and that thereafter and within the 30-day period the bank, acting as plaintiff's agent, tendered and offered to return the draft to the defendant Stock Assurance Bureau, but that the defendants refused to return the pledged certificates or equivalent certificates representing shares of stock in the aforesaid corporation or to pay to plaintiff any part of the market value of the stock. The answer filed by the defendants contained a denial that the plaintiff had secured the return of the draft from the bank on which it was drawn or that he had appointed the bank his agent to redeliver the draft to defendant Stock Assurance Bureau, and to demand and receive from said defendant the shares of stock mentioned in the complaint. For a further defense to the complaint the answer alleged that at the time the written contract mentioned in the complaint was executed the plaintiff sold, assigned, and transferred to the defendants all his right, title, and interest in and to the 20 shares of stock of the Inland Steel Company by an instrument of absolute and final assignment and transfer which was attached to the answer and by reference made a part thereof. The answer also alleged that the plaintiff had failed to comply with the terms of his written contract within the time specified therein and had consequently forfeited all rights thereunder. The answer denied that, at any time prior to the commencement of the action, plaintiff had tendered or offered to return the draft for $996.96 to any of the defendants and further denied that defendants had refused, before the commencement of the action, to return the stock certificates or their equivalent or to pay the market value thereof and alleged that they were at all times willing to comply with the terms of the contract upon performance by the plaintiff on his part of all conditions and covenants required of him. Upon the issues thus framed by the pleadings the action proceeded to trial.

During the trial evidence was submitted to the court which showed that on or about November 24, 1928, the defendants made an absolute sale and transfer of the 20 shares of stock which had been deposited with them by plaintiff contemporaneously with the execution of the written contract of October 10, 1928, and received therefor the sum of $1,520, and that subsequent to such sale and transfer they had not acquired or held any stock of the Inland Steel Company. It further appeared from the evidence submitted during the trial that the plaintiff did not during the 30-day period immediately following October 10, 1929, secure the draft for $996.96 from the bank on which it was drawn and tender the same to the defendants or either of them.

After the trial of the action was concluded plaintiff moved the court for permission to file an amendment to his original complaint. The motion was granted and the pleading was accordingly filed.

This amendment to the complaint purports to set forth a second cause of action. New matters which are alleged therein consist of the following: That the defendants made an absolute sale and transfer of the stock on November 24, 1928, and received therefor the sum of $1,520, which was the market value of the stock at that time; that neither at the time the sale was consummated nor at any time subsequent thereto have the defendants held or acquired any stock of the Inland Steel Company other than the certificate representing the 20 shares of said stock which was deposited with said defendants by the plaintiff on October 10, 1928; that subsequent to the sale of said stock by the defendants on November 24, 1928, the market value of the stock increased to $2,100; that the defendants have not paid to plaintiff any sum whatever for or on account of the said stock and the sum of $1,103.04 is due, owing, and unpaid from the defendants to plaintiff. The pleading concludes with a prayer for judgment in plaintiff's favor for the sum of $1,103.04 and costs and for such other and further relief as may be equitable and just.

Upon the conclusion of the trial of the action and after the amendment to the complaint had been filed as aforesaid the court made its findings of fact from which it drew the legal conclusion that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover anything from the defendants. Judgment was accordingly rendered that the defendants have and recover from plaintiff their costs incurred in the action. The plaintiff thereafter presented to the court a motion for a new trial, which was by the court denied. Thereupon the plaintiff appealed from the judgment rendered in favor of the defendants as aforesaid.

In entering upon a consideration of the various matters which are presented by this appeal, certain preliminary contentions advanced by each of the opposing parties may properly first be discussed.

[1,2] It is a fundamental contention of respondents on this appeal, and apparently the contention was successfully advanced during the trial of the action, that the separate instrument of assignment executed by appellant contemporaneously with the execution of the written contract of October 10, 1928, conveyed to respondent Stock Assurance Bureau all right, title, and interest of appellant in the 20 shares of stock. In other words, it is confidently urged that an outright sale and transfer of the stock to said respondent was consummated and the said respondent thereupon became the owner of the stock free from any lien or claim of appellant and could therefore deal with the stock as it saw fit. Manifestly if this contention is correct the judgment of the trial court was proper and this appeal is entirely lacking in merit. We entertain the opinion, however, that the contention of respondents in this regard may not prevail. The written contract entered into between appellant and respondent Stock Assurance Bureau discloses the nature of the transaction between the parties and their rights with respect to the shares of stock are fixed and determined by the provisions of this agreement. No more than a casual examination of the instrument is required to discover that the stock was deposited by appellant with the respondent Stock Assurance Bureau, to secure the repayment to said respondent of the sum of $996.96 advanced by respondent to appellant. In other words, the stock was pledged to secure repayment of a loan of money. It is an established principle in this state that, as between a pledgor and pledgee, the general property in a pledge remains in the pledgor, notwithstanding an apparent transfer of legal title to the pledgee. Shattuck & Desmond, etc., Co. v. Gillelen, 154 Cal. 778, 784, 99 P. 348; Sparks v. Caldwell, 157 Cal. 401, 403, 108 P. 276; Golden v. Fischer, 27 Cal. App. 271, 149 P. 797.

[3] Equally unmeritorious, in our opinion, is the contention of appellant that the sale of the stock by the pledgee was unauthorized and constituted a conversion of the pledged property. The written contract relied upon by appellant as the very basis of his right to recover from respondents expressly authorizes the pledgee "at any time it so sees fit to sell, assign, pledge, hypothecate or collect the whole or any part of said securities or any substitute therefor at public or private sale without any demand, advertisement or notice, such demand, advertisement and notice being expressly waived by the assured," appellant herein. It is doubtful if language more apt to confer upon the pledgee a power of sale could have been used. Since the sale of the pledged stock by the pledgee was so specifically authorized by the pledgor, such sale could not amount to a conversion. Hyatt v. Argenti, 3 Cal. 151.

[4] We also entertain the opinion that appellant may not successfully maintain, under the circumstances presented by the record herein, that respondents were guilty of conversion in having failed to return to him the pledged stock or its equivalent, or in having refused to pay him its market value upon demand and repayment by him to respondents of the sum of money originally advanced by them within the time provided in the written contract for the reason that we cannot discover from the record that appellant complied with the necessary condition precedent of repayment of the sum advanced within a period of 30 days subsequent to October 10, 1929. The trial court found that appellant at the time this action was instituted on November 27, 1929, "had failed to do or to perform any of the covenants and agreements incumbent upon him, by reason of the contract sued upon." It is obvious that the language of the finding is sufficiently broad to warrant the implication that the court found that appellant had not tendered repayment of the sum advanced to him which, under the terms of his contract, he was obligated to do in order to entitle him to demand the return of the pledged stock or its equivalent and the record contains ample evidence to support such a finding.

[5] The record also shows, however, that respondents sold the pledged stock and received therefor the sum of $1,520. It is a fundamental principle of the law with respect to pledges that the relation existing between parties to a transaction whereby collateral is placed in the hands of a pledgee as security for the payment of a debt, is in the nature of a trust relation and that, if disposition is made of the pledged property under a power of sale, the pledgee is under the responsibility of paying to the pledgor any surplus which may remain after deducting the amount of the indebtedness. Sparks v. Caldwell, 157 Cal. 401, 403, 108 P. 276; Hudgens v. Chamberlain, 161 Cal. 710, 715, 120 P. 422.

[6, 7] The sale of the stock pledged with respondent Stock Assurance Bureau by appellant, for a sum in excess of the amount of indebtedness which the pledge was given to secure imposed upon the pledgee the duty to pay over to appellant the surplus remaining in its hands after the indebtedness was satisfied. The right of appellant to recover the surplus could have been readily enforced by appropriate action, e. g., an action for money had and received. Appellant, however, having granted to the pledgee the broad power to sell the stock at any time the pledgee might see fit could not complain that the pledged stock was sold for a smaller sum than might have been realized had the pledgor delayed the sale to a later date when a larger sum might have been obtained. Hudgens v. Chamberlain, supra; Williams v. Parker, 30 Cal. App. pages 71, 74, 157 P. 550. Appellant was not therefore entitled to recover the amount specified in the prayer of his amendment to the original complaint which was the difference between the amount of the indebtedness and the amount which could have been realized if the pledgee had delayed the sale to a time when the market value of the stock was $105 per share instead of $76 per share, the figure at which the sale was made.

It must be observed that appellant herein did not, in his original complaint, bring an action to recover the surplus. This pleading was framed on the theory that proper tender and demand was made within the period specified in the elaborate contract made by the parties and that respondents were liable for the market value of the stock in an action for conversion. The amendment to the complaint permitted to be filed after the case was fully tried sought recovery of the surplus under the mistaken theory that the pledgee was under the duty to sell at the most favorable market. This latter pleading, however, was also framed on the theory of conversion. It is manifest that under the circumstances presented by the record, there was no conversion of the pledged property. This is obviously true because, in the first place, the written agreement of the parties expressly authorized the pledgee to sell the stock at any time it should see fit and, in the second place, the evidence showed that appellant did not comply with the provisions of the contract which required him, within a limited time, to make repayment of his indebtedness and demand the return of the stock or payment to him of the then market value of the stock.

[8, 9] We entertain the opinion, however, that appellant was not foreclosed by the form of the action from recovering whatever amount the evidence showed he was entitled to receive. Inasmuch as there is but one form of civil action in this state, a plaintiff may recover if his complaint states any cause of action which entitles him to any relief at law or in equity. Zellner v. Wassman, 184 Cal. 80, 87, 193 P. 84, 87; Hayden v. Collins, 1 Cal. App. 259, 261, 81 P. 1120. "It is not essential that a complaint state a cause of action for the relief which plaintiff seeks, provided the facts stated show some right of recovery, and a party cannot be thrown out of court merely because he may have misconceived the form of relief to which he is entitled." Zellner v. Wassman, supra. We think that the amendment to the complaint which contained allegations that the stock was deposited by appellant to secure repayment of the sum advanced to him and that it was later sold by respondents for a specified sum which was in excess of the amount of the indebtedness sufficiently exhibited facts which entitled appellant to relief. The pleading contained a prayer for such relief as might be equitable and just in the premises. We entertain the opinion that the trial court might properly have allowed to appellant recovery of such surplus as remained in respondents' hands after the amount of appellant's indebtedness was subtracted therefrom. We are also of the opinion that this court may from the record herein presented make appropriate findings and direct that judgment be entered for the correct amount. The following findings of fact are therefore made from the record herein presented which are to take the place of the findings heretofore made by the trial court:

(1) That each and all of the allegations contained in paragraphs I, II, III, and IV of plaintiff's amendment to complaint are true.

(2) That in accordance with the provisions of the written agreement entered into between plaintiff and defendant Stock Assurance Bureau, on October 10, 1928, said defendant covenanted and agreed that it would, upon demand of the plaintiff made within 30 days after October 10, 1929, return to plaintiff the pledged property consisting of 20 shares of stock of the Inland Steel Company, a corporation, or the equivalent thereof in like shares or at the option of either plaintiff or said defendant, pay to plaintiff the market value of said stock at the time of the demand, provided that, as a condition precedent to the return of said stock or its equivalent or the payment of the market value of said stock, plaintiff should repay to said defendant the amount of money advanced to plaintiff by said defendant on October 10, 1928.

(3) That plaintiff did not within the time provided in said written agreement pay or offer to pay to defendant Stock Assurance Bureau the amount advanced to plaintiff, or any part thereof.

(4) That the sale of plaintiff's stock by defendants on or about November 24, 1928, was in accordance with the authority expressly granted to defendant Stock Assurance Bureau by the terms of the written agreement entered into between plaintiff and said defendant on October 10, 1928.

(5) That upon the expiration of the 30-day period after October 10, 1929, plaintiff was indebted to defendant Stock Assurance Bureau in the amount of $1,072, which amount the said defendant was entitled to retain from the proceeds of the sale of said stock.

(6) That after deducting the sum of $1,072 from the proceeds realized from the sale of said 20 shares of stock deposited with defendant Stock Assurance Bureau as security for the repayment to said defendant of the sum of money advanced to plaintiff by said defendant, together with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, the said defendant had a surplus amounting to the sum of $448.

From the findings thus made this court draws the following conclusions of law, which are to replace the conclusions of law heretofore drawn by the trial court:

[10] That the plaintiff is entitled to recover from the defendants the sum of $448, together with interest on said sum at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from November 10, 1929.

Appellant's counsel maintains that respondents should be charged with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum upon the excess in their hands on November 24, 1928, the date on which the stock was sold for $1,520. This contention entirely overlooks the fact established by the evidence submitted in the action, viz.: That respondents were obligated under their contract to return the stock or its equivalent or pay to appellant the market value of the stock at any time within the 30-day period after October 10, 1929, when appellant should repay the amount of his loan and demand the return of the pledged property. The evidence showed that he did not prior to the institution of this action comply with the conditions precedent to his demanding return of the property. Respondents were not therefore in default in failing to return the stock or pay its market value at any time prior to November 10, 1929. On that date appellant's right to demand return of the pledged stock terminated. All that then remained to him was a right to recover from respondents whatever surplus remained after deducting from the proceeds of the sale the sum originally advanced, together with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum. Upon this date respondents were likewise under the duty of paying to appellant the aforesaid surplus. Since respondents were not until that time in default it follows that they are not chargeable with interest on any surplus in their hands prior to said date. Anderson v. Pacific Bank, 112 Cal. 598, 603, 44 P. 1063, 32 L. R. A. 479, 53 Am. St. Rep. 228.

[11-14] Respondents contend that the court erred in permitting appellant to amend his complaint after the trial of the action was concluded. Section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure confers upon a trial court a very wide discretion in the matter of permitting amendments to pleadings. The statute contains no limitation as to the time when such amendments may be allowed. In view of the established policy of the law to construe remedial statutes with the greatest liberality we entertain no doubt that a trial court possesses the power to permit amendments to pleadings at any stage of the proceeding whether before, during or after trial. San Francisco, etc., Soc. v. Leonard, 17 Cal. App. 254, 266, 119 P. 405. It is only when an abuse of the very wide discretion vested in the trial court in this regard is clearly made to appear that the court's action in permitting a pleading to be amended should be disturbed on appeal. Sweet v. Hamilothis, 84 Cal. App. 775, 258 P. 652. If it does not appear that the amendment permitted by the trial court sets up a new and entirely different cause of action and that the opposing party has been prejudiced thereby, no harm can be said to have resulted. On the contrary, the interests of justice are furthered in that multiplicity of actions is avoided and a more speedy termination of the matter in dispute is assured.

We think that it cannot be argued with any hope of success that the amendment to the complaint permitted by the trial court alleged a new cause of action. The most that can be said is that it contains a somewhat fuller explanation of the transaction set forth in the original complaint and that it was obviously drawn to conform to the proof made upon the trial of the cause. The amendment, for instance, omits any allegation of repayment by appellant of the indebtedness due to the respondent Stock Assurance Bureau and demand for return of the pledged securities or their equivalent or payment of the market value thereof. There is, however, an allegation of the sale of the stock by respondents for a specified sum of money and a further allegation that the market value of the stock had increased subsequent to the sale to a point where it had reached the sum of $2,100 for the 20 shares pledged. These latter allegations in no way changed the cause of action. They simply explained more fully the whole transaction which was the foundation of appellant's claim to recovery.

For the reasons stated the judgment is reversed and the trial court is directed to enter judgment in favor of appellant for the sum of $448 and interest on said sum at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from November 10, 1929.

1. Usury ☞115.

Contract in form of conditional sales agreement, naming one procuring loan as seller and borrower as buyer, and requiring payment to be made to certain corporation, was so ambiguous that parol and written evidence regarding transaction was admissible in action to recover usurious interest (Code Civ. Proc. § 1860).

2. Usury ☞142(3).

In action to recover usurious interest payment, evidence that loan was made not by defendant but by another corporation held admissible under specific denials of answer.

3. Usury ☞141.

In statute authorizing recovery of trebled usurious interest from one receiving it or his personal representative, words "personal representative" are used in sense of executor or administrator (Usury Law, § 3 [St. 1919, p. lxxxiii]).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Personal Representative," see Words & Phrases.]

4. Usury ☞142(4).

In action to recover usurious interest payment, evidence showed defendant was

ARCHBALD, Justice pro tem.

Action by plaintiff to recover of defendants alleged usurious interest payments made by him. From the judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff has appealed.

On or about September 25, 1928, plaintiff made a written application to defendant Central Counties Finance Company, Inc., "for the purpose of obtaining a loan through you from the Mercantile Acceptance Corporation, or the Western States Acceptance Corporation," with his automobile as security. The amount of the loan applied for was $1,000 for twelve months, and in the application plaintiff agreed to pay said defendant company a commission of 7½ per cent. for its services in procuring it, "said commission to be deducted" from the loan. Defendant Paul Muth was the manager of defendant Central Counties Finance Company, and was the one with whom plaintiff conducted his negotiations. Plaintiff was informed by Muth that the latter's company did not make such loans, but that it would procure one for him from the Mercantile Acceptance Corporation, and that such corporation would require plaintiff to place insurance on his car with it. The insurance amounted to $84.10, the brokerage to be paid defendant Central Counties Finance Company, Inc., $66.31, and Muth appraised the car as good for $800 in cash net to plaintiff. To the aggregate of such net cash, insurance, and brokerage was added $57.59 for interest, making a total of $1,008. A conditional sale agreement was executed by defendant company as "seller" and plaintiff as buyer, covering plaintiff's automobile, which agreement was dated September 28, 1928, and called for the payment of $84 per month, beginning one month after the date of said contract and continuing for twelve months, a total of $1,008, any unpaid balance to bear interest after maturity of 12 per cent. per annum, and all payments of principal and interest to be made "at the office of Mercantile Acceptance Corporation of California, 142 Sansome St., San Francisco." The contract was then assigned by Central Counties Finance Company to said Mercantile Acceptance Corporation. Evidence was admitted over objection of plaintiff to show that while the $800 net was advanced to plaintiff by defendant company, said defendant was repaid such amount plus the brokerage charge agreed to be paid by plaintiff, by a check of the Mercantile Acceptance Corporation for $866.31, and that all payments received by said defendant from plaintiff were turned over to said Acceptance Corporation.

The court found in effect that plaintiff applied to defendant company requesting it to obtain such loan from said Acceptance Corporation, and agreed to pay the commission named for so doing; that pursuant to such request the loan was obtained; that for the purpose of securing the same the lease contract above mentioned was executed and conveyed to the Acceptance Corporation; that said loan was not made by defendant company but by said Acceptance Corporation; and that all payments made by plaintiff under it were taken and received by that concern.

Appellant urges that inasmuch as the evidence shows without dispute that defendant Central Counties Finance Company, Inc., paid him the $800 and accepted certain payments from him on the loan, or charges in connection with it, and took possession of his car when he was in default, stored it, and ordered certain repairs made, and as the contract is signed by said defendant, any evidence showing that the payments were made to the Mercantile Acceptance Corporation is immaterial and tends to vary the terms of a written contract, and to prove something not set up in the answer as a defense.

[1, 2] As a part of his case plaintiff introduced in evidence the conditional sale agreement. This on its face purported to evidence the conditional sale of an automobile, and did not show a loan, although introduced as showing a loan and a provision for usurious interest. Both sides agreed that there was no sale involved, but that the instrument was security only for a loan. The monthly payments were required by the contract relied upon to be made at the offices of the Acceptance Corporation, and there is so much ambiguity in the instrument that parol as well as written evidence as to the entire transaction was clearly admissible. Section 1860, Code Civ. Proc. Such evidence showed without question that the loan was made exactly as found by the court—not by defendant Central Counties Finance Company, Inc., but by the Mercantile Acceptance Corporation. Under the circumstances such evidence was properly admitted under the specific denials of the answer.

ous interest to the person paying such interest, "against the person, company, association or corporation who shall have taken or received the same, or his or its personal representative." In other words, it is a personal action against the party exacting the usurious interest. The words "personal representative" do not mean "agent," but are used in the sense of "executor" or "administrator"; and as the evidence shows that the Central Counties Finance Company was simply the agent of the real party in interest, the findings and judgment in favor of defendants are supported by the evidence.

There would seem to be no doubt but that the finding that the interest paid was at the rate of 7.01 per cent. is in error. The interest of $57.59 charged in the conditional sale agreement was just within the law, and the finding of the court that in addition thereto there was collected the further sum of $20.90 "as interest on delinquent payments" shows that the loan was in fact usurious; but that is immaterial so long as the party who took and received such payments was not before the court.

Judgment affirmed.

CRESPI & CO. v. GIFFEN et al.
Civ. 813.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

June 9, 1933.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 7,

1. Corporations ⇨646, 648.

Corporation engaged solely in interstate commerce need not comply with statute requiring payment of filing fee and appointment of process agent, as condition precedent to doing business in state (St. 1915, p. 422, § 1, as amended by St. 1923, p. 1034, § 1).

2. Bankruptcy ⇨435.

In action on note in which defendant pleaded discharge in bankruptcy, evidence that money for which note was given was obtained by fraud held admissible to avoid defendant's plea, though fraud was not pleaded (Code Civ. Proc. § 462).

3. Bankruptcy ⇨436(3).

Evidence in action against partners on note sustained finding that money for which note was given was obtained by fraud, so that partner's liability was not released by discharge in bankruptcy (Bankr. Act, § 17(2), 11 USCA § 35(2)).

The evidence showed that the plaintiff had agreed to purchase cotton and to make advances on account of the purchase price to partnership to be disbursed to the grower in accordance with grower's needs. After receiving the proceeds of the advances, the partnership disregarded the agreement and understanding and withdrew funds from bank to pay partnership indebtedness, without using any of the money for purpose of financing grower's farming operations.

4. Bankruptcy $\hookrightarrow$ 423(1).

Innocent partner's discharge in bankruptcy will not release him from liability for fraud of copartner committed within scope of partnership business, especially where partnership benefited thereby (Bankr. Act, § 17 (2), 11 USCA § 35(2)).

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem.

This action was begun by plaintiff, a Texas corporation, against Giffen-Troutt Company, a copartnership comprised of L. F. Giffen and W. L. Troutt, and L. F. Giffen and W. L. Troutt, individually. Service was had on the copartnership and L. F. Giffen, but W. L. Troutt was not served. Judgment was rendered against the copartnership and defendant L. F. Giffen. From this judgment Giffen has appealed. The action is upon a promissory note which was executed by the defendants in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $12,500. Appellant pleaded his discharge in bankruptcy, but respondent claims the money was obtained by the defendant, copartnership, by means of misrepresentation and fraud of appellant's partner, and that such misrepresentation and fraud prevented his discharge in bankruptcy on this debt.

The points urged by appellant are: (1) That respondent was a foreign corporation doing business within this state without having complied with the statute relative to foreign corporations; (2) that appellant was discharged in bankruptcy from this debt; and (3) that the alleged misrepresentation and fraud are not within the exception of discharges of debtors in bankruptcy.

The facts may be summarized briefly as follows: Respondent, at all times during the negotiations for the loan, was a Texas corporation with its principal place of business at Waco, Tex. Defendants were residents of Fresno, Cal. The defendants, through W. L. Troutt, one of the partners, telephoned to respondent, stating that the defendants had a contract with one Anderson of Tulare county, Cal., for the purchase of seven hundred bales of cotton for the year 1926, which purchase required that $12,500 be advanced to Anderson, as required by him during the farming season of 1926, to enable Anderson to properly farm, harvest, and deliver the seven hundred bales of cotton to be sold. Respondent agreed to purchase such cotton, and to advance, on account of the purchase price, $12,500 to be disbursed during the season by Giffen-Troutt Company to Anderson in accordance with his needs. The moneys were to be repaid to respondent by way of deduction from the purchase price of cotton as the same was delivered after arrival, and, as further security for the repayment of the advancement, respondent required Giffen-Troutt Company to assign to respondent the contract which it had with Anderson, and also Anderson's note and crop mortgage for $12,500 in addition to the execution and delivery of the note of Giffen-Troutt Company for a like amount to respondent, and to deliver to respondent a cotton sales contract for seven hundred bales of cotton. This was done, and the various papers were executed and assignments made. The instruments were deposited in the First National Bank of Fresno, Cal., by defendants and transmitted to respondent. Respondent then wired to said bank from Waco, Tex., $12,500, less indebtedness due the respondent from the defendants amounting to $2,900 (which was deducted at the request of the defendants). The money was to be credited to the account of defendants on delivery of the instruments referred to. On receipt of the money, the bank credited the money to the account of defendant Giffen-Troutt Company, and transmitted the various instruments to the respondent at Waco, Tex. In the course of the negotiations over the telephone and by telegraph, defendant W. L. Troutt, representing the defendants, had informed and agreed with respondent, that the money to be forwarded should be used solely for the purpose of financing the farming operations of Anderson's cotton crop in Tulare county; that the money was not to be used in defendants' business and was not a personal loan to the defendants. They disregarded this agreement and understanding, and, within three days after the funds were deposited, defendants withdrew all these funds from the bank and used them to pay the indebtedness of Giffen-Troutt Company. Not 1 cent of this money was used for the purpose of financing Anderson's farming operations. The evidence shows that the respondent had previously had cotton contracts with defendants, and that shipments of cotton were evidenced by bills of lading, offered in evidence by respondent, showing shipments from California points to Galveston, Tex.

Relative to the interstate character of the transactions, the trial court made the following findings:

"* * * That at the time of the transaction herein involved, the plaintiff was engaged solely and only in interstate and not in intrastate commerce. * * *

"Which seven hundred bales of cotton the said Anderson had agreed and promised to sell to plaintiff, which said agreement had been made by plaintiff through its agent, L. F. Giffen, said cotton to be delivered by said Anderson free on board cars, at California shipping points, to be shipped to plaintiff in Texas. * * *

"That plaintiff was not, at any time in the year 1926, engaged in intra-state business in California, and was not doing business in California, and was not required to file with the Secretary of State copies of its Articles of Incorporation. * * *

There is ample evidence to support the court's findings upon the subject.

In the case of H. K. Mulford Co. v. Curry, 163 Cal. 276, 282, 125 P. 236, 238, the Supreme Court said: "The admitted power of the state to regulate and prescribe terms under which a foreign corporation may engage in intrastate or domestic business is subject to this limitation that, where such foreign corporation is engaged in interstate, as well as intrastate, business, no such term, condition, or requirement will be constitutional, if it imposes any burden upon the interstate business of such corporation, whatever be its name or form. * * *

[1] Appellant contends that section 1 of the act of 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 422), specifying the conditions upon which a corporation may transact business in this state, as amended in 1923 (Stats. 1923, p. 1034, § 1), applies to this case. This act provides that any foreign corporation engaged in intrastate business must, as a condition precedent to doing business in this state, file with the secretary of state certain designated papers, pay a filing fee, and appoint a process agent, and that failure to comply with these conditions renders the foreign corporation subject to certain penalties.

Appellant cites numerous cases which he claims support his position, but in examining them we find, for the most part, that the cases relate to intrastate business.

This action is based upon a promissory note executed by the defendants. Appellant Giffen pleaded a discharge in bankruptcy releasing him from his obligation on the debt. The court made a finding as follows: "That at the time of said statement, representation and promise made for, on behalf of and by the defendants, defendants did not intend to hold, pay out or apply said money to the credit or for the use and benefit of said Anderson, but on the contrary intended to and did immediately pay out and use said money so deposited in paying creditors of defendants; that within three days after said funds were so deposited by plaintiff, the same had all been used by defendants for paying their debts, and none thereof was ever delivered over or paid to said Anderson; that defendant Giffen did not know of the statements, representations and promises made by defendant Troutt."

[2] Appellant contends that the proof of misrepresentation and fraud was admitted in evidence, over his objection, when it had not been pleaded. In the instant case the original obligation is on a promissory note. Fraud was included and incidental to the creation of that obligation. That incident was properly urged without pleading, to avoid the plea of discharge in bankruptcy. Section 462 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "Every material allegation of the complaint, not controverted by the answer, must, for the purposes of the action, be taken as true; the statement of any new matter in the answer in avoidance or constituting a defense or counterclaim, must, on the trial, be deemed controverted by the opposite party."

This is a sufficient answer to appellant's contention.

[3, 4] Appellant next contends that the discharge in bankruptcy was a complete defense. Subdivision 2 of section 17 of the Bankruptcy Act, section 35 (2), title 11 USCA, provides that a discharge in bankruptcy shall release a bankrupt from all his provable debts, except such as are liabilities for obtaining property by false pretenses or false representations. It is claimed the defendants obtained the money by false representations. The court found that the defendants promised and represented that "they would hold said money as agents of plaintiff and pay the same to said Anderson from time to time during the year 1926, in accordance with the needs of his farming operations; that plaintiff believed and relied upon said statements, representations and promises; that because of said representations and promises, the plaintiff, on the 18th day of January, 1926, forwarded said money by telegraph to the First National Bank in Fresno to be deposited to the credit of defendants, and the same was on said day deposited to the credit of said defendants. * * *

"The evidence shows that the defendants obtained the money from the respondent by false statements and representations that the funds would be used and applied in advances to Anderson during the farming season of 1926, and is sufficient to support the finding. Misrepresentation and fraud being excepted from the discharge of a debtor in bankruptcy when proven, and a partner being responsible for the acts of another partner, if done within the scope of the partnership business, a discharge in bankruptcy will not release the innocent partner in such a case as this, especially where the fruits of the wrong were received and used by and for the benefit of the partnership. Strang v. Bradner, 114 U. S. 555, 5 S. Ct. 1038, 29 L. Ed. 248.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal held dismissed where notice of appeal was filed 65 days after order denying motion for new trial and no request to clerk to prepare transcript was filed, no bill of exceptions was settled or filed, no proceeding looking toward preparation of bill was pending, no such proceeding had been instituted, and time within which record might be prepared had expired (Code Civ. Appeals dismissed.

Hickcox, Trude & Robertson, of El Centro, for respondents.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

A motion was made in each of the above cases to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that the notice of appeal was not filed within the time required by law, and upon the further ground that no steps have been taken toward the preparation and filing of a transcript or a bill of exceptions.

[1] It appears in each case, by affidavit, that an order denying a motion for a new trial was entered on September 23, 1932; that notice of the entry of said order was mailed on October 19, 1932, at El Centro, Cal., directed to the attorneys for the plaintiff and appellant at their office in Los Angeles, Cal.; and that notice of appeal was filed by the plaintiff on November 28, 1932. It thus appears that notice of appeal was filed too late. Section 939, Code Civ. Proc.; Lawson v. Guild, 215 Cal. 378, 10 P.(2d) 459.

[2] It further appears in each of these appeals, by certificate of the county clerk, that notice of appeal was filed on November 28, 1932; that no request to the clerk to prepare a transcript has been filed; that no bill of exceptions has been settled or filed; that no proceeding looking toward the preparation of a bill of exceptions or of a transcript is now pending in the trial court; that no such proceeding has ever been instituted; and that the time within which a record might be prepared under either method has expired. These facts require the granting of the respective motions [Steffey v. Standard Stations, Inc., et al. (Cal. App.) 20 P.(2d) 971].

In each of the cases named above, the appeal is dismissed.

2. Divorce ⇨245(1), 309.

Court's power to modify decree for alimony and support of minor children is statutory and cannot be controlled by parties (Civ. Code, § 139).

3. Divorce ⇨245(1), 309.

6. Divorce ⇨236.

Where wife by contract cedes property rights to husband, and husband, though not at fault, agrees to pay fixed sum as alimony, incorporation of property settlement in divorce decree is merely confirmation of contract and not exercise of court's statutory power (Civ. Code, § 139).

7. Divorce ⇨236.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Dudley S. Valentine, Judge.

Action by Tillie M. Armstrong against George Nelson Armstrong. From an order modifying the decree relating to payment of alimony and support of the minor child, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Sparling & Teel, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Fred O. Reed, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

This appeal involves the simple issue whether an award of alimony made in harmony with a property settlement agreement may be modified upon a proper showing.

The complaint pleaded an action for divorce upon the ground of the husband's desertion. It alleged that, for the purpose of settling their property rights, and for making provisions for the support of their minor child, the parties had entered into a written agreement. This agreement was attached as an exhibit and incorporated in the complaint. The defendant permitted his default to be entered. The trial court found the allegations of the complaint to be true and entered an interlocutory decree awarding plaintiff alimony in the sum of $50 a month until she may remarry and directing defendant to pay plaintiff $50 a month for the support of their minor child. The final decree confirmed these awards. The property agreement was not incorporated in either decree and was not referred to in either. Thereafter the defendant moved to modify the decree in so far as it related to the payment of alimony and support of the minor child. This motion was granted as to both items and the plaintiff has appealed upon a bill of exceptions.

[1-3] The order must be affirmed for the following reasons: The power of the court to modify decrees of this character is statutory (section 139, Civ. Code) and cannot be controlled by the parties (Johnson v. Johnson, 104 Cal. App. 283, 287, 285 P. 902); if, by the terms of the property agreement, the rights of the parties are contractual, that is a matter which can be determined only in an action based upon the contract (Hughes v. Hughes, 68 Cal. App. 195, 197, 228 P. 675); as it does not appear from the face of either decree that the property settlement was adopted by the trial court, the statutory power of the court to modify cannot be denied (Hughes v. Hughes, supra; Johnson v. Johnson, supra).

[4, 5] Appellant argues that we must assume that the trial court adopted the contract because it found that the allegations of the complaint were true. The finding could not go beyond the pleading; it merely certifies the truth of the contract. There is nothing in the finding which indicates that the trial court adopted the contract as a part of its judgment.

[6, 7] Cases cited by appellant where the court awarded alimony against the innocent party (Parker v. Parker, 55 Cal. App. 458, 203 P. 420; Johnson v. Johnson, 104 Cal. App. 283, 285 P. 902) are not in conflict. Such awards do not find their authority in the Code sections, but are based upon the contract of the parties. Thus, where the wife has by contract ceded property rights to the husband, and the latter, though not at fault, has agreed to pay a fixed sum as alimony, the incorporation of the property settlement in the divorce decree is merely a confirmation of the contract and is not an exercise of the statutory power given the court. Here the husband ceded to his wife all the community property except an interest in a contract to purchase an automobile; the wife ceded nothing other than her interest in the automobile contract; the husband was the party at fault. His agreement to pay alimony was nothing more than an agreement to comply with the court's order.

No other point needs consideration.

The order is affirmed.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 14,

1. Usury ☞31.

If real intent of parties was to effectuate sale, as distinguished from loan of money, or contract for forbearance for use of money, form of contract was immaterial as respects usury.

2. Contracts ☞164.

Deed absolute in form and passed as part of transaction for erection of ice plant and sale of entire property to grantors must be construed with other contract relating to transaction.

3. Usury ☞31.

Contract whereby realty was deeded to one who agreed to erect ice plant and convey entire property to grantors upon payment of purchase price, bonus and interest held sale contract and not usurious.

Contract provided that full purchase price was to be $65,000, or which $15,000 was to be cash, balance, which was to bear interest at 8 per cent., was to be paid from sale of ice, and that the full purchase price should be computed from the price above stated, with the addition thereto of such sum as might be due on account of interest and bonus, and that purchasers should pay seller bonus of 75 cents per ton of ice manufactured until the full purchase price should be paid, provided that, if payment was completed by certain date, the provision as to bonus should be void.

4. Usury ☞92.

Where plaintiffs' theory was that the contract was affected by usury, and rights of parties were different from what they would be if no usury existed, plaintiffs were entitled to bring suit to determine rights of parties, notwithstanding their default of contract.

5. Action ☞66.

Equitable rights of parties should be determined in the suit, and not as a preliminary to bringing it.

ANDREWS, Justice pro tem.

On December 12, 1927, the parties to this action entered into a contract whereby defendant was to erect, upon land which plaintiffs would deed to him, buildings, machinery, and equipment for the manufacture and sale of ice. Defendant was to sell this plant and equipment as finally completed to the plaintiffs for the purchase price of $65,000, of which $15,000 was to be cash, the balance to be paid from receipts for the sale of ice made in the plant. An accounting and payment was to be made each week. The balance due to defendant was to bear interest at 8 per cent. Then appears this provision: "The full purchase price shall be computed from the above stated price in paragraph IV, with the addition thereto of such sum as may be due on account of interest and bonus, if applicable and such other sums as may be due the seller on account of additional equipment."

Title was to remain in defendant until the purchase price was paid in full and in cash. Then follows this language: "Purchasers agree to pay seller a bonus of 75 cents per ton of ice manufactured in the plant until the full purchase price is paid to the seller. This bonus to be paid seller due to exceptionally favorable terms of purchase granted. Provided, however, if purchasers complete payment to seller of all sums of money due him prior to November 15, 1928, this provision as to bonus shall be null and void."

Other provisions related to insurance, patents, acceptance, delivery, rights on default, and special provisions as to cost of buildings. Pursuant to the contract the plant was erected and turned over to plaintiffs on the 27th day of April, 1928. Plaintiffs thereafter used the plant in the manufacture of ice and made payments from time to time on the contract.

On June 10, 1931, there was due defendant, according to his account, about the sum of $28,000. On that date he claimed to have discovered that plaintiffs had been guilty of dishonest violations of the contract by failing to account for and pay over several thousand dollars which had accrued from the sale of ice and which had not been reported. On July 10, 1931, defendant gave notice of default and demanded possession of the property. Thereafter on July 15, 1931, plaintiffs, claiming the contract to be usurious, brought this action to have the rights of the parties determined under the contract, for an accounting, for the settlement of adverse claims, for the conveyance of the property from defendant to themselves, and for other relief. Defendant interposed a cross-complaint setting out his rights under the contract, asked for possession of the property, confirmation to his title thereto, attorneys' fees, and damages. The trial court held the contract usurious and ordered the property conveyed to plaintiffs.

The controlling issue is whether the contract was usurious. That issue is presented as arising in two ways: (a) That the transaction to which the contract related was in reality a loan of money, or that the plan of payment adopted was designed to enable defendant to obtain a greater rate of interest than is permitted by law for the forbearance of money which was due under the contract; and that an ulterior purpose inspired the wording of the contract to disguise the true intent and the terms of payment purporting to relate to the conditions of sale were but subterfuge to conceal its unlawful purpose; (b) that the contract on its face, and according to necessary legal construction, imports the intent to exact more than the legal rate of interest for the forbearance for use of money.

A study of the pleadings, the record of the trial, and the findings of fact give no indication that any issue relating to an ulterior purpose or attempt at subterfuge in the formation of the contract was ever advanced or considered until raised in the brief of plaintiffs here, and that such contention by plaintiffs is not sustained in the record is a necessary conclusion.

The question of usury which is the issue of the case rests, therefore, upon the construction to be given to the contract. If the contract is one for the sale of property, and the method of payment was intended as one of the elements of the purchase price, there would be no usury, but, if the purchase price is fixed by the contract independently of the provisions for payment of interest and as a present fixed cash price payable at the option of the plaintiffs, the interest and bonus provisions having no purpose except to relate to the forbearance of payment, then usury might be found.

In the consideration of this contract, plaintiffs advance the contentions (a) that this language in the contract "that the purchasers * * * do hereby agree * * * to purchase and receive from the seller * * * and pay the seller as the purchase price thereof the sum of, * * *" indicates conclusively the intent to fix a purchase price, and that all other provisions relate to the forbearance for its immediate payment; (b) that the deed of land provided to be made by plaintiffs to defendant was intended as security for the payment of the purchase price thus fixed and was in legal effect a mortgage for that purpose.

Giving attention to the language of the contract for the purpose of determining what was therein expressed as to the entire purchase price of the property, it is found that subsequent to the first mention of the purchase price a paragraph was added which so completely covers this point that doubtless those who prepared the contract had in mind to settle this question. This is set forth in the first quotation in the résumé of the contract above and clearly shows the bonus and interest to be included in the meaning of purchase price.

[1] If the real intent of the parties was that of purchaser and seller, as distinguished from the loan of money or the forbearance for the use of money, it is immaterial what form or plan was adopted to accomplish that purpose. Pacific Finance Corp. v. Lauman, 95 Cal. App. 541, 273 P. 48; Lamb v. Herdon, 97 Cal. App. 193, 275 P. 503. It might provide a purchase price with deferred payments bearing 20 per cent. interest due at future dates, and the provision would not be usurious. This contract involved the expenditure of $65,000, with a cash payment of only $15,000, leaving a very large portion of the purchase price dependent upon the future conduct of the business which must carry with it the hazards incident to business such as fire or earthquake, the introduction of competitive service, honesty and skill in carrying on the enterprise, general prosperity, and available markets for the product and other factors. It may have been the hazards involved and the large amount at stake that led to the agreement for a bonus without which it would be difficult to finance such an enterprise. Leaving out of account for the moment the provision which would have rendered the bonus not collectible if the purchase price had been paid in November of 1928, the contract would then clearly be one where the bonus was a part of the purchase price, very considerable in amount, and which would inure to the profit of the seller due to the carrying on of the business and which would not have been avoided by the buyer under any provision of the contract enabling him to make payment in cash or in any other way.

What effect, then, shall be given to the provision of the contract set forth in the second quotation where the contract is described? The proviso does carry some implication of the right to make payment at any time prior to said date, which understanding would be increased by the knowledge of the parties that so large a sum would probably be impossible of payment from sales of ice, and therefore a reasonable construction of this provision would be that the parties intended that it might be paid in cash during the period covered by the proviso. The proviso had another possible bearing upon the contract illustrating its purpose. Due to the hazards which have been mentioned, it would be a pronounced incentive to a high degree of diligence in the conduct of the business and an early and continuous reduction of the unpaid balance which would assure to seller greater safety for his investment. Whatever may have been the reason which prompted the insertion of this proviso, it never became a factor in determining the rights of the parties due to the fact that the contract was not within the time paid in full. The only possible force it could have favorable to the purchaser was that it might lend some color to its claim that the sale was for a present payable cash price, and therefore all other provisions which enabled the seller to collect more than legal interest indicated the usurious character of the contract. But this contention cannot be sustained in the light of the obvious general understanding of the parties that payment was to be made, and was only contemplated to be made by the sale of ice which was carefully regulated, to be made weekly. Also, this option was only to pay the contract in full within a limited time and receive a discount by so doing, which brings the contract into the classification of sales where a larger price is exacted over the cash price as one of the terms of the sale with a conditional discount provision. This privilege or option, if construed to be such, was given to the purchasers to accomplish a deduction from the sale price if made on time and was not binding upon the buyer and, not having been taken advantage of, leaves the contract as if the proviso had never been inserted.

[2] Upon the question of the deed indicating a purpose to secure the purchase price and amounting in equity to a mortgage, if so regarded, it would merely affect the manner of enforcing the rights of the parties under the contract by foreclosure instead of forfeiture, inasmuch as if security, it was for the faithful performance of the contract according to its terms. This theory of a mortgage does not work out the real intent of the parties as shown by the contract. The deed was a part of the transaction. It was absolute in form. It is to be construed with the contract to which it related, both as parts of one instrument, and thus construed the contract becomes a condition subsequent as if inserted in the deed and the right of forfeiture growing out of this condition depended upon the faithful performance of the contract by the buyer and the determination of the rights of the parties by reason of that condition will be worked out by the result of this action.

and purchase, and so construed there is nothing in its provisions which renders it usurious.

[4, 5] It is urged that the suit was prematurely brought because the default in the contract was fraudulent and equity would not tolerate such an action. It is the theory of plaintiffs that the contract was affected by usury, the rights of plaintiffs worked out under that theory were so entirely different from the rights of the parties if no usury existed that the whole situation justified the bringing of an action by either party which would involve the question of usury and of default and of an accounting generally and a settlement of the rights involved in this contract. The question of the equitable standing of the parties should be determined in the suit, not as a preliminary to bringing it.

[6] Notwithstanding the fact that the findings have worked out the amount which would be due to defendant by reason of interest and of the bonus provision in event that no usury existed, there are other important issues to be settled by the trial court, such as a matter of attorneys' fees, damages claimed for the detention of the property, asserted fraudulent character of plaintiffs' default as bearing upon the rights of plaintiffs to retain the property upon payment of the amount due defendant as indicated by this decision, which render it necessary that a new trial be had.

Judgment reversed.

Civ. 1220.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

June 12, 1933.

1. Trusts ⇨30½(1).

Oral agreement between partners, at time partnership was terminated and assets divided, that mineral rights reserved from conveyances of partnership land title to which was taken in individual names of partners should be held in trust for different co-partners, held "express trust."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Express Trust," see Words & Phrases.]

2. Trusts ⇨17, 18(2).

Agreement between partners, at time partnership was terminated and assets divided, that mineral rights reserved from conveyances of partnership land title to which was taken in individual names of partners should be held in trust for different copartners, could be created by parol (Civ. Code, § 852).

Such agreement could be created by parol, as against contention that it could not be created by parol, because Civ. Code, § 852, provides that a trust in relation to real property must be in writing, since the rights involved, although in their nature real estate, were at the time of the making of the agreement partnership property, and as between the partners, and in connection with any matter pertaining to the partnership business, regarded in law as personal property.

3. Limitation of actions ⇨103(2).

Until repudiation thereof by trustee, statute of limitations would not begin to run against claim of trust for different copartners in mineral rights reserved from conveyances of partnership land title to which was taken in individual names of partners.

4. Limitation of actions ⇨83(1).

Upon death of partner, four-year limitation statute began to run against claim of trust for different copartners in mineral rights reserved from conveyances of partnership land, title to which was taken in deceased partner's name.

5. Limitation of actions ⇨175.

Administratrix could not, by recognizing trust, waive running of statute of limitations against claim of trust for different copartners in mineral rights reserved from conveyances of partnership land, title to which was taken in deceased partner's name.

6. Limitation of actions ⇨83(3).

Trust for different copartners in mineral rights reserved from conveyances of partnership land, title to which was taken in individual names of two partners as tenants in common, did not survive upon death of one partner trustee, so as to preserve right of third partner against bar of limitations against deceased partner's interest (Civ. Code, § 2288).

7. Limitation of actions ⇨180(1).

Statute of limitations could not be tested on demurrer to complaint which did not disclose when cause of action arose.

8. Equity ⇨87(1).

Equity follows the law in matter of limiting time for commencing actions as provided by limitation statutes, unless, due to circumstances creating strong equitable considerations, plaintiff's right ought not to be recognized in equity.

9. Trusts ⇨365(2).

Partner's right to enforce trust in mineral rights reserved from conveyances of partnership land, title to which was taken in deceased partner's name, held not barred by laches; four years not having elapsed from date of death to time of action.

Partner who held mineral rights in trust did not repudiate trust to time of his death, and defendants charged with the administration of his estate attempted to recognize the trust, and the time and character of the claim were not such that any of defendants' rights would be seriously affected by the delay in bringing action.

10. Limitation of actions ⇨180(1).

Order sustaining, without leave to amend, demurrer to fourth amended complaint which showed upon its face that cause of action was barred by limitations, held proper where no application to amend was made, and no showing made as to nature of amendment, and plaintiff had been afforded ample opportunity to frame complaint to protect his rights.

ANDREWS, Justice pro tem.

This appeal is from a judgment of dismissal following the sustaining of a demurrer to the complaint without leave to amend. The complaint sets forth that in the year 1916 the plaintiff and two brothers entered into a partnership for the purpose of dealing in cattle; that in the course of the business the partnership acquired certain real estate which was used in the business, the title to which was taken in individual names of different members of the partnership to be held in trust for the partnership; that the real estate thus acquired was during the course of the business from time to time sold and conveyed to purchasers, reserving, however, the mineral rights to the soil, the deeds conveying only the surface right. The active business of the partnership was brought to a close during the lifetime of the brothers and the assets of the company divided between them, except the mineral rights which had been reserved from the conveyances of the land.

It is alleged that at the time the assets were divided it was agreed that these mineral rights were to remain, so far as the title was concerned, undistributed and to be held in trust for the different copartners; each to be entitled to a one-third interest, conveyance to be made of such interest on demand. Subsequent to this settlement of the business one of the partners, R. T. Barritt, died on the 14th day of July, 1921, and on the 16th day of September, 1921, B. F. Barritt, one of the partners, was appointed executor of the estate. B. F. Barritt continued to act as executor of the estate up to the time of his death, the date of his death not appearing in the complaint nor in the record. Subsequent to the death of B. F. Barritt, his wife, Belle A. Barritt, was appointed executrix of his estate on December 23, 1927, and on said date Susie F. Barritt, widow of R. T. Barritt, was appointed administratrix of the estate of R. T. Barritt, deceased, and since that date these persons have been and now are administering these estates; that since the appointment of these persons to administer these estates they each admitted to plaintiff knowledge of the trust in the mineral lands and agreed that his one-third interest should be recognized and protected in the administration of the estates; that on the 20th day of June, 1930, they repudiated their trusts and denied plaintiff's right to any interest in the lands; that thereupon on July 12, 1930, this action was begun to enforce this trust and recover plaintiff's rights in said lands.

Defendants demur to the fourth amended complaint upon the general ground that it does not state a cause of action, and upon the further ground that it appears upon the face of the complaint that the statute of limitations has run against plaintiff's cause of action, if any is stated, and that the right of action has been lost through laches, if any existed. A special demurrer was also interposed for uncertainty, many specifications being set forth.

[1, 2] 1. The briefs discuss the nature of the trust attempted to be set forth in the complaint and consideration of that question leads to the conclusion that there is no constructive and no resulting trust but that the pleading and rights of the plaintiff depend upon an express, constructive, and continuing trust created by the agreement and acts of the partners. The defendants insist that the allegations of the complaint show only a trust created by oral agreement between the partners at the time of the final settlement of their partnership relations and that such trust could not be created by parol because of section 852 of the Civil Code, which provides that no trust of this character can be created except in writing. The answer to this contention on the part of plaintiff is that the rights here involved, although in their nature real estate, were, at the time of the making of the verbal contract creating the trust, partnership property, and as between the partners and in connection with any matter pertaining to the partnership business, regarded in law as personal property, and that such a trust as is here involved can be created orally in personal property. There is force in the contention that the oral contract alleged would sustain the trust contended for, but the facts alleged in the complaint justify a working out of the same result, the same relationship, and the same rights arising thereupon, in another view of the complaint. The existence of the partnership, the fact of its ownership of the lands in question, and the fact that the partnership was terminated and assets divided except as to these reserved mineral rights, present a case where, under section 2424 of the Civil Code, the partnership would still continue until these lands were finally disposed of and divided under the original trust created by the partnership relation. The conclusion reached is that the complaint states a cause of action except as affected by the other contentions.

[3, 4] 2. The trust set forth in the complaint would be a voluntary continuing trust against which the statute of limitations would not begin to run until a repudiation of the trust by the trustee. Upon the death of R. T. Barritt the character of the trust was changed, as to the interest which was in his name, from a voluntary trust to an involuntary trust. The heirs, devisees, or executor would after his death take the property subject to the trust, but immediately upon the death the statute of limitations would begin to run, and unless in some manner waived or asserted by action, the right of plaintiff would be lost after four years. Norton v. Bassett, 154 Cal. 411, 97 P. 894, 129 Am. St. Rep. 162. His death occurred some nine years before the commencement of this action and the right of action was therefore extinguished as appeared upon the face of the complaint unless the allegation of the complaint that the administratrix had recognized the trust and agreed to respect its provisions in the administration of the estate would operate to waive the effect of the statute.

[5] 3. The case above cited is also an answer to this contention, in that it is there held that no oral recognition of the trust by the successor to the property would operate to change the nature of the trust and that no administratrix has authority to recognize the existence of a trust or to change its character. The result would be that as to that portion of the property which stood in the name of R. T. Barritt, the running of the statute of limitations had not been waived, and as to that particular portion of the land involved, the plaintiff had no right and the demurrer was properly sustained. The fact that for a portion of the time, which was within the four-year limitation, the executor was one of the partners and charged with knowledge of a recognition of the rights of plaintiff, would in no way affect his rights and duties as executor.

[6] A part of the lands was held by R. T. Barritt and B. F. Barritt jointly as trustees under the same deed. Section 2288 of the Civil Code provides that upon the death of one of several cotrustees the trust survives to the others. They were not cotrustees and the section could not have the effect of continuing this trust and enabling the surviving trustee to carry out its provisions, thereby preserving the right of plaintiff against the bar of the statute of limitations. The nature of the creation of the trust and the manner in which it must necessarily be executed, and the individual right given to each grantee by the deed which conveyed the land to them apparently as tenants in common requiring the separate individual action to overcome the legal effect of the apparent title held by each, make it apparent that each would be the separate trustee of the undivided portion of the property which he would receive by the deed and which would belong to him absolutely except for the trust.

[7-9] 4. A different situation may be presented as to the lands held in trust by B. F. Barritt at the time of his death. While the date of his death is not disclosed, and the statute of limitations could not be tested on demurrer, it is assumed for the purpose of this opinion that four years had not elapsed from the date of his death to the time of bringing this action. As to the lands held in his name, therefore, the statute of limitations would not have run at the time of the commencement of the action and the complaint would state a cause of action against such lands unless the plaintiff's right had been lost by laches. It is the rule that equity follows the law in the matter of limiting the time for commencing actions as provided by the statutes enacted for that purpose, unless due to some circumstances which are shown to create strong equitable considerations it can be seen that the right of plaintiff ought not be recognized in equity. The circumstances surrounding plaintiff's claim as against the lands standing in the name of B. F. Barritt at the time of his death, there having been no repudiation by him, and there having been attempted recognition of plaintiff's rights by defendants charged with the administration of his estate, and the time and character of the claim not being such that any of defendants' rights would be seriously affected by the delay, which was not impressive, it must be held that it is not a proper case for the application of the doctrine of laches.

5. The special demurrer presents twenty specifications which defendants consider important to a proper amplification of the complaint to the end that it may be tested as to its sufficiency, and to enable defendants to answer, and to an understanding of the issues which must be involved in the trial of the case. An examination of all of these specifications leaves the impression that none of them is necessary to the cause of action or useful in preparing to meet the issues raised by the pleadings.

6. The second cause of action including, as it does, the statement of the first cause of action differs in no way from that cause of action, the question of title being alike involved in both, and the same ruling involved in the demurrer to the first cause of action applies to the second.

[10] 7. The demurrer was sustained without leave to amend and as to the land in the name of R. T. Barritt, under the conditions as shown by the record, this was a proper order. No application to amend appears to have been made and no showing as to the nature of the amendment which was desired. An ample opportunity had been afforded in the handling of the case prior to this order, for framing the complaint upon such lines as plaintiff considered possible for the preservation and protection of his rights.

[11] The judgment is reversed, with directions to overrule the demurrer so far as the complaint relates to the lands held in the name of B. F. Barritt, and judgment is affirmed in so far as it relates to the lands held in the name of R. T. Barritt. The attempted appeal from the order sustaining the demurrer is dismissed as not being an appealable order.

BEAM et al. v. DUGAN et al.

Civ. 8999.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.

June 13, 1933.

Rehearing Denied July 13, 1933.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 10,
1933.1. Mines and minerals $\S$ 79(1).

Under conveyance transferring part of "landowner's royalty," consisting of rentals in "any and all oil, produced or saved from any wells to be drilled upon" land, grantees acquired perpetual interest in royalties out of any oil produced, irrespective of under what lease such oil was produced.

2. Mines and minerals $\S$ 79(1).

Conveyance of landowner's royalty must be strictly construed against grantor.

3. Mines and minerals $\S$ 79(1).

Where eight landowners executed community lease for 20 years embracing land owned by vendors of part of landowner's royalty in oil, reserving no right to any one of lessors to cancel lease or declare forfeiture, purchasers of part of landowner's royalty under lease were entitled to interest in all royalties paid for 20 years.

4. Mines and minerals $\S$ 79(1).

Reservation or sale by landowner of interest in royalty or rentals from land creates in purchaser right incident to land itself which cannot be defeated by act of landowner without purchaser's consent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Wilber F. Downs, Judge.

Suit by S. K. Beam and Nora B. Beam against John Dugan and Lena J. Dugan and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed in part, and reversed in part.

A. E. Garten and Vern E. Garten, both of Long Beach, for appellants.

Koenig & Brunton, of Los Angeles, for respondents Dugan.

Wellborn & Wellborn, of Los Angeles, for respondents Doheny and Petroleum Securities Co.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

The plaintiffs sued to quiet title and for an accounting claiming under a sale and two assignments of portions of a landowner's royalty in oil aggregating 1 per cent. of the total royalty payable to their grantors. Defendants had judgment, and the plaintiffs appeal upon typewritten transcripts.

The conveyances to the plaintiffs and to their assignors were executed in March, 1923. In form and substance they are identical. The one to the plaintiffs, after describing the real property by metes and bounds, recites: "And whereas, said above described property, together with other property, has been leased for oil development under a lease, of date, July 18, 1922, between John Dugan and wife and others, as lessors, and Vern Dumas and wife, as lessees, * * * and it being provided among other things in said lease that the owners of said property, covered by said lease, shall receive a royalty of one-fifth (1/5) of all oil or kindred substances developed on said lease. * * *

"And whereas, S. K. Beam and Nora B. Beam, husband and wife, desires to purchase, and does hereby purchase a 3/5 of 1 per cent (1%) land owner's royalty in said above described property.

"Now, therefore, we * * * do hereby sell, transfer, convey, assign and set over to the said S. K. Beam and Nora B. Beam * * * out of our land owner's royalty, an undivided 3/5 of 1 per cent (1%) in and to any and all oil, gas or other hydro-carbon substances produced or saved from any wells to be drilled upon any of the land described in the lease heretofore mentioned * * * it being particularly understood and agreed that the royalty interest, herein assigned, affects all the land mentioned in said lease and is not limited to the land of said Dugans."

The final stipulation in the conveyance is thus explained: In July, 1922, prior to the date of the execution of these conveyances, the Dugans and six other landowners had executed an oil and gas lease to Vern Dumas and his wife; after the execution of that lease the Dugans conveyed a small portion of the land covered by the Dumas lease to others, and, therefore, in the conveyances to the plaintiffs and to their assignors, the Dugans made this stipulation that the interest in the royalty which they thus conveyed included oil or gas that might be obtained from wells covered by the Dumas lease, though outside of the lands then held by the Dugans in fee.

In January, 1928, the Dugans obtained quitclaim deeds from Vern Dumas and his wife and from numerous other persons claiming interests arising out of the Dumas lease, and soon thereafter executed a new oil and gas lease to Vern Dumas and wife covering a portion of the lands described in the conveyances to the Beams and their assignors. Acting under the lease of 1923, the lessees drilled a well on the premises to a depth of thirty-five hundred feet, but failed to develop oil or gas. This well was not working at the time the conveyances were made, and it does not appear that any further drilling was had under the original lease. Under the lease of 1928, new wells were drilled and production was obtained for which appellants demand an accounting.

The primary issue urged by appellants is whether the conveyances to them and to their assignors carried such an interest in the lands described therein as would entitle the grantees to a perpetual interest in the royalty paid to their grantors on any oil produced and saved from the premises. It has been frequently held that oil in place is a part of the realty and does not take on the character of personal property until severed from the realty (Taylor v. Hamilton, 194 Cal. 768, 774, 230 P. 656, and cases cited); that a contract for the sale of oil from the owner of the land does not create an interest in the real property, but is a plain contract for the sale of personal property if and when that property comes into the possession of the landowner (Richfield Oil Co. v. Hercules Gasoline Co., 112 Cal. App. 431, 435, 297 P. 73); and that until the oil has become personal property through severance from the land the title to the oil rests in the owner of the land. Black v. Solano Co., 114 Cal. App. 170, 174, 299 P. 843. The conveyances here in suit transfer "out of our land owner's royalty an undivided $\frac{3}{5}$ of 1 per cent. in and to any and all oil * * * produced and saved from any wells to be drilled." The landowner's royalty was in the nature of a rental paid by the lessees for the privilege of drilling for and extracting oil from the land. Acme Oil & Mining Co. v. Williams, 140 Cal. 681, 684, 74 P. 296. Thus in selling a portion of their landowner's royalty in any and all oil produced or saved from any wells to be drilled upon "any of the land described," the vendors were selling an interest in their right as owners of the land to take and receive rental by way of a royalty upon all oil which might be produced. But the conveyances do not limit the rights of the vendees to the royalty paid under the first lease to Dumas. That lease seems to have been mentioned in the conveyances for the single purpose of conferring upon the vendees the right to participate in the royalties paid under that lease upon oil which might be produced from lands covered by the lease, but not held in fee by the grantors.

[1, 2] The evidence discloses without conflict that it was a well-recognized custom in the community to refer to "land owner's royalty" as a perpetual interest not limited to any particular lease, and that, when an interest in a royalty limited to a particular lease was dealt with, such interest was commonly referred to as "an overriding royalty." Adopting the well-known rule of construction that a conveyance of this character must be construed most strictly against the grantor, it would seem that the intention of the parties was that the conveyances covered royalties to be paid upon any oil produced from the land, irrespective of under what lease such oil may be produced; otherwise it would have been a simple matter for the grantors to follow the customary course of expressly limiting the rights of the vendees to the royalties to be paid under the existing lease.

But, if this is not a reasonable construction of the conveyances, the appellants are nevertheless entitled to relief under another theory which is advanced in Jones v. Pier, 124 Cal. App. 444, 12 P.(2d) 646, 647. In that case a lease was executed in 1922 for a term of twenty years, there being four joint lessors. Thereafter two of these lessors executed an instrument reciting that, "by virtue of a community lease dated October 10, 1922," they were owners of $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. "of the total production of oil, * * *" and that they thereby sold to Jones 1 per cent. "of said total production." Thereafter the other joint lessors obtained a judgment in the superior court canceling the lease in respect to certain lots owned by them. Neither the plaintiff Jones nor his assignors were joined in that action. Thereafter all the lessors joined in an agreement canceling the lease in so far as it related to certain lots covered by the judgment mentioned. The plaintiff Jones was not a party to that agreement. Oil was produced in paying quantities under the second lease or agreement and Jones brought an action to quiet title to an undivided 1 per cent. of the royalties paid thereunder. Judgment went for the defendants, and on appeal this judgment was reversed by the District Court of Appeal of the Third Appellate District. A transfer to the Supreme Court was denied.

In reversing the case, the Appellate Court, relying on Jameson v. Chanslor-Canfield Midway Oil Co., 176 Cal. 1, 167 P. 369, held that, inasmuch as the right to terminate the lease for breach of covenants therein contained was specifically conferred upon the lessors jointly, therefore no less than all could either by agreement or by action in court cause a cancellation of the lease, and, also, that, by the terms of his assignment, Jones had acquired an undivided 1 per cent. interest in common with the lessors in all oil and gas produced upon the land described for the term of twenty years from the date of the original lease, regardless of who produced the same. It was said that the lease created a vested right in property, even though it was not accompanied by actual physical possession of a subterranean deposit of gas or oil, and that, because of the assignment to Jones of an undivided interest in common with the lessors in these deposits, no one of the lessors could terminate the interest thus vested in Jones without his knowledge or consent. For these reasons it was held that Jones was entitled to have quieted in him his individual 1 per cent. of all such deposits developed or produced from the property during the term prescribed in the original lease, and that any leases with relation to the land which may have been subsequently executed by the lessors were "subject to the plaintiff's prior vested right which was acquired by means of his assignment."

[3] The rule of Jones v. Pier would seem to determine the rights of the appellants in this action. When the conveyances were made to these appellants, eight landowners had executed a community lease embracing property owned by appellants' grantors. The lease was to run for a period of twenty years. It provided for the payment "as royalty and rent" for the premises one-fifth part of all oil, gas, and other hydrocarbon substances "produced and saved" from said premises, and allotted to appellants' assignors eight-tenths of said royalty. These parties then sold to the appellants and to their assignors 1 per cent. of the royalty allotted to them under the terms of the lease. The lease did not reserve to any one of the lessors the right to cancel it or to declare a forfeiture. Under the rule of Jones v. Pier the appellants purchased some vested interest which they were entitled to have quieted in this proceeding.

We purposely refrain from deciding at this time what interests the appellants acquired by their purchase, because that is an issue which the trial court must determine upon an interpretation of the instruments from the intentions of the parties in the light of the surrounding circumstances and the prevailing customs. Here the trial court found that the appellants acquired nothing. For the reasons which we have heretofore given, this finding was error. As the cause must be tried anew, it might be well to direct attention to the conflicting doctrines relating to interests of this character. There is a line of decisions found in West Virginia, Texas, and Kentucky holding that oil and gas in place are minerals subject to separate ownership, severance, and sale in like manner as coal and other solid minerals, and that a reservation, exception, or sale of royalties to be recovered from such products is in effect a reservation, exception, or sale of the corpus of the minerals—that a sale of the profits of land is a sale of a right in the land itself following the statement in Coke Litt. 4b, "For what is land but the profits thereof?" See Paxton v. Benedum-Trees Oil Co., 80 W. Va. 187, 94 S. E. 472; Stephens County v. Mid-Kansas Oil & Gas Co., 113 Tex. 160, 254 S. W. 290, 29 A. L. R. 566; United Fuel Gas Co. v. Swiss Oil Corp. (O. C. A.) 41 F.(2d) 4. The contrary view, that there can be no grant or conveyance of oil or gas in place separate or apart from the right to go on the premises and extract them, is followed in Oklahoma, Kansas, and Indiana. 1 Thornton's Law of Oil & Gas, p. 148; Rich v. Doneghy, 71 Okl. 204, 177 P. 86, 3 A. L. R. 352; Miller v. Sooy, 120 Kan. 81, 242 P. 140; Campbell v. Smith, 180 Ind. 159, 101 N. E. 89. In Ohio the courts seem to take a middle ground, holding that, while oil and gas in place are capable of separate reservation or conveyance, it is not necessary to adopt the rule of the West Virginia and similar jurisdictions that a reservation or sale of the royalties is a reservation or sale of the corpus of the mineral. Pure Oil Co. v. Kindall, 116 Ohio St. 188, 156 N. E. 119, 123. Numerous cases from these and other jurisdictions are cited in Dunlap v. Jackson, 92 Okl. 246, 219 P. 314.

[4] With these conflicting views of the character of the deposits in place there is, however, an unanimity of opinion that a reservation or sale by the landowner of an interest in the royalty or the rentals to be obtained from the land creates in the purchaser a right incident to the land itself which cannot be defeated by the act of the landowner without the consent of the purchaser. Whether we adopt the rule that the conveyances, which are the subject of this litigation, gave to the purchasers an interest in the oil and gas in place, an interest running with the land, or an interest in all royalties paid for a period of twenty years from the date of the outstanding lease, under the rule of Jones v. Pier, supra, it is manifest that the purchasers secured from the landowners such an interest in the royalties paid under the second lease as would entitle them to an accounting and an adjustment of their rights.

At the close of plaintiffs' case, dismissals were entered in favor of the fictitious defendants sued as John Doe Nos. I, II, and III; Jane Doe Nos. I, II, and III; John Doe Corporation Nos. I, II, and III; and also the Union Oil Company. The motions for a nonsuit of Edward L. Doheny, Lucy Smith Doheny, Carrie Estelle Doheny, and Lucy Smith Doheny, as administratrix, were granted. When the judgment was entered, the court inadvertently included the "Petroleum Securities Corporations (sic)" as one of the defendants as to which a nonsuit was granted. As no motion was made by that defendant and no nonsuit granted, the judgment was erroneous in that respect.

As to those defendants in whose behalf a nonsuit was granted, and as to those for whom dismissals were entered, the judgment is affirmed. As to all other defendants it is reversed.

Civ. 8456.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

June 17, 1933.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 14, 1933.

1. Partnership ⇨55.

In action by assignee of insurance company against partnership insurance agency for premiums, evidence supported verdict that one defendant was not member of partnership.

2. Principal and surety ⇨147(2).

As respects creditor's rights to sue on undertaking, undertaking to pay surety all loss which it might sustain or for which it might become liable by having executed bond held not breached until surety had paid something on its bond.

3. Principal and surety ⇨147(2).

Undertaking to pay surety all loss which it might sustain or for which it might become liable by having executed bond was not one for benefit of creditor of principal in bond executed by surety which such creditor might sue (Civ. Code, § 2854).

4. Appeal and error ⇨172(1).

Where appellant did not urge in trial court that appellee was liable as stockholder in corporation, he could not do so on appeal.

5. Insurance ⇨83(1).

In action on bond to pay loss which employer might sustain by fraud or dishonesty of insurance agent, burden was on plaintiff to prove that loss was sustained through one of acts specified in bond.

6. Trial ⇨109.

In action against principals and surety, opening statement by attorney of party sued as principal, but who was not, was not binding on surety.

7. Trial ⇨109.

In action on bond insuring against insurance agent's dishonesty and fraud, statement that moneys had been expended by agent furthering business of principal and agent, and that business of agent was business of principal, held not admission that agent had been guilty of dishonesty or fraud.

8. Fraud ⇨50.

There is a presumption against fraud.

9. Insurance ⇨83(1).

In action on bond insuring against insurance agent's dishonesty or fraud, insurer's assignee could not recover where there was no proof that losses sustained were due to agent's dishonesty or fraud.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Action by Churchill Taylor against V. E. De Camp and others. From order granting defendant the American Surety Company new trial, and from judgment for defendant Charles H. Dickinson, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

S. Laz Lansburgh, of San Francisco (S. Joseph Theisen, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Joseph G. De Forest, of San Francisco, for respondent American Surety Co. of New York.

Howard S. Lewis, of Los Angeles, for respondent Charles H. Dickinson.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiff sued as the assignee of the State Assurance Company, Limited, to recover premiums from the General Agency, a partnership, its agent, and joined the American Surety Company on its bond assuring the fidelity of the agency. The cause was tried with a jury, which returned a verdict against the General Agency and V. E. De Camp and L. P. Swayne Companies as partners therein and against the American Surety Company, but in favor of the defendant Charles H. Dickinson. Thereafter the trial court granted a new trial as to the American Surety Company on the ground that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict. Plaintiff appealed from the portion of the judgment on the verdict in favor of defendant Dickinson and also from the order granting a new trial to the American Surety Company. The appeal is taken on typewritten transcripts.

The plaintiff's assignor employed the General Agency to solicit and issue fire and automobile insurance policies, collect premiums thereon, and to generally exercise the powers usually given an insurance agency. The contract reserved to the employer the right to decline any business offered and to cancel policies which it considered undesirable. It required the agency to make periodic remittances of the net premiums to the insurance company within seventy-five days from the end of the month in which the business was written. Acting under the terms of the contract, the agency sold a considerable amount of insurance, deposited the premiums collected thereon in a bank account under the name of the General Agency, and from time to time made remittances to its employer through checks of the General Agency. Disputes arose as to the character of some of the business written by the agent, and a large number of policies were canceled by the employer either directly or by the agent acting upon orders of its employer. On February 25, 1926, the employer, exercising the power given in the contract, directed the agent to cease from writing any further business. At the same time the agent was directed to keep its offices open for the purpose of winding up the business; i. e., to collect premiums outstanding and to refund unearned premiums upon the canceled policies. When the suit was filed, the plaintiff claimed that the agent owed on the contract a sum in excess of $9,000. The defendant De Camp, who at all times was in active charge and control of the affairs of the agency, defended on the grounds, first, that, acting in good faith under the contract, the agency had expended a large sum of money in the establishment and maintenance of offices in San Francisco and Los Angeles for the use and benefit of its employer; and, second, that it was prevented from making collections of premiums because of the employer's wrongful and malicious cancellation of business written by the agent. The defendant Dickinson answered separately, denying that he was at any time a member of the partnership doing business under the name of the General Agency, and denying that he was at any time a member of a partnership doing business under the name of L. P. Swayne Company. The L. P. Swayne Companies, a corporation, filed a separate answer denying that Dickinson and L. P. Swayne individually were copartners with De Camp doing business under the name of the General Agency. The American Surety Company admitted the execution of the surety bond, and specially raised the issue that its liability was limited for loss sustained by the State Assurance Company, because of "any act or acts of fraud, dishonesty, forgery, theft, embezzlement, wrongful abstraction or wilful misapplication of funds on the part of said The General Agency."

Upon the issues so framed, the plaintiff tendered proof upon the composition of the partnership doing business under the name of the General Agency through which it sought to hold Dickinson as a partner. Evidence was also offered of a document signed by Dickinson wherein he agreed to hold the surety company harmless against any loss which the company might suffer under its bond and evidence that Dickinson was the owner of one-half of the stock in the corporation sued as L. P. Swayne Companies. No evidence was offered tending to prove that the loss was the result of fraud, dishonesty, or wilful misapplication on the part of the employee.

The jury having returned its verdict in favor of the defendant Dickinson, we must consider the appeal from that portion of the judgment in the light of a finding against the evidence produced by the plaintiff in reference to that defendant. On this appeal the appellant seeks to charge Dickinson upon three different theories: First, as a partner in The General Agency; second, as an indemnitor of the surety company; and third, upon his statutory stockholder's liability.

[1] The only evidence which the plaintiff offered tending to prove that Dickinson was personally a partner in the General Agency was the conclusion of the witness De Camp. This testimony was contradicted in so many different ways that it is unnecessary to say more at this time than that the evidence demonstrated that that partnership was composed of De Camp and the L. P. Swayne Companies, a corporation, and that Dickinson was a stockholder in the latter corporation, but that he at no time participated as an individual in the business of the partnership. The uncorroborated statement of De Camp that Dickinson was a partner does not create a substantial conflict with the undisputed evidence which shows the exact composition of the partnership. The finding of the jury on this issue was supported by all the competent evidence and cannot be disturbed.

[2, 3] The undertaking which Dickinson gave to the surety company was to pay the surety company all loss "which it may sustain or incur, or for which it may become liable by reason of having executed said bond. * * *" This was not an undertaking to pay the original debt or for the performance of the obligation; it was merely an undertaking to repay to the surety such sum as the surety might be compelled to pay by reason of its obligation. Hence there could be no breach of Dickinson's bond until the surety had paid something on its bond. The bond of Dickinson was not therefore one for the benefit of the creditor upon which the creditor might sue within the rule declared in section 2854, Civil Code. 13 Cal. Jur. p. 1003; Goff v. Ladd, 161 Cal. 257, 259, 118 P. 792.

[4] The appellant cannot urge the stockholder's liability of Dickinson because he did not tender that issue to the trial court. The complaint alleged that De Camp, Dickinson, Lawrence P. Swayne, and John Doe were copartners doing business under the name of the General Agency. It also alleged that L. P. Swayne Companies was a corporation. It then alleged that De Camp, Dickinson, Swayne, and others "were copartners doing business under the name of L. P. Swayne Company." It then alleged that all the defendants other than the surety company were partners doing business under the name of the General Agency. This allegation was concealed in the third cause of action, and was repudiated by appellant when the evidence was tendered to the jury. Throughout the trial appellant contended that the General Agency was a partnership composed of De Camp, L. P. Swayne, and Dickinson. Dickinson contended that the partnership was composed of De Camp and the L. P. Swayne Companies, a corporation. The appellant controverted this evidence, and now, for the first time, takes the position that it was a fact admitted in the pleadings. The jury returned its verdict against De Camp, "L. P. Swayne Companies," and the General Agency. By this the jury meant the L. P. Swayne Companies, a corporation; but there was no cause of action stated against that corporation except that based on the surety bond and pleaded in the third count, and hence no cause against Dickinson as a stockholder therein. The fourth count is but a skeleton of a pleading which does not begin to state facts upon which a stockholder's liability could be enforced under the Code sections then controlling.

[5-7] The appeal from the order granting a new trial to the surety company does not present any difficulty. The bond upon which appellant relies undertook to pay any pecuniary loss which the employer might sustain "by any act or acts of fraud, dishonesty, forgery, theft, embezzlement, wrongful abstraction or wilful misapplication of funds on the part of said The General Agency." There was no evidence of any nature tending to prove that loss was sustained through any one of these acts, and of course the burden was upon the appellant to prove that he came within the terms of the bond. In his opening brief the appellant discussed the rules of law applicable, but did not print any evidence in support of the issue. This respondent challenged the appellant to show any evidence showing fraud, wrongful abstraction, or willful misapplication of any funds by the General Agency, and directed our attention to the evidence of the course of business of the employer and the employee which it claims negatives any inference of dishonesty in the handling of the funds by the General Agency, and placed the parties in the simple relation of debtor and creditor. The appellant ignores the challenge in his reply brief, and again fails to give us any reference to any evidence which tends to support this issue. At great length he argues that the agency mingled with its own funds premiums collected for its principal and used these funds in furthering its own business. But there is no evidence supporting either claim. In one portion of his brief appellant relies on the opening statement of counsel for Dickinson as evidence of these facts. At that time counsel said: "The evidence I think will show * * * that the entire efforts of The General Agency were devoted toward furthering the interests of The State Assurance Company, * * * and that every dollar that was taken in from any source whatsoever was spent, not in speculation, * * * but actually spent in furthering the business of The General Agency, and also the business of The General Agency * * * was the business of The State Assurance Company." Though this statement of counsel was not binding upon the surety company, it nevertheless falls far short of being evidence of fraud, misappropriation, or misapplication of funds on the part of the General Agency.

[8,9] There is nothing which we have found in the record which discloses more than a common relation of debtor and creditor between the parties. The bond was not given to guarantee full performance by the agency under the contract. It was a bond of limited liability, limited to loss through fraud or similar acts. Fraud is not to be presumed, but, on the contrary, the presumption is against fraud. The authorities uniformly hold that there is no liability under a bond of this character, in absence of proof of the acts designated in the bond. 25 O. J. 1093, 1094. As there was no proof to support the verdict against the surety company, the trial court properly granted its motion for a new trial.

The judgment and order are both affirmed.

By a grand jury indictment of three counts the defendant was charged with the offense of forgery of indorsement and with two separate acts of grand theft. Count I charged him with forgery of indorsement of the name of Alta B. Vail to a certain draft or check in the sum of $1,800.63 with the intent to defraud her and the Security First National Bank and the United States First National Bank of Los Angeles. Count II accused defendant of the theft of the $1,800.63 represented by the said check from said United States First National Bank; and count III alleged that he stole the check itself from the said Alta B. Vail. He was convicted by a jury of the offenses charged in the first and third counts, but was acquitted as to the second. From these judgments of conviction and the order denying his motion for a new trial the defendant prosecutes this appeal.

The prosecution in order to support the various allegations of the information was required to rely upon the testimony of the prosecuting witness, Alta B. Brierton, the wife of the defendant. Her testimony, which is somewhat unusual, pertinent to the inquiry here, discloses the following facts: At the times alleged in the indictment Mrs. Brierton, who was employed as a school teacher under her maiden name of Alta B. Vail, and the defendant, were residing together in the city of Los Angeles. Although living under the same roof their relations were not cordial, and they infrequently discussed business and money matters. In August, 1930, she determined to close her account with the Security First National Bank, and received from it the said cashier's check in which she was designated payee by the name of Alta B. Vail. The check, which represented her own personal property acquired by inheritance, was placed by her in a closet of their home for safe-keeping. Several weeks later upon the discovery of its disappearance and after a thorough search over a course of several days, she notified the bank of that fact and requested it to investigate the matter. She neither gave the check to defendant nor authorized him to indorse her name thereto. Nor was the defendant given permission to use the money represented by the check, and no part of its proceeds were, to her knowledge, ever turned over to her at any time by him. Also, she testified that during the fall and winter of 1930, "he never gave me any money."

It is undisputed that the defendant took the check, and during the month of October, 1930, upon indorsing his wife's name to the same, he deposited it to his own credit in an account with the United States Bank, from whence the money so derived was disbursed by him. The check or draft was received in due course and paid by the Security First National Bank, which was compelled to reimburse Mrs. Brierton for its value by reason of the alleged false indorsement.

The defense of the defendant was that his wife agreed to allow him to cash the draft and use the proceeds in the purchase of a sales contract for a shaving preparation. While the defendant was on the stand, and during his direct examination, his counsel asked him the following question: "For what purpose did you use that money?" The court sustained a general objection by the prosecution to this question. Thereafter defendant's counsel made the following offer of proof: "At this time I make an offer to show by this witness, by this question, that he thereafter disbursed the money he had on account for living expenses and for certain moneys which he turned over to Mrs. Brierton," to which the prosecution's general objection was likewise sustained. The appellant claims that these rulings constituted prejudicial error.

[1] The theory of defendant's question and offer was that the proof so offered would indicate an absence of the felonious intent required to constitute either the crime of forgery (People v. Turner, 113 Cal. 278, 45 P. 331), or of grand theft (People v. Eastman, 77 Cal. 171, 19 P. 266). The rulings excepted to were prejudicial. "A witness may be examined as to the intent with which he did a certain act, where that intent is a material thing in the action." People v. Morley, 89 Cal. App. 451, 457, 265 P. 276, 279, citing cases.

The defendant, on cross-examination, testified, however, that $1,000 of the check was required and used in his business, and to the question next asked: "And you kept on using the balance for household expenses?" He answered: "Yes."

[2] But even if the court erred in the exclusion of the testimony relative to the disbursement for living expenses on his direct examination, such error was rendered harmless where the same evidence was fully covered by the cross-examination of the defendant above quoted. People v. Singh, 78 Cal. App. 476, 248 P. 981.

[3] The evidence tendered by defendant, however, that he gave a portion of the proceeds of the check to his wife, was not covered by other testimony, and consequently its exclusion does not come within the saving grace of the rule first announced in People v. Singh, supra. The erroneous ruling of the trial court debarred the defendant from fully proving his defense by depriving him of the right to completely overcome the inference of felonious intent established by his wife's testimony. It also prevented him from contradicting her statement that, during the period in question, he never gave his wife any money. The effect of such an explanation might have turned the scale and led the jury to acquit the defendant of the remaining offenses charged in the information, the gravamen of which affects the property of his spouse alone. For the foregoing reasons, we are of the opinion that the court's refusal to permit the defendant to introduce the evidence so offered constituted reversible error. People v. Blake, 65 Cal. 275, 4 P. 1; People v. Morley, supra.

We find no other error in the record; but for the error above stated, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Dissenting Opinion June 10, 1933.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court July 31, 1933.

Application for writ of prohibition prayed to be directed to the Superior Court, of Santa Clara County, William F. James, Judge, to prevent further action in a contempt proceeding.

Thos. V. Cassidy, of Huntington Park, and Paul Nourse, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM.

Petition for writ of review and prohibition denied.

KNIGHT, Justice (dissenting).

The facts set forth in the petition herein, in my judgment, are legally sufficient to call for a hearing on the merits; consequently I dissent from the order denying the same. The main purpose of the proceeding was to prohibit the superior court of Santa Clara county from taking any further action against petitioner in a contempt proceeding growing out of her refusal to surrender the custody of her two minor children, aged 12 and 10 years, respectively, to the father, as directed by an ex parte order theretofore made by said court in a proceeding instituted by the father for the purpose of depriving the mother of the custody of said children.

It appears from the petition filed in the present proceeding and from the copies of the court documents attached thereto that the parties formerly resided in Arizona, and that in December, 1931, the courts of that state granted the mother of the children a decree of absolute divorce from her husband. The decree was filed and docketed in June, 1932, and about the same time, in a proceeding in habeas corpus instituted by the father, the courts of that state awarded her the sole and exclusive custody of the children, after having found that the father had willfully violated the terms of a previous order, made in the same proceeding, by taking the children out of that state, secreting them in California, and refusing to return them to their mother as directed in said previous order. It further appears that at the time the father instituted the proceeding in Santa Clara county the children were residing in Los Angeles county, pursuant to permission granted by the Arizona courts in the order made in said habeas corpus proceeding, and that at no time had the mother or the children ever resided or even been in the county of Santa Clara.

The proceeding instituted in Santa Clara county purports to be based on section 214 of the Civil Code. Following the filing of the application and on the same day the court granted an ex parte order directing that pending the hearing of the application the custody of the children be turned over to their father. A week later an amended ex parte order was made to the same effect, directing further that the sheriff of Los Angeles county "forthwith obtain the bodies and persons" of said children and place or deliver them "into the immediate personal possession and custody" of their father. The mother refused to surrender the children as directed by said ex parte order, and thereupon she was cited to appear and show cause why she should not be punished for contempt.

Said section 214 of the Civil Code reads as follows: "When a husband and wife live in a state of separation, without being divorced, any court of competent jurisdiction, upon application of either, if an inhabitant of this state, may inquire into the custody of any unmarried minor child of the marriage, and may award the custody of such child to either, for such time and under such regulations as the case may require. The decision of the court must be guided by the rules prescribed in section two hundred and forty-six." As will be noted, before the authority granted to the court thereunder may be ex-exercised, the following jurisdictional facts must appear: First, that the husband and wife are living in a state of separation "without being divorced"; second, that the court is one of "competent jurisdiction," meaning, of course, one having jurisdiction over the parties; and, third, that the applicant is an inhabitant of this state. In the present case none of these jurisdictional facts affirmatively appear either in the application itself or in the ex parte order made pursuant thereto. It is alleged in said application, as a conclusion of law, that the applicant and the mother of the children "are married and not legally divorced" (emphasis added), but no facts whatever are set forth to support the conclusion that they are "not legally divorced"; and, even though facts to that effect were alleged, they would constitute nothing more than a pure collateral attack upon the validity of the divorce; and, of course, unless the decree of divorce were void on its face, an issue of that kind could not be heard or determined in a proceeding brought under the provisions of said code section. Secondly, there is no allegation whatever in the application nor any finding to the effect that the children or either of the parents at any time ever resided in or were inhabitants of the county of Santa Clara; and, in view of an entire absence of such allegations or findings as to these essential elements, it is not clear upon what legal ground the superior court of that county assumed jurisdiction over the custody of the children.

Moreover, and aside from these apparent jurisdictional defects in the court proceedings, said Code section contains no provision whatever, either express or implied, vesting the court with authority to make any order, ex parte or otherwise, for the change of the custody of the children pending the hearing of a proceeding instituted thereunder. It is extremely doubtful, therefore, whether the Legislature ever intended that any such authority should be exercised in a proceeding instituted thereunder; and the facts of this particular case as they are shown by the record before us would seem to furnish strong reasons for concluding that it never was so intended.

It may be that the mother would be afforded a right of appeal from any adverse ruling which might be made in the contempt proceedings; but it is well settled that, even though such remedy exists, prohibition will lie if the remedy by appeal be inadequate (21 Cal. Jur. 586); and, from the history of this case as it is shown by the petition herein, there would seem to be every reason to believe that such an appeal would be fruitless, because an adjudication of contempt would necessarily require the surrender of the children to the father, who, pending the appeal, would have ample opportunity to do as he did before, remove the children from the state, and thus deprive the mother of their custody.

It may be also that, if all the facts shown by the record before us were placed before the trial court at the hearing of the contempt proceedings, a different conclusion might be reached as to the custody of the children. But that is not a proper matter to be considered here, because, if the trial court exceeded its jurisdiction in making the ex parte order depriving the mother of the custody of the children, she is entitled to have the contempt proceedings based thereon permanently stayed [Pacific Coast Automobile Ass'n v. Superior Court, 121 Cal. App. 664, 9 P.(2d) 880] without being compelled to incur the expense and suffer the inconvenience of traveling from Los Angeles to Santa Clara county to present a defense in the contempt proceeding.

For the reasons stated, it seems to me that petitioner is clearly entitled to a hearing before this court in the present proceeding.

CONREY, Presiding Justice.

The defendant was convicted upon six counts charging grand theft, committed by him at the times and in the amounts following, that is to say: Count 2, August 15, 1930, $1,000; count 4, August 19, 1930, $2,000; count 24, March 2, 1931, $20,000; count 26, March 18, 1931, $15,000; count 30, April 2, 1931, $15,000; count 32, April 21, 1931, $15,000. Upon the separate verdicts returned the court rendered several judgments, which for the purposes of the appeal are treated as one judgment. The defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The sentence as pronounced by the court provides that the terms of imprisonment on counts 2, 24, and 26 shall run consecutively, and that the imprisonment on counts 4, 30, and 32 shall run concurrently with count 2. It is contended by appellant that the theft constituted only one offense; therefore that his conviction and sentence as for several different crimes is erroneous, and for that reason should be reversed.

At the time of the commission of the alleged offenses, and for a long time prior thereto, defendant was chief deputy of the county clerk of the county of Los Angeles, who by virtue of his office is clerk of the superior court. During the trial of an action in said court there were received in evidence two exhibits, consisting of two packages of $1,000 bills, amounting to a total sum of $75,000. These bills, while thus in custody of the court, came into the possession and control of the defendant. At that time the county clerk had certain rented safe deposit boxes in the First and Spring street branch of the Security-First National Bank in the city of Los Angeles, one of them being box No. 78. The county clerk and this defendant were the only persons who had keys for the box, and they were the only persons authorized to have access to the box. The carefully kept records of the bank show that the visits to this box, during the period in question here, were all made by the defendant, and that no such visits were made by the clerk. The evidence further shows that prior to the time of the alleged thefts the seventy-five bills were for safe keeping placed by the defendant in said box No. 78. Ultimately, and after the date of the latest of said alleged larcenies, it was discovered that the bills had disappeared from the box. So far as the record shows they never have been found.

The evidence tends to show that during said period of time the defendant was engaged in certain speculative transactions through a brokerage house; that in those transactions he lost large sums of money; that at various dates he paid to the broker sums of money in thousand-dollar bills. In the few instances when the broker was paid in checks on a bank where the defendant had an account, these checks were preceded by deposits of cash made in bank by the defendant. It will be noted that the total amount of the thefts of which the defendant was convicted is the sum of $68,000. In each instance the safe deposit record, and the testimony confirming such record, shows that the defendant made visits to said safe deposit box No. 78 on the same days when moneys were paid by him to the broker or were deposited by him in his bank account. All of these facts are shown in much detail by the evidence pertinent to the several counts upon which the defendant was found guilty. That he was guilty of taking the money at the several times specified, the record shows beyond any reasonable doubt.

The only real question in the case is as to whether or not there were six separate thefts or, as the defendant contends, only one theft. The defendant requested the court to give the following instruction to the jury: "You are instructed that where the property is stolen from the same owner and from the same place by a series of acts, if each taking is the result of a separate, independent impulse, each is a separate crime; but if the successive takings are all pursuant to a single, sustained, criminal impulse and in execution of a general fraudulent scheme, they together constitute a single theft, regardless of the time which may elapse between each act." In refusing to give this instruction the court said: "Refused—not involved in issues here. Money in this case came into possession of defendant lawfully. Therefore every taking from such funds, if there was such unlawful taking, constituted a separate offense."

We think that the court was right in its refusal to give said instruction. There is nothing in the evidence in any way tending to show that the defendant at any time when he abstracted from the safe deposit box some part of the money did so pursuant to any intention or plan to appropriate any sum other than the amount taken at that time. Apparently the temptation renewed itself from time to time as his speculative losses increased, and thus the successive offenses were committed. The contention now made in his behalf is a curious instance of an attempt to raise a presumption of guilt in aid of the defendant in order to reduce his punishment. The case is clearly one of successive embezzlements by a trusted custodian of funds. The defendant appears to have been given a fair trial, resulting in a conviction according to law.

The judgment is affirmed, and the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial is affirmed.

STEPHENS, Justice.

This action for damages for breach of a contract for the exchange of real estate was filed and came to issue during July, 1928. The defendants were sued as executrices of the estate of W. Q. Dickinson, deceased. W. Q. Dickinson was one of the contracting parties. The claim upon the alleged breach was filed in probate court but one day before the last possible day.

[1, 2] No action on behalf of the plaintiff appears of record before October 24, 1930, when a substitution of attorneys was filed. Soon thereafter plaintiff notified defendant that a motion to set the case would be made on the 3d day of November, 1930. What became of this motion we do not know. On January 7, 1931, defendant made his motion to dismiss on the ground that plaintiff had unreasonably delayed the prosecution of the case. This motion was granted a week later. The plaintiff appeals and sets up an affidavit in which he states that his former attorney informed him on numerous occasions that the case was delayed in trial because of the congestion of the court calendar; that shortly before he substituted attorneys he became suspicious that his attorney was not properly attending to the matter.

Respondents argue that the pendency of the action prevented the closing of the estate, and that there was no excuse for the long delay.

The question was for the sound discretion of the trial court, and it cannot be said that the recitation of the facts indicates an abuse of such discretion. We do not favor a denial of a day in court on technicalities, but this case does not show that it was such. Assuming that plaintiff was entirely innocent of blame up to the substitution of attorneys, the case then went two months before motion to dismiss was made. After the long delay under the original attorney, there should have been prompt attention insisted upon under the second one.

Judgment affirmed.

Corbet & Selby, of San Francisco, and Feemster, Perkins & McCormick, of Visalia, for appellant.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem.

This is an action brought by the respondent, a fruit grower, against appellant, Nash-De Camp Company, brokerage and commission merchants in San Francisco, engaged in shipping fruit to Eastern markets, and two individuals doing business in the firm name and style of Central Fruit Distributors, of Fresno, who were factors under contract with respondent. After the bringing of this action, the partners composing the Central Fruit Distributors were adjudged bankrupt. The trustee in bankruptcy appeared as a defendant, but made no defense. The partners, Bonzagni and Johns, constituting the old firm of Central Fruit Distributors, testified for the plaintiff, and the action resulted in a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $2,084.23 and interest, against the Nash-De Camp Company. Motion for a new trial was denied in the lower court. Appellant contends that certain material findings in the lower court were unsupported by the evidence and are clearly contrary to the evidence. The facts may be summarized as follows:

Central Fruit Distributors was a copartnership composed of Henry A. Bonzagni and A. G. Johns. They were engaged in the season of 1931, and had previously been engaged, in buying fruit and shipping same to markets, and also securing fruit for packing and shipping to Eastern markets. They had an office in Fresno and packing houses at Armona and other places in California. The Central Fruit Distributors had done considerable business with the Nash-De Camp Company, the appellant herein. On the 23d day of March, 1931, the Central Fruit Distributors made a contract with the Nash-De Camp Company in writing, in which the Central Fruit Distributors was called "shipper" and the Nash-De Camp Company "distributor." After reciting that the shipper is indebted to the distributor in the sum of $10,565.89 on account of past business, and that it was desired to protect this amount and to assist the shipper in handling its 1931 business, by providing for advances not exceeding $2,500 in connection therewith, the contract provides that the shipper shall permit the distributor to handle and market all of its 1931 shipments; that certain charges shall be paid; that the distributor may retain 7 per cent. of the selling prices to apply on past indebtedness; that advances made may be deducted from the proceeds; and that the distributor shall have a lien on all funds in its hands belonging to the shipper, for any advances and indebtedness.

[1] On April 16, 1931, the Central Fruit Distributors, as shipper, entered into a contract with C. G. De Raad, respondent herein, as grower. By this contract respondent agreed to pick and deliver to packing house of Central Fruit Distributors at Armona all apricots grown on his ranch during the year 1931. The Central Fruit Distributors agreed to market the fruit for respondent. It is apparent that under this contract the Central Fruit Distributors became a factor having a right to sell fruit in its own name after it was packed in boxes. It recites a certain commission to be paid by the grower. The evidence further shows that the Central Fruit Distributors assigned to Nash-De Camp Company the apricots during the season of 1931, as was contemplated in the contract between them first above mentioned. This fruit amounted to a total of 38,224 crates, of which a part came from respondent De Raad, but the larger part came from a number of other growers. The evidence further shows the Nash-De Camp Company shipped the fruit East and sold it and sent accounts of sale to the Central Fruit Distributors, as was contemplated by the contract between them, for each car sold. The evidence further shows that the appellant Nash-De Camp Company rendered accounts of sales to Central Fruit Distributors, and they, in turn, rendered an account of sales to respondent. Respondent delivered his fruit to Central Fruit Distributors under his contract with them. It is apparent from the evidence that Central Fruit Distributors guaranteed respondent a certain price for the fruit which was sold up to the date of about June 1, 1931. From that time on, however, the Central Fruit Distributors agreed to reduce the charge for packing as set forth in the contract, from 45 cents to 35 cents per package, and ceased guaranteeing any price. The evidence shows that from this date, about June 1, 1931, the Central Fruit Distributors rendered accounts of sale to respondent for his fruit in the last sixteen cars shipped to Nash-De Camp Company. During 1931, the Central Fruit Distributors shipped to the Nash-De Camp Company 18,134 crates of apricots belonging to respondent. The witness Johns testified that, of the total of 18,134 crates received from respondent, 5996 crates had been on guaranteed price basis, for which no claim was made in the present case by respondent against the Nash-De Camp Company, and that 12,838 crates were received by the Central Fruit Distributors on a straight consignment basis. The evidence also shows that Central Fruit Distributors had rendered accounts of sale to respondent for this fruit, and there was due respondent for this fruit $2,084 entirely unpaid.

It is undisputed that the Central Fruit Distributors never paid to the respondent any money whatever on account of the fruit involved in this action, and that they became bankrupt after this action was instituted, and no judgment, for this reason, could be obtained against the Central Fruit Distributors. When respondent did not receive his money from the Central Fruit Distributors, he made a demand upon the Nash-De Camp Company, appellant, for the net proceeds owing to him, which demand was refused, and, no payment whatever being made to respondent, this action was brought.

Appellant attacks the following findings made by the lower court, and claims that they are not only unsupported by any evidence, but are clearly contrary to the evidence:

"That * * * the proceeds of said fruit were, at the time of the commencement of this action, in an amount in excess of plaintiff's demand, actually in the hands of Nash DeCamp Company, and have never been transmitted to Central Fruit Distributors or plaintiff. * * *"

"That said Nash DeCamp Company has not accounted for or paid to Central Fruit Distributors, nor to plaintiff, the said sum of $2,084.23, nor any interest accrued or accruing thereon from and after July 15, 1931."

"That Nash DeCamp Company, at all times mentioned in said complaint, held, and still holds the net proceeds of the said fruit of plaintiff so placed with it on consignment, in excess of the demand of plaintiff as reduced at the trial, namely net proceeds in the sum of $2,084.23, together with accrued and accruing interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent per annum from and after July 15, 1931."

It appears from the evidence that during the season of 1931 appellant paid to the shipper, Central Fruit Distributors, a little more than the proceeds of all fruit delivered to the shipper, and the evidence further shows that, while some of the checks were marked as "advances" and "advances on apricots," there is nothing to show whether these advances were applied on any particular grower's fruit, and it does show that these "advances" were made largely before, and most of them considerably before the De Raad fruit was delivered. It is certain from the evidence that, when the money was received from the sales of this particular fruit, no portion of the money was sent either to respondent or to the Central Fruit Distributors. The contract between the respondent and the Central Fruit Distributors provided that the fruit should be handled for the account of the grower. The evidence shows that in the presence of the agent of appellant the grower and shipper agreed that there would be no longer any guaranty and the remainder of the fruit should be handled on a straight consignment basis. The answer admits that the appellant knew that this particular fruit of the respondent was to be handled upon a consignment basis, and the lower court so found.

The evidence shows that the appellant kept the proceeds of respondent's apricots, and, instead of paying either to respondent or respondent's agent, relied upon the fact that it had previously advanced certain sums to respondent's agent. However, these sums cannot be directly connected with the proceeds of respondent's apricots, both because they had been advanced before the apricots were shipped and sold and because they were in no way advances on respondent's particular apricots. Section 2351 of the Civil Code provides: "A subagent, lawfully appointed, represents the principal in like manner with the original agent. * * *"

[2] The question to be solved, then, is this: Where the distributor knew that the matter was being handled for this particular grower on a consignment basis and for the account of the grower, when he receives the proceeds, can he, instead of paying the proceeds to the grower, or possibly to the grower's agent or shipper, keep these particular proceeds and rely upon the fact that he has previously advanced certain money to the shipper? It must be borne in mind that the appellant had not advanced previous money as particular advances for this respondent's fruit, but to the shipper in general. It seems to us that, irrespective of any such general advances, he must account for the proceeds where the matter is handled on consignment, either to the grower or some authorized agent of the grower, and this could only be done by paying over the proceeds after they were received. It is undisputed that this was never done.

Appellant contends that a portion of the general advances made by the Nash-De Camp Company to the Central Fruit Distributors was made for and on account of the respondent, notwithstanding that the trial court has found that such is not the fact.

[3, 4] In this case the pleadings, evidence, and findings all show that the appellant had knowledge of the consignment character of the transaction with the respondent, and the respondent authorized the handling of his fruit by appellant. Thus an implied contractual relation or privity was established between the appellant and the respondent, and the appellant is not at liberty to consider the Central Fruit Distributors as the owner of the fruit. The facts of this case clearly show that there was privity between appellant and respondent. "Where, however, the employment of the subagent is authorized, a privity exists between the principal and subagent and the latter is accountable directly to the principal." 25 Corp. Jur. p. 349. While the respondent could maintain an action against the Central Fruit Distributors, and did so in this action, the Central Fruit Distributors went into bankruptcy, and nothing could be collected from them. Because of the privity of relations between respondent and appellant, respondent could likewise recover from the one who actually had the net proceeds in his possession; namely, the Nash-De Camp Company, appellant herein. The net proceeds constitute a trust fund to which the respondent was justly entitled. Bills v. Schliep (C. C. A.) 127 F. 103, and Union Stock-Yards Nat. Bank v. Gillespie, 137 U. S. 411, 11 S. Ct. 118, 34 L. Ed. 724.

There being ample evidence to sustain each of the findings attacked by the appellant, it necessarily follows that the judgment must be affirmed. It is so ordered.

DIGGS v. ARNOLD BROS., Inc.
Civ. 4792.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

June 9, 1933.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court
Aug. 7, 1933.

1. Appeal and error ⇨931(1).

Appellate court must accept as true all evidence tending to support trial court's finding and consider all inferences reasonably leading to same conclusion.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1010(1).

Evidence in record, logically leading to trial court's conclusion requires that such finding be upheld on appeal.

3. Malicious prosecution ⇨56.

Burden is on plaintiff in action for malicious prosecution to show lack of probable cause for defendant to file charge against plaintiff.

4. Malicious prosecution ⇨18(1).

Whether defendant in action for malicious prosecution had probable cause to file charge against plaintiff depends on defendant's knowledge when proceeding was instituted.

5. Malicious prosecution ⇨64(2).

Evidence held sufficient to support trial court's finding in action for malicious prosecution that defendant maliciously and without probable cause caused plaintiff to be charged with grand theft.

6. Malicious prosecution ⇨56.

Advice of counsel is affirmative defense, burden of establishing which rests on defendant in action for malicious prosecution.

7. Malicious prosecution ⇨56.

Burden was on defendant, urging advice of counsel as defense to action for malicious prosecution, to show that defendant fully and fairly stated all facts to attorney and was then advised by latter that plaintiff had committed crime.

8. Malicious prosecution ⇨64(2).

Advice of counsel held not established as defense to action for malicious prosecution of automobile dealer on charge of stealing automobile, where defendant's credit manager did not inform attorneys of plaintiff's claim that car was sold on open account and none of them testified as to facts told them or advice given, except district attorney, who testified that he was not told all facts.

9. Malicious prosecution ⇨64(1).

Evidence in action for malicious prosecution held to show that defendant's agent acted within scope of authority in procuring plaintiff's arrest.

10. Malicious prosecution ⇨42.

Person having custody of another's property has no implied authority to take steps to punish one he supposes to have done something criminal with reference thereto.

11. Malicious prosecution ⇨69.

Verdict for plaintiff in action for malicious prosecution will not usually be disturbed as excessive, unless amount is so large as to be presumptively result of passion or prejudice.

12. Malicious prosecution ⇨62.

In determining amount of damages for malicious prosecution, court may consider parties' character and position and all circumstances attending transaction.

13. Malicious prosecution ⇨62.

Newspaper articles are admissible in action for malicious prosecution to prove damage caused.

14. Malicious prosecution ☞69.

Award of $3,000 to business man of good reputation and credit for malicious prosecution on charge of grand theft, published in newspapers of wide circulation, held not excessive.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by Jackson Diggs against Arnold Bros., Incorporated. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Ralph H. Lewis, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Charles A. Wetmore, Jr., and Ralph O. Marron, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

Mr. Presiding Justice PULLEN delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an appeal from a judgment of the superior court sitting without a jury by which plaintiff was awarded damages for $3,000 against defendant for the malicious prosecution of plaintiff upon a charge of grand theft.

For several years prior to the time here involved plaintiff had been engaged in farming and fruit raising and was also a dealer in motorcars operating under a contract with the Hudson Motor Car Company in and adjacent to the city of Marysville. This district lay within the territory of Arnold Bros., Inc., which was the distributor in Northern California of the products of the Hudson Motor Car Company. Under the agreement between the parties, Diggs was obligated to purchase for his trade new Hudson-Essex cars through this distributing agency.

In the month of March, 1930, an automobile show was being held in Marysville, and, in order to stimulate the sales of their particular cars in that territory, Arnold Bros., Inc., participated therein, and placed in their exhibit a certain car known as a Sun sedan. At the conclusion of the show the car was left with the Diggs agency to sell, and in a few days thereafter the car was sold through the branch agency of respondent in Oroville. The car was sold on deferred payments and the contract assigned to a finance company, and the money received thereby deposited to the account of respondent, but no remittance was ever made to Arnold Bros., Inc.

The Marysville office of respondent was in charge of one Holtman, who negotiated the transaction and through whom the various steps necessary to close the deal were taken.

It is apparent from the record that respondent had nothing to do personally with the sale of the car, nor did he personally receive any of the proceeds from the sale thereof, nor execute nor receive any of the papers connected with the passing of the title or evidence of payment.

Respondent testified he did not know of the sale of the car until at least six weeks thereafter, and did not know that Arnold Bros., Inc., had not been paid therefor for at least two months after the delivery to the purchaser.

Early in July, 1930, the nonpayment was called to the attention of respondent and at that time he delivered to Arnold Bros., Inc., a postdated check for the amount due, payable July 20. On July 19, his business and bank account were attached by Holtman and proceedings in involuntary bankruptcy were later filed against him and the check was never paid.

In October, 1930, a verified claim was filed by Arnold Bros., Inc., in the bankruptcy proceedings sworn to by J. H. Arnold, president and treasurer of defendant corporation, in which claim it was set forth that respondent was indebted to Arnold Bros., Inc., in the sum of $1,539.27, for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered to the bankrupt on an open book account. Aside from approximately $200 due for parts, no other unliquidated transaction than the Sun sedan deal was established between the parties within the time specified.

On July 3, 1931, a criminal complaint charging grand theft of the automobile in question was sworn to by A. M. Gardner, credit manager for Arnold Bros., Inc., and a warrant issued thereon under which respondent was arrested and held until released by the posting of bail. Thereafter, before any hearing on the complaint, the district attorney of Butte county, on his own motion, caused the complaint to be dismissed. Respondent then caused this action to be filed, which resulted in the recovery of damages as above stated. The matter now comes before us on appeal from that judgment.

Appellant attacks the judgment claiming that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings in that there is no evidence of lack of probable cause; that the credit manager who swore to the complaint acted in good faith upon advice of counsel; that the credit manager was not acting in the scope of his employment when he swore to the complaint; and that the damages are excessive.

[1, 2] In examining the sufficiency of the evidence to support a questioned finding, an appellate court must accept as true all evidence tending to establish the correctness of the finding as made, taking into account, as well, all inferences which might reasonably have been thought by the trial court to lead to the same conclusion. We shall not attempt to recite testimony showing perhaps appellant had probable cause to believe and act as it did, but all that is required is to point out testimony, which, if given credence by the trial court, would logically lead to the conclusion that appellant acted without probable cause in filing the charge against respondent. If such evidence is in the record, the finding of the court must be upheld. Bancroft-Whitney Co. v. McHugh, 166 Cal. 140, 134 P. 1157.

Let us then in the light of that rule direct our examination to the testimony in the record bearing upon the question of probable cause. The finding of the court was that "said defendant Arnold Brothers, Inc., a corporation, then and there maliciously intending to injure the plaintiff in his good name and reputation, caused a complaint to be filed * * * and maliciously and without any probable cause whatsoever, caused plaintiff to be charged" etc.

[3,4] The burden rests upon the plaintiff in an action such as this to show lack of probable cause in the defendant (16 Cal. Jur., 737), and is measured by the state of defendant's knowledge at the time the proceeding was instituted.

[5] The automobile which respondent was charged with having feloniously sold was, according to the affidavit filed by the president of the appellant corporation, in the bankruptcy proceedings some nine months prior to the institution of the criminal proceeding, sold to him on an open book account. The bookkeeper of respondent also testified that the account concerning the automobile in question was carried on the books of the Jackson Diggs Agency as an open account.

When we realize that the car in question was sold March 25, 1930, that the claim was filed in the bankruptcy court October 18, 1930, and that the complaint for grand theft of the car was not filed until July 3, 1931, the trial court was undoubtedly impressed with the long delay in determining that a criminal act had been committed.

The only witness who attempted at all to connect Jackson Diggs with the receipt of the money was the witness Holtman, who placed the attachment upon the business of Diggs, and according to the evidence, then attempted to purchase the claims against the company for 50 cents on the dollar in order to take over the business, which he subsequently did, and at the time of the trial was an agent of appellant corporation, selling Hudson-Exsex cars in Marysville. The trial court may have considered this witness as not entirely impartial in his testimony. On the other hand, it was testified by various witnesses that Diggs had nothing to do with the sale of the car in question, received none of the proceeds personally, had no dealing with Arnold Bros., Inc., regarding the sale of the car until he delivered his check in July, and upon whom, the record discloses, no demand for payment of any kind was ever made until July, when he gave his postdated check.

At the time the complaint was requested by the credit manager for appellant, no statement, according to the testimony of the district attorney and of his secretary, was made regarding any bankruptcy claim having been filed by Arnold Bros., Inc., in the estate of Jackson Diggs. We also must bear in mind that numerous character witnesses were called for the plaintiff, all of whom testified to the reputation of the plaintiff for truth, honesty, and integrity in the vicinity in which he had lived and carried on his business for many years.

[6,7] We next come to the second point urged by appellant as a defense to the action; that is, advice of counsel. The defense of advice of counsel is an affirmative one, and therefore the burden of establishing such defense rests upon the defendant, and the testimony adduced must be examined in that light to ascertain if the burden has been met. It here devolved upon appellant to show that it stated to the attorney fully and fairly all of the facts of the case and that after statement of all of such facts, it was advised by such attorney that a crime had been committed.

[8] In the recent case of Burke v. Watts, 188 Cal. 118, 204 P. 578, 581, the court was considering a case where it did not affirmatively appear that all of the facts were stated to the attorney, the court saying: "Touching the defense that appellant proceeded, not on his own judgment, but on the advice of the district attorney, we have referred to the evidence that appellant did not inform the district attorney that respondent was claiming title to the beds, and it was not shown that the district attorney had learned of such claim from any other source. The jury would therefore be justified in finding that the statement given to the district attorney, upon which he based his advice to appellant, in the first instance, did not constitute a full and fair recital of the facts. Under such circumstances the opinion of the district attorney could not be relied on to establish probable cause for the prosecution."

So in the instant case it appears that Gardner, credit manager for appellant, did not inform any of the attorneys whom he consulted that Diggs claimed the car had been sold on open account and that this fact was substantiated by a verified statement of the president and manager of the appellant.

In the case of Murphy v. Davids, 181 Cal. 706, 186 P. 143, the court there held that the defendant may not testify he honestly stated all the facts to his counsel, for it is a question for the court to determine, whether he did in fact honestly state all of the facts to counsel.

Not one of the various counsel to whom the officers of appellant allege they stated the facts of the case were placed upon the witness stand to testify as to what facts were told them or what advice, if any, was given, with the exception of the district attorney of Butte county, who testified that he was not told all of the facts in the case, and that, when he later learned of certain facts not told him by Gardner, he caused the complaint to be dismissed.

[9, 10] Appellant next questions the authority of Gardner, its credit manager, to cause the complaint against Diggs on a charge of grand theft to be issued. It is admitted that Gardner was the credit manager and employee of Arnold Bros., Inc., and had been for about six years. About a month before the criminal complaint was filed he was instructed by the secretary of the appellant corporation "to take it (Diggs file) over and investigate it and see if there was anything that could be done to collect any portion of the money."

Having in view the length of time elapsed between the filing of the claim in bankruptcy, that is October 18, 1930, and the filing of the criminal complaint, that is, July 3, 1931, the court may well have assumed that during that time appellant was waiting to see what amount, if any, would be recovered through bankruptcy, and then, despairing of getting the full amount of the claim by that means, adopted the all too common practice of credit men of resorting to the criminal courts to coerce debtors into making further payments.

None of the officers of the corporation, so far as it appears in the record, either before or during the trial, disavowed the acts of their credit manager. On the other hand, we find certain letters to the district attorney of Butte county from the corporation referring directly to such a criminal proceeding. It therefore not only appears that the agent Gardner in procuring Diggs' arrest was acting within the scope of his authority, but it further appears from the evidence, and the inference is to be drawn therefrom, his action in procuring the arrest was instigated and ratified by appellant. The rule seems to be clearly expressed in the case of Allen v. London, etc., Railway Co., L. R. 6 Q. B. 65: "There is a marked distinction between an act done for the purpose of protecting the property by preventing a felony or of recovering it back, and an act done for the purpose of punishing the offender for that which has already been done. There is no implied authority in a person having the custody of property to take such steps as he thinks fit to punish a person who he supposes has done something with reference to the property which he has not done. The act of punishing the offender is not anything done with reference to the property, it is done merely for the purpose of vindicating justice."

[11-14] Finally appellant assigns as a point for reversal that the damages awarded by the court are excessive. In a case of this kind there is no inflexible rule by which the amount of damages to be awarded can be determined. A verdict will not usually be disturbed as excessive unless the amount is so large as to be presumptively the result of passion or prejudice. In determining the amount of damages the court may consider the character and position of the parties and all of the circumstances attending the transaction. Newspaper articles are admissible in evidence for the purpose of proving the damage caused; such publication being a consequence in the ordinary and natural course of events for which defendant is answerable. We quote from the opinion of the trial judge, which indicates clearly the facts which led him to reach the conclusion he did as to the amount involved, all being elements properly to be weighed and considered in determining the amount, if any, to be awarded as damages:

"The plaintiff, Jackson Diggs, had been in business in and around the city of Marysville for a number of years, and according to the manager of one of the leading banks of Marysville held a splendid reputation as a business man and a fine credit therefor. That he has sustained damages there is no question. It is not altogether simply the trouble of coming from the city of Piedmont, California, to Oroville to surrender to the sheriff under the warrant of arrest, but the great damage to this plaintiff lies in having it notoriously published in the newspapers of wide and general circulation that he was charged with grand theft, which must necessarily have injured him to considerable damage and from the fact that no amount of money paid him at this time can take away from him the stain of being charged as a thief, but the only way the law can in any manner recompense him would be by money judgment, which in our opinion, and we now find to be, the sum of $3,000.00."

We fail to find any reason for a reversal of the judgment, and the same is therefore affirmed.

3. Bankruptcy ⇨303(5).

In action by trustee in bankruptcy to quiet title to 100 tons of baled hay alleged to have been sold by bankrupt to creditor, evidence held to support finding that no title passed to creditor (Civ. Code, § 3440).

Evidence disclosed that attempted sale of 100 tons of hay was made May 17, 1929, which hay was yet to be cut and baled, and was to be paid for July 17, 1929. By October, 1929, all 100 tons were in debtor's barn, and creditor did nothing to take possession of hay until February, 1930, and debtor exercised control over hay and sold some of it.

Action by Earl W. Westcott, as trustee in bankruptcy of the bankrupt estate of Robert Curtis Kitchel, a bankrupt, against P. G. Nixon. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem.

The plaintiff, as trustee in bankruptcy of the bankrupt estate of Robert Curtis Kitchel, a bankrupt, began this action to quiet title to one hundred tons of baled alfalfa hay, and also to recover certain alleged preference payments and also to quiet title to an order for approximately $100. In the first cause of action it is alleged that on the 2d day of January, 1930, Kitchel indorsed and delivered to Nixon, in payment of past indebtedness, an order in the sum of $308 drawn on the Globe Grain & Milling Company by Kitchel; that Kitchel was bankrupt at the time and Nixon knew or had reasonable cause to know the fact. The second count alleges that on the 10th day of December, 1929, Kitchel, under similar circumstances, gave Nixon a personal check on the Bank of Italy for $300. The third count alleges that on the 4th day of February, 1930, under similar circumstances, Kitchel assigned an account of $107.94 on the Globe Grain & Milling Company to Nixon; that Nixon had not received the money; and prays that the plaintiff's title to the same be quieted. The fourth count alleges that on the 25th day of July, 1929, Kitchel sold and attempted to transfer to Nixon one hundred tons of alfalfa hay, but retained possession and control thereof. The trial court entered judgment for plaintiff on each count, found payment as alleged in the first cause of action, and that about the time that P. G. Nixon was familiar with the above-mentioned circumstances of said Robert C. Kitchel, and knew, or had reasonable cause to believe, that said Robert C. Kitchel was insolvent and unable to pay his debts as they became due, and adjudged the payment a preference. A similar finding was made as to the $300 personal check and the order on the Globe Grain & Milling Company, for the rest of the money that was owing him; the total being $107.94. On February 12, 1930, Kitchel filed his petition in bankruptcy and was thereafter adjudicated a bankrupt.

[1] The question of the existence of reasonable cause to believe that a preference would be effected, is a question of fact, and each case must be determined from an independent investigation of the facts. Remington on Bankruptcy, vol. 4, § 1820; 7 C. J. p. 152. In Re McDonald & Sons (D. C.) 178 F. 487, 492, the court says: "Positive proof of collusion between debtor and creditor, by which one may be preferred, is not generally to be expected, and for that reason, among others, the law allows a resort to circumstances as the means of ascertaining the truth, and the rule of evidence is well settled that circumstances inconclusive if separately considered may by their joint operation, especially when corroborated by moral coincidences, be sufficient."

[2] In the case of Sundheim v. Ridge Avenue Bank (D. C.) 138 F. 951, 953, the court says: "Reasonable cause to believe that it was intended to give a preference does not require proof that the defendant had either actual knowledge or actual belief, but only such surrounding circumstances as would lead an ordinarily prudent business man to conclude that a preference was intended." By the weight of authority, the test is: What inference would an ordinary business man draw from the facts? The facts that were before the trial court may be briefly summarized as follows: In December, 1928, Nixon agreed to furnish Kitchel money, the arrangement first being that he would loan the money on the hay, and finally, according to the testimony of Kitchel, culminated with Nixon taking an option on the hay. At that time Nixon knew that Kitchel was running a ranch and had to have money to pay his rent, labor, and power bills. Nixon kept in touch with Kitchel during the months following their first business transaction, and finally, in September, Nixon advanced Kitchel four hundred dollars in two separate checks. In the latter part of November, Kitchel and Nixon discussed an arrangement whereby Kitchel purchased a one-half interest in Nixon's dairy herd; about the 1st of December, 1929, Nixon made an agreement with Kitchel to sell him a one-half interest in his dairy for $3,250, first payment to be made within a month or six weeks. The initial payment was supposed to be $1,500, but Kitchel could not pay this amount and about December 16th, Kitchel paid $300. Kitchel told Nixon he could apply the rest of the money coming from the cotton gin as he had considerable money coming, but Nixon, upon investigation of the cotton gin, found Kitchel was not telling him the truth, and, in fact, there was very little money coming to Kitchel, and it was impossible for Kitchel to meet the balance of the payments on account of the purchase price of one-half interest in the dairy herd. The evidence further shows that Kitchel could not carry out his agreement to buy the cattle, and Nixon terminated Kitchel's contract and put Kitchel to work on his ranch at $100 per month. This occurred on or about January 1, 1930. Thus it appears conclusively that Nixon, by his investigation prior to January 1, 1930, knew of Kitchel's financial condition. Nixon received payment of $308 in January in the course of business, by a check or by cash left by the order on the cotton gin, and February 4th, eight days before Kitchel went into bankruptcy, Nixon took from him an order for all the money that Kitchel had coming from the cotton gin. The evidence shows that the payment of $300 made by Kitchel about December 15th, on account of sale of cattle, was a payment on a previous indebtedness and not a cash transaction as contended by appellant. Further, as the court says in the case of In re John Morrow & Co. (D. C.) 134 F. 686, 688: "A sale of goods to be paid for in 10 or 30 days is not, in fact, a cash transaction, and cannot, by agreement of the parties, or a usage of merchants, be regarded as such within the meaning of the bankrupt law [11 USCA]." It appears from the record that appellant Nixon, in testifying at the trial in the lower court, endeavored to evade answering some of the material questions propounded by counsel, and in such cases the trial courts particularly have an opportunity to draw conclusions from the attitude and actions of a witness while on the stand, which conclusions, in many instances, are of decided assistance to the court in determining questions at issue. It is apparent from the record that there is ample evidence to sustain the trial court's findings on the first three causes of action.

[3] In reference to the fourth cause of action of the plaintiff's complaint, the court found: "* * * On the 25th day of July, 1929, the said Robert Curtis Kitchel transferred, or attempted to transfer, the title of said personal property, to-wit, said approximately one hundred tons of baled alfalfa hay * * * to the defendant, P. G. Nixon; that said transfer, or attempted transfer or sale of said personal property to said P. G. Nixon * * * was not accompanied by immediate delivery or transfer or possession of said personal property, and that there followed said transfer or attempted transfer or sale no actual or continued change of possession of said personal property but on the contrary the said Robert Curtis Kitchel continued at all times in control and in possession of said personal property up to the date of his adjudication as a bankrupt and that no public notice whatever by recording or otherwise was given of the transfer or attempted transfer or sale thereof to the said defendant P. G. Nixon."

Appellant challenges the sufficiency of the evidence to support the finding. In the case of Hassell v. Bunge, 167 Cal. 365, 139 P. 800, 801, the court says: "* * * Change of possession is a question of fact to be determined by the trial court or jury upon a consideration of all of the evidence. The finding upon this, as upon other issues of fact, is conclusive on appeal, unless, reading the evidence in the light and with the inferences most favorable to the conclusion reached below, the appellate court can say that that conclusion is without substantial support in the record."

Briefly summarized, the evidence shows that there was an attempted sale of one hundred tons of hay about May 17, 1929, and that the purchase price was payable by July 17, 1929. The hay was yet to be cut and baled at that time, but there was at least sixty-one tons of hay in the barn by July 26, 1929, and by October there was one hundred and six tons in the barn. That the appellant did nothing to take possession of said hay, nor did he exercise any control over the hay between the 26th day of July, 1929, and the following February. On the other hand, there is evidence that the vendor,

PEOPLE v. HENRY.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 13, 1933.

Kitchel, had repeatedly exercised control over the hay, and had even sold hay out of the very pile appellant now contends was hay set aside for him. Thus the evidence clearly shows that the hay was not delivered immediately, but, on the contrary, remained in the barn of the vendor for a period of some six months or more after the sale, and the appellant made no visible effort to take delivery, or exercise any control over it.

Unless, as a matter of law, there was some reason for the contrary, the delivery of the hay should have been actual, apparent, and not constructive, and the transfer, possession, or control of the hay by the transferee should be continuous, and so open and unequivocal as to carry with it the usual marks and indication of ownership. Section 3440, Civ. Code.

[4] The mere fact that the crop was yet to be grown is no justification for the failure to deliver it immediately upon the hay being cut and baled, for while property not in existence at the time of the sale cannot be the subject of the rule of immediate delivery, nevertheless, when the property comes into existence, the delivery must be made at once. Sequeira v. Collins, 153 Cal. 426, 95 P. 876; 12 Cal. Jur. 1009.

It cannot be said, as a matter of law, that the appellant used due diligence in taking possession and control of the hay, when he allowed it to remain at the place of sale and under the possession and control of the vendor the long period of time that he did in the instant case.

"Growing crops are not susceptible of manual delivery until harvested and are not in the possession or control of a vendor so as to require an immediate change of delivery upon sale. When, however, the crop is harvested the vendee must take immediate possession and retain the same under penalty of having the transfer voided at the instance of creditors." 12 Cal. Jur. 1005. This rule is supported by Crocker v. Cunningham, 122 Cal. 547, 55 P. 404; Davis v. McFarlane, 37 Cal. 634, 99 Am. Dec. 340; O'Brien v. Bal-lou, 116 Cal. 318, 48 P. 130.

Reading the evidence in the light of the inferences most favorable to the conclusion reached by the trial court, we cannot say that the finding is without substantial support in the record. It follows that the attempted transfer of the personal property to appellant in this action was conclusively presumed to be fraudulent, and therefore void against nonassenting creditors. Civ. Code, § 3440.

Let the judgment of the lower court be affirmed. It is so ordered.

HENDERSON, Justice pro tem.

The defendant was charged by an indictment of fifteen counts, each of which charged him with the offense of grand theft of various moneys, stocks, and securities of Frances Graham Rice. The different times at which the property was taken were from January 2, 1931, to the 17th day of October, 1931, and the total amounts alleged in the several counts aggregated $11,500. He was found guilty by a jury upon eight of the counts and acquitted as to the others by direction of the trial court.

In brief, the testimony discloses that Frances Graham Rice was a woman of the age of 94 years, penurious, impaired in vision to the extent that she could with difficulty read large print and write her name, suffering with senile dementia, and incompetent to transact the ordinary affairs of life. Owing to her physical and mental condition, it was necessary for her to live under the supervision and care of a nurse. She appeared to be growing progressively worse, and appellant first learned of Mrs. Rice from her nephew, who expressed the fear that guardianship proceedings would have to be instituted which might result in her being committed to some sanitarium or other institution. Professing a Christian interest in her affairs and at the same time expressing disapproval of the appointment of a guardian for Mrs. Rice on the ground that it would unnecessarily wound her feelings, defendant offered, in the event that she and her relatives were willing, to assume the control and management of her affairs. By a fantastic tale regarding his recollection of both Mrs. Rice and her deceased husband when he was a boy in New York, together with the false representation that he was a man of sufficient wealth and leisure to enable him to devote his time and attention to her affairs, he was able to obtain both her consent and that of her relatives to such an arrangement.

[1] Appellant obtained Mrs. Rice's power of attorney on December 22, 1930, and assumed complete charge of her affairs. On the 2d of January, 1931, he dictated a letter, without the knowledge of her relatives, by the terms of which Mrs. Rice promised to assign all of her property to him in consideration of his association and companionship and his agreement to care for her during the remainder of her life. Defendant accepted the proposal by a letter simultaneously written, and removed Mrs. Rice from the home of her nurse to that of a Mrs. Wells, whom he subsequently married. The assignment of the stocks was thereafter executed by Mrs. Rice. The defendant withdrew and placed in his own name the moneys from her bank accounts, which he used, together with her stocks, at the times mentioned in the indictments in business ventures of his own, which for the most part were highly speculative and unfortunate. On October 26, 1931, defendant dictated another letter whereby Mrs. Rice ratified and reaffirmed her past agreements and assigned and delivered to him her annuity check "with no terms or conditions attached thereto." The record discloses that appellant neither failed nor refused to maintain and supervise a home for Mrs. Rice until she was removed from his control by process of the court. It was the theory of the prosecution that the defendant had fraudulently appropriated the property of an incompetent person, while the defendant claimed title to the same by reason of the alleged contractual relationship. The evidence is conflicting, yet there is substantial testimony of both lay and medical witnesses that Mrs. Rice was incompetent to transact her business affairs, together with ample proof that defendant had knowledge of her mental condition. Upon these questions of fact the verdict of the jury is conclusive. 8 Cal. Jur. 587.

[2, 3] Appellant's challenge to the sufficiency of the testimony to constitute grand theft, as defined by section 484 of the Penal Code, is without merit. The test of whether the testimony satisfies the section depends upon the presence or absence of good faith on the part of the defendant in appropriating the property. It is fundamental that if property is taken by one in good faith under his claim of title in himself, he is exempt from prosecution "'* * * however puerile or mistaken the claim may in fact be.'" It is equally true "'* * * if the claim is dishonest,—a mere pretense,—it will not protect the taker.'" Dean v. State, 41 Fla. 291, 26 So. 638, 639, 79 Am. St. Rep. 186. To the same effect is Burke v. Watts, 188 Cal. 118, 125, 204 P. 578.

The good faith of accused persons in relationship with incompetents has received, however, some attention from other courts. In the case of Hobbs v. People, 183 Ill. 336, 55 N. E. 692, 693, an imbecile widow, not having sufficient mental capacity to attend to the most ordinary business affairs, was allowed a pension by the government. The defendant, not a licensed attorney, representing that he would attend to her legal business which he maintained required the appointment of a guardian, induced her to sign an order directing the pension agent to turn over her check to him, which she had previously indorsed. He gave a receipt therefor reciting that it was to be cashed by him, after which he would deduct his fees and pay her the balance. Defendant performed no legal services and converted the money to his own use, after which he was convicted of embezzlement. The court, in affirming the judgment, said in part as follows: "The seventh instruction told the jury, in substance, that, if Mrs. Throater was a demented or distracted person, of unsound mind and memory, and not capable of transacting the ordinary business of life, and defendant knew it, it was not material whether she parted with the possession of the check willingly or unwillingly." To the same effect is Rex v. Wallace, 24 Dom. Law. Rep. 825.

There was ample evidence of the defendant's knowledge that Mrs. Rice was of unsound mind and incapable of performing the ordinary business affairs of life, and of his lack of good faith throughout the entire transaction, to support the judgments.

[4] Appellant next claims that he was prejudiced by a denial of the right of reasonable examination of prospective jurors. During the selection of the jury, the trial judge examined them collectively, propounding the usual inquiries, including whether they were qualified jurors residing in Los Angeles county or had heard anything about the facts of the case from any source. The court then refused defendant's counsel the privilege of separately interrogating each prospective juror upon his particular place of residence, or whether he would be willing to be tried for a similar offense by a person of his frame of mind, on the ground of their immateriality. While answers to these questions might well have been permitted, their refusal did not constitute prejudicial error. Such special questions, which the trial court deemed proper and material and not covered by his collective examination, were permitted. The conduct of the trial judge falls squarely within the construction of the cases of People v. Edenburg, 88 Cal. App. 558, 263 P. 857, and People v. Riordon, 79 Cal. App. 488, 496, 250 P. 190; by the Supreme Court of California in the case of People v. Estorga, 206 Cal. 81, 85, 273 P. 575, 576, as follows: "In those cases the jurors who were examined collectively by the court appear to have been those who had been drawn and seated in the jury box in the customary manner, were thus reduced to 12 in number, and had thereby become more definitely prospective jurors for the case on trial. This court, however, is not prepared to criticize a collective examination by the trial court of jurors drawn and seated in the jury box, provided the examination be of such nature, and conducted in such manner, as to sufficiently disclose the state of mind and attitude of the jurors toward the cause and the parties involved, and that opportunity for a 'reasonable examination' of the prospective jurors be accorded the people and the defense, on it being made to appear to the satisfaction of the court that such further examination is both 'reasonable' and proper. We commend to the trial courts, however, a consideration of some of the observations made by the District Courts of Appeal on this subject."

[5] Appellant further assails the court's "sarcastic and disparaging remarks imputing bad faith" directed toward his counsel while interrogating the prospective jurors Jeffrey and Wheeling, neither of whom was retained to try the cause. This statement was the outgrowth of a question to the court with reference to the limitation of the examination of prospective jurors on matters which were deemed by him to be immaterial. No assignment of misconduct to the court's remarks was made. Under such circumstances ordinarily the alleged impropriety will not be considered on appeal. People v. MacDonald, 167 Cal. 545, 551, 140 P. 256; People v. Nakis, 184 Cal. 105, 116, 193 P. 92.

[6] The appellant next assigns misconduct on the part of the jury and complains that the court failed to heed the affidavits of Mrs. Henry, wife of the defendant, and one Jennie Adams Conrad, charging that certain members of the jury designated merely as jurors "6" and "7," without identifying them by name, were seen in conversation with witnesses for the prosecution during the course of the trial. As the affidavits did not disclose the names of the jurors or the nature of the conversations except that they were able to hear only the name of defendant mentioned, error cannot be predicated thereon. As was stated in People v. Golsh, 63 Cal. App. 609, 618, 219 P. 456, 460: "It does not appear that the conversation related to the case on trial. It therefore is not of itself a circumstance sufficient to raise a presumption that the juror was improperly influenced. It was, of course, a grave impropriety, exposing the juror to suspicion and reflecting upon the administration of justice, but, in the absence of any showing as to the nature of the subject-matter of the conversation we cannot say that it was legal misconduct, calling for a reversal of the judgment. People v. Dunne, 80 Cal. 34, 21 P. 1130; People v. Phelan, 123 Cal. 551, 567, 568, 56 P. 424."

[7] Appellant strenuously insists that there was insufficient evidence to warrant the instruction which directed the jury to render a verdict on each of the fifteen counts. It is contended that the crime, if any, was complete when the property was assigned to him and was improperly split into the separate causes of action. There was sufficient evidence, including his own admissions, which tended to show the misapplication of funds on different occasions, and the instruction was not erroneous. People v. McCann, 96 Cal. App. 664, 667, 274 P. 621; People v. Hatch, 13 Cal. App. 521, 533, 534, 109 P. 1097. Objections were made to other instructions, which appear to be without merit. The instructions of the trial court fairly and comprehensively stated the rules of law applicable to the case.

A majority of the points raised in the appellant's brief were unsupported by authority, and, while other objections were made in like manner for our consideration, a careful review of the entire record discloses no error prejudicial to his rights.

The judgments and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

DOUGLASS v. GUARDIAN HOLDING CORPORATION.

Civ. 7654.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California.

June 15, 1933.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 14,
1933.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1075.

Finding as to when leased premises should have passed to lessee should not be set aside for failure to prove when term began, where time was indefinite by appellant lessor's own reasoning in its brief.

2. Contracts ⇨319(2).

Party wrongfully terminating contract and preventing other party from performing it is estopped to deny that latter was damaged to extent of his actual loss and fair outlay.

3. Landlord and tenant ⇨129(4).

Lessor's failure to deliver premises, constructed in agreed manner, to lessee at time fixed, and devotion thereof to another use, entitled lessee to recover damages in amount fairly or reasonably compensating him for time lost in preparing to enter business thereon.

4. Appeal and error ⇨931(4).

Finding that tenant was ready and able to accept building four months before lessor devoted it to another use held to warrant appellate court in believing that trial court found from evidence that tenant's demand for possession was made sufficiently long time before lessor's act for 3½ months, on which award of damages for lost time was based, to elapse.

5. Landlord and tenant ⇨129(1).

Finding that lessee refused to accept possession of building because of lessor's failure to provide adequate illumination, gas and electric connections, etc., as agreed, held not inconsistent with finding that lessor refused to deliver possession as finding that tenant rescinded lease.

6. Landlord and tenant ⇨128(2).

Lessee refusing to accept premises until put in condition promised did not impliedly release lessor from liability under lease or parties' agreement.

7. Landlord and tenant ⇨129(1).

Finding that lessee placed personalty on leased premises with lessor's consent held not inconsistent with findings that lessee refused to accept and lessor refused to deliver possession of premises as finding that tenant took possession with lessor's consent.

8. Trover and conversion ⇨18.

Lessee's demand for possession of personalty, placed on leased premises by him because of lessor's fraud, is not condition precedent to action against lessor for conversion thereof.

9. Appeal and error ⇨907(2).

Appellate court, having no record of evidence, will presume that trial court found in accordance with evidence before it.

10. Appeal and error ⇨694(1).

Appellate court will not set aside award to lessee for wages of watchman, employed with lessor's consent to guard personalty on leased premises, for want of finding that such services were necessary or amount paid therefor reasonable, in absence of record of evidence.

11. Appeal and error ⇨694(1).

Award of damages to lessee for loss in purchase and subsequent sale of equipment for garage, possession of which never passed to him, will not be set aside on appeal, in absence of contrary evidence in record.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William Hazlett, Judge.

Action by C. A. Douglass, Jr., against the Guardian Holding Corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Victor Ford Collins, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

William Ellis Lady, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

DESMOND, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment awarding plaintiff the sum of $2,352.06, made up as follows: $1,000 for time lost by plaintiff in preparing to enter into a garage business on premises of defendant; $1,000 for conversion of certain personal property belonging to plaintiff; $126.43 for wages of a watchman guarding said personalty; $225.83 for loss sustained by plaintiff in relation to articles of equipment which he purchased in anticipation of engaging in said garage business. In totaling the specific items above mentioned, an error of 20 cents in favor of the defendant appears in the judgment.

The matters complained of were originally covered by a single complaint, the first count of which sought damages for conversion; the other counts, damages arising out of a transaction in relation to a lease. The first count was later dismissed and a separate action filed in lieu thereof, and this new action was consolidated for trial with the original action. The appeal is upon the judgment roll alone, and attacks particularly the findings made by the lower court as the basis of its judgment.

In the fall of 1927 defendant was erecting two buildings; a large apartment house, known as the Guardian Apartments, and, on the same premises, a one-story garage building. According to the findings, plaintiff and defendant on October 31, 1927, entered into an agreement in writing bearing that date, whereby defendant leased to the plaintiff said garage building for a ten-year period from and after "said Guardian Apartments were officially accepted by the lessor from the builder thereof, and said apartments were open to receive tenants and from and after written notice of said acceptance had been given by the defendant to plaintiff." The court also found "that said Guardian Apartments and said garage should have been completed and should have been officially accepted by the defendant from the builder thereof and said building opened to receive tenants and written notice of such acceptance should have been given plaintiff on or about the 15th day of January, 1928, and that ample time elapsed between the 31st day of October, 1927, the date of said lease, and said 15th day of January, 1928, within which it should have as aforesaid completed said building; that said Guardian Apartments and said garage were not completed and ready for tenants until on or about the 1st day of May, 1928, which the court finds to be an unreasonable length of time."

In paragraph 21 of the findings the following appears: "21. The court finds that plaintiff lost time equal to at least one full month between the 31st day of October, 1927, and February 1, 1928, and two and one-third months between the 1st day of February, 1928, and the 10th day of April, 1928, on which day defendant made other use of said premises, or a total loss of time of three and one-third months, in preparing to enter upon said premises and conduct therein and thereon a first-class garage business, and that the reasonable value of the time spent and lost by plaintiff in connection therewith is the sum of $1,000.00, and by reason thereof plaintiff sustained damages in a like amount, to-wit, the sum of $1,000.00; that plaintiff paid out, laid out and expended various sums of money in preparing to enter upon said premises and conduct and operate thereon a first class garage business; and in the same connection, with the consent of the defendant, placed upon said premises various articles of personal property, and in particular those mentioned in plaintiff's complaint in action No. 280376, and all of which articles mentioned in said complaint the defendant converted to its own use and benefit, the reasonable value of which at the time of said conversion was the sum of $1,000.00, and, by reason whereof plaintiff sustained further damages in a like amount, to-wit the sum of $1,000.00."

[1-3] Because plaintiff in his complaint alleged, "That in the making, execution and delivery of said agreement it was understood and agreed between the parties thereto and hereto that said Guardian Apartments would be officially completed and officially accepted from the builder thereof and open to receive tenants not later than the 1st day of December, 1927, and that it was further understood and agreed by said parties that thereupon but not later than said 10th day of December, 1927, plaintiff herein should receive possession of said garage building and be permitted to conduct a general garage business therein," and also that the lease was "for the period of ten years beginning on or about the 10th day of December, 1927," appellant contends that there is no legal basis for the award of $1,000 for the loss of time of the plaintiff, and also that the findings indicate that there was a complete failure of proof of the allegations in regard to the beginning of the lease term. Commenting first on this latter contention, it seems to us that where, by defendant's own reasoning as developed in its brief, the time of beginning was somewhat indefinite, a finding that the premises should have passed to plaintiff under the lease on or about January 15, 1928, approximately one month after the time named by plaintiff as the correct date, should not be set aside on the ground mentioned, failure of proof. As to the contention that there is no legal basis for an award of damages for time lost in ineffectual preparations to enter upon a lease, we have in mind the rule referred to in United States v. Behan, 110 U. S. 338, 4 S. Ct. 81, 28 L. Ed. 163, holding that the party who voluntarily and wrongfully puts an end to a contract and prevents another from performing it is estopped from denying that the injured party has been damaged to the extent of his actual loss and his outlay fairly incurred. In the case of Schnierow v. Boutagy, 33 Cal. App. 336, 164 P. 1132, we find a situation where defendant agreed to lease to plaintiff a storeroom then in process of construction. For breach of this contract plaintiff recovered a money judgment for loss of his time in securing another storeroom. Since in the instant case the court found that there was a breach by the defendant of this contract in his failing to deliver the premises "at the time and constructed in the manner agreed upon," and further that defendant, by devoting the garage building to another use on or about April 10, 1928, made it impossible for the plaintiff to obtain possession, we feel that the court was fully warranted in law in fixing as damages the amount of money which under the evidence he found would fairly or reasonably compensate the plaintiff for his lost time.

[4] Defendant complains that, although there is a finding that demand for the premises was made by the plaintiff, the finding is defective in not stating when the demand was made. Quoting from his brief: "From aught that appears from the findings, where no time is given, the demand may have been made on the 10th day of April, 1928. Without a finding as to the time of the demand by plaintiff for possession of the premises, there can be no possible cause of action."

In view of a finding made by the court that plaintiff was ready, able, and willing to accept the garage building on December 10, 1927, we are content to believe that from the evidence adduced at the trial the court drew its conclusion that demand for possession was made a sufficiently long time before April 10th for the 3½ months upon which the award for lost time is made to elapse.

[5, 6] Appellant contends that various findings of the court are inconsistent or contradictory. "In paragraph 8 of the findings (Clk. Tr., p. 54) we have a definite finding of a rescission of the lease by the plaintiff, although no time is given as to this rescission. In the same findings of fact we have a directly opposite theory, to-wit: that on April 10th, 1928, the defendant refused to give the possession of the garage to the plaintiff, and devoted it to other uses. Now which theory of the findings is correct? In other words, we have an issue raised by the findings." To analyze this complaint, we must quote paragraphs 8 and 9 of the findings:

"8. The court finds that the defendant also failed and refused and neglected to provide suitable and adequate illumination along said driveway for the purposes aforesaid, and also failed, refused and neglected to install and/or maintain gas and/or electric connections and meters for said garage separate and apart from said apartment house building by which gas and electric current would be furnished to said garage and a measurement thereof made apart from said apartment house; and that the court further finds on account of all the foregoing and the failures on the part of the defendant, as hereinbefore found, it became and was necessary for plaintiff to and he did refuse to accept possession of said premises for the reason he could not make use thereof by reason of the narrowness of said right of way from said Hollywood

Boulevard to said garage building, and lack of proper illumination and lack of proper gas and electric connections and meters.

"9. The court finds that plaintiff demanded that defendant comply with its said agreement mentioned above and complete said improvements in accordance with the provisions of said agreement and deliver the possession of said garage to plaintiff, but that defendant not only failed and neglected to complete said improvements as agreed but it also failed and refused to deliver possession of said garage to plaintiff, and on the contrary on or about the 10th day of April, 1928, devoted it to other uses and purposes and not in the performance of said ten year lease, and therefore made it impossible for plaintiff to obtain possession thereof."

Somewhere in this paragraph 8 appellant sees "a definite finding of a rescission of the lease by the plaintiff," but we see none. The finding is rather that there was a refusal to accept possession for perfectly good reasons. If the driveway had been widened and lighting apparatus adjusted as demanded by plaintiff and as agreed upon, prior to April 10th, this plaintiff might have entered into possession immediately thereafter. Certainly no release of the defendant from liability under the lease or the agreement between the parties is implied by plaintiff's refusal to accept the premises unless or until they were put in the condition they were promised to him.

[7] This appellant also argues that in paragraph 21 of the findings of fact there is a finding "that the plaintiff actually took possession of the premises with the consent of the defendant." If there is such a finding, of course it contradicts or is inconsistent with the other findings just above quoted, that plaintiff necessarily refused to accept possession and that defendant refused possession of the premises. Is there in paragraph 21 a finding that "plaintiff actually took possession with the consent of the defendant"? Not at all. The finding is merely that plaintiff placed upon the premises, with the consent of the defendant, certain articles of personal property which defendant converted to its own use to the damage of plaintiff in the sum of $1,000.

The appellant in answering the conversion suit made the following allegations: " * * * That the plaintiff did trespass upon the property of the defendant herein and place certain property therein against the defendant's wishes, and without his knowledge or request. That thereafter the defendant demanded of the plaintiff that he leave the premises, and that the defendant (plaintiff?) did so without removing the property left thereon. That the defendant did not seek or desire said property, and that the plaintiff has failed, neglected and refused to make demand for said property."

[8] It is now contended that "if the plaintiff with the consent of the defendant, placed the personal property (of which the plaintiff has received an award of $1,000.00 damages) on the property, and in the possession of the defendant, with the consent of both parties, then the plaintiff could not maintain an action for damages for conversion of this property except and until the plaintiff has alleged, proven and there was found a demand from plaintiff to defendant for the possession of the property alleged to have been converted." It may be that the evidence showed that the plaintiff's consent or action in placing the property in the garage was induced by fraud, and, if so, a demand would not be required. Field, J., in the case of Paige v. O'Neal, 12 Cal. 483, 495, said: " * * * It is a general rule, that when the possession of property is originally acquired by a tort, no demand previous to the institution of suit for its recovery is necessary"—a rule which was also followed in Sargent v. Sturm, 23 Cal. 359, 83 Am. Dec. 118, a case in which the action was to recover the possession or value of the property. The complaint, in the case at bar, alleged that defendant "surreptitiously and tortiously and unlawfully sought and gained and took possession of all thereof (the personal property) from the plaintiff, against his will and without his consent and converted the same to its own use," and all of these allegations the court by finding No. 23 found to be true.

[9] We have no record of the evidence before us, and in such a case it will be presumed "that the trial court found in accordance with the evidence that was before it." Turgeon v. Barney, 70 Cal. App. 432, 435, 233 P. 394, 395.

[10, 11] Objection is made to the allowance of the last two items mentioned in the judgment, $126.43 for watchman's wages, and $225.83 loss sustained in the purchase and subsequent sale of equipment for the garage. There is a finding that the watchman was employed with the consent of the defendant "to properly guard and care for" the personal property and we are not prepared to say, under the circumstances of this case and in the absence of a record of the evidence, that this award should be set aside on the theory of defendant that there is no finding that the services were necessary or that the amount paid therefor was reasonable. As to the last item, $225.83, we advert once more to the rule adhered to in United States v. Behan, supra, and are convinced that the trial court considered, with the evidence before it, that this constituted fairly the measure of damages for expense incurred in regard to the garage equipment. We quote here from the decision in the case of Burnham v. Abrahamson, 21 Cal. App. 248, at page 255, 131 P. 338, 342:

"On an appeal from the judgment on the judgment roll alone, every fact essential to the support of the court's findings and the judgment must be presumed to have been proved. Or, as the rule is stated in all the cases: 'All intendments will be made in support of the judgment, and all proceedings necessary to its validity will be presumed to have been regularly taken; and only matters which might have been presented to the court below, which would have authorized the judgment, will be presumed to have been thus presented, if the record shows nothing to the contrary.'" Judgment affirmed.

That mortgagee's clause provided that loss, if any, subject to conditions of fire policy, was payable to mortgagee, held not to require mortgagee to file separate proof of loss.

4. Insurance — 555.

Provision of fire policy requiring filing of proof of loss may be waived by insurer or its duly authorized agent (Civ. Code, § 2636).

5. Contracts — 318.

Law abhors forfeitures of contracts.

6. Insurance — 555.

Question whether provision of policy requiring filing of proof of loss has been waived depends on circumstances of each particular case.

7. Insurance — 665(7).

Question of mere delay in filing required proof of fire loss or waiver thereof will be determined in insured's favor when reasonably possible.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by the Bank of Oroville and another against the Minnesota Fire Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Thornton & Watt, of San Francisco (Evans M. Taylor, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

J. Oscar Goldstein, of Chico, for respondents.

Mr. Justice R. L. THOMPSON, delivered the opinion of the court.

The plaintiffs recovered judgment in a suit upon an insurance policy for the total destruction of a warehouse by fire. The appellant contends the claim for insurance was forfeited by failure to present sworn proof of the loss until several days after the time allowed therefor by the terms of the contract. The trial court held this clause of the policy was waived by the conduct of the insurer.

The plaintiff Hayes owned a warehouse at Oroville of the approximate value of $8,000. The Bank of Oroville held a mortgage on this and other property belonging to Hayes to secure an indebtedness of $9,000. Through a local agent, the Minnesota Fire Insurance Company, a corporation, with its western place of business at Seattle, insured this warehouse February, 1930, for a three-year term, for the sum of $3,000. A mortgage clause was attached to the policy providing that "loss, if any, on building only, subject however to all the terms and conditions of this policy, payable to Bank of Oroville, Oroville, California." On June 23, 1931, the warehouse was totally destroyed by fire. At the time of the fire Mr. Hayes was engaged as foreman of a state highway construction company near Emigrant Pass. Upon receipt of information of the fire, he immediately went to Oroville, consulted the president of the bank, and notified the local agent of the insurance company of his loss. The agent promptly wired the company at Seattle. R. V. Smith, the San Francisco agent of the company, was immediately sent to Oroville to adjust the claim. The agent arrived at the scene of the fire within a week thereafter. He investigated the affair, consulted with the president of the bank, acknowledged the bank's mortgage interest to the full extent of the insurance, and said "they (the bank) have got to be taken care of." He inquired for the owner, Hayes. He raised no objection to the claim. He departed for San Francisco, leaving an impression with the president of the bank that its claim would be promptly settled in full. He said he would make out an appraisal and prepare the proof of loss for Mr. Hayes to sign. Mr. Putnam, the president of the bank, testified in that regard: "He handed me that card and said he was the adjuster for the Minnesota Fire Insurance Company, and that he had come up to adjust on Hayes' loss, and he says, 'I understand you represent Mr. Hayes.' I told him 'yes', in that particular case that Mr. Hayes was away and I would look after it for him. He says to me, 'Have you made out your appraisal?' I says 'No, I never heard of such a thing as us making out an appraisal.' And he said 'Well, I will make it out, and when I get back to the city I will send you a copy of it, and I will also fill out and send up a proof of loss to be executed for Mr. Hayes.' And I says 'All right; if we are not satisfied we will get a carpenter and make our own appraisal,' and he said 'Very well,' and I said 'You understand that the Bank of Oroville has a claim there of three thousand dollars,' and he said 'Yes, that is understood, they have got to be taken care of,' and I asked him if it was necessary for the bank to file a proof of loss, and he said 'No,' and that was about the conversation although I never got these documents from Mr. Smith, neither the appraisal nor the proof of loss filled out."

Having heard nothing further from Smith, after his departure from Oroville, Mr. Putnam wrote him on July 16th, as follows:

"When you were here something over ten days ago to adjust the loss on property of V. B. Hayes, you promised to send me the amount of your adjustment within a week. but up to the present time I have not received same.

"Please advise me what you have decided to do with reference to this loss and oblige,

"Yours very truly."

To this inquiry the adjuster replied on July 18th with an offer of compromise, in which he said he hoped to go to Oroville and take the matter up with Putnam personally. He, however, stated in this letter that, while it would no doubt cost more than the amount of the insurance to restore the building and that it was old and deteriorated, still he would recommend the payment of $2,000 "if Mr. Hayes cares to settle for that amount."

On July 21st, Mr. Putnam wrote to Smith rejecting the proffer of $2,000, and saying positively they would accept no sum short of the entire amount of the insurance.

Under date of July 23d, Smith wrote to Mr. Putnam as follows:

"In view of the attitude you and Mr. Hayes take in this matter, I think it would be advisable for you to prepare and file proof of loss with the company in accordance with the conditions of the policy."

This matter was not sent to the Bank of Oroville, which held the mortgage interest in the destroyed property. It was addressed to Mr. Putnam, "President First National Bank of Oroville." It appears Mr. Putnam was the president of both the Bank of Oroville and the First National Bank. He testified this letter reached the First National Bank in his absence, and that he never heard of it until three or four days before the trial commenced in March, 1932, at which time the defendant called upon plaintiffs to produce the letter. He said that in searching their files it was then discovered in the First National Bank records. No such notice was sent to Mr. Hayes.

Mr. Hayes returned to Oroville about July 21st, and was fully informed by Mr. Putnam concerning the conference with Smith, his promise to prepare the proof of loss, and the expectation of a settlement of the claim without further trouble. Hayes returned to his work on the highway without knowledge of the subsequent letter of Smith to Putnam advising them to prepare the proof of loss. Hayes never heard of this letter of July 23d and had no reason to doubt that Smith would prepare the proof of loss if it became necessary to file such a document. It is true that Putnam would still have had time within which to procure the preparation and filing of the proof of loss after Smith advised him to do so in the letter of July 23d. But he absolutely denies having seen this letter until shortly before the time of the trial. It does not appear that he knew where to reach Hayes during that period of about a month prior to the expiration of time. Mr. Smith had told him that the owner of the insured property must himself swear to a proof of loss, and that a mortgagee of the property could not do it for the owner. At least the owner was never served with notice that Smith had changed his mind and withdrawn his promise to prepare the proof of loss. It is true that after the sixty-day period had elapsed, Putnam wrote to Hayes at Santa Maria, August 25th, saying: "I have not heard from the insurance, and I suppose that you filed your proof of loss. You had better keep track of the time and if no settlement is made by them, during the sixty days, I think you had better place it with an attorney to collect at the end of that time."

This letter indicates that Putnam had not heard of the agent's letter advising them to file the proof of loss. It also suggests that he still hoped for a settlement of the claim, although he cautiously recommended Hayes not to let the time elapse for filing the proof of loss. At least the information contained in this letter from Smith never reached Hayes until the sixty days had passed. When he received Putnam's letter, he promptly prepared and forwarded the sworn proof of loss, which reached the company about six days after the limitation of time specified in the policy. The insurance company immediately notified Hayes that it repudiated the obligation created by the policy on the ground that he had failed to file his proof as required by the contract. The good faith of the adjusting agent, as indicated by his conduct in the transaction, may reasonably be questioned.

[1] We are of the opinion the conduct of the adjusting agent of the insurance company amounted to a waiver of the provision of the policy requiring the insured to file a sworn proof of loss within sixty days after the fire. The property was valued at several times the amount of the insurance. A local agent insured the property with full knowledge of its value. It was totally destroyed by fire. The adjusting agent personally investigated the claim and was acquainted with the surrounding circumstances. He must have known that the loss was far greater than the amount of the insurance. No criticism of the transaction was offered by him. No fraud was charged in the procuring of the policy or otherwise. No defense to the suit was made by the insurance company except the technical one that the insured had forfeited his claim by failing to file his proof of loss until six days after the time had expired. The defendant is estopped from relying on this technical defense because its duly authorized agent himself promised to prepare the proof of loss for the insured if it became necessary to do so, and for the reason that the agent also led the assured to believe his claim would be adjusted without the necessity of filing this proof by saying to Putnam with regard to the bank's interest in the policy, "they have got to be taken care of." Moreover, the agent made no effort to notify Hayes, who was the owner of the insured property, that he had changed his mind and withdrawn his promise to prepare the proof of loss. Quite a similar situation existed in the case of Francis v. Iowa Nat. Fire Ins. Co., 112 Cal. App. 565, 297 P. 122. In that case the court held that similar conduct estopped the insurance company from contending that the policy was forfeited by failure to file the proof of loss within the time prescribed in the contract.

[2] It is true that the Bank of Oroville, as mortgagee of the insured property, might lose its right to recover on the policy under the mortgagee's clause which was attached thereto, in the event of a breach of the contract by the insured even without the mortgagee's knowledge thereof. Section 2541, Civ. Code; Welch v. British American Assur. Co., 148 Cal. 224, 82 P. 964, 113 Am. St. Rep. 223, 7 Ann. Cas. 396. Section 2541, supra, provides: "Unless the policy otherwise provides, where a mortgagor of property effects insurance in his own name providing that the loss shall be payable to the mortgagee, or assigns a policy of insurance to a mortgagee, the insurance is deemed to be upon the interest of the mortgagor, who does not cease to be a party to the original contract, and any act of his, prior to the loss, which would otherwise avoid the insurance will have the same effect, although the property is in the hands of the mortgagee, but any act which, under the contract of insurance, is to be performed by the mortgagor, may be performed by the mortgagee therein named, with the same effect as if it had been performed by the mortgagor."

[3] Even though the policy did contain the mortgage clause to the effect that "loss, if any, subject to all the terms and conditions of this policy, is payable to Bank of Oroville," this did not require the mortgagee to also file a separate proof of loss in addition to the one which the contract required the insured to file. The filing of such proof by the insured, under the circumstances of this case, is a sufficient compliance with the contract. In 7 Cooley's Briefs on Insurance (2d Ed.), page 5746, it is said in that regard: "The general rule seems to be that, unless the mortgagee clause attached to the policy makes it obligatory on the mortgagee to furnish proofs of loss and an appraisalment, it is not a condition precedent to his right of action that he furnish the same."

[4] Under the policy in this case, which provides that "Within sixty days after the commencement of the fire the insured shall render to the company * * * preliminary proof of loss consisting of a written statement signed and sworn to by him, * * *" it became necessary for the insured Hayes to file with the company his sworn proof of loss within sixty days after June 23d, upon which date the fire occurred, unless that requirement was waived by the acts or conduct of the defendant or its authorized agent. McCormack v. North British Ins. Co., 78 Cal. 468, 21 P. 14; White v. Home Mutual Ins. Co., 128 Cal. 131, 60 P. 666; Gillon v. Northern Assur. Co., 127 Cal. 480, 59 P. 901; Estrada v. Queen Ins. Co., 107 Cal. App. 504, 290 P. 525. The authorities are, however, uniform to the effect that the provision of an insurance policy, which requires the filing of proof of loss, may be waived by the insurer or its duly authorized agent. Section 2636, Civ. Code; 26 C. J. 393, § 507; 33 C. J. 23, § 680; 7 Cooley's Briefs on Ins. (2d Ed.) p. 5955, § 12; Francis v. Iowa Nat. Fire Ins. Co., 112 Cal. App. 565, 297 P. 122; Savage v. Norwich Union Fire Ins. Soc., 125 Cal. App. 330, 13 P.(2d) 955.

In the present case we are satisfied the delay in filing the proof of loss until six days after the expiration of the sixty-day period within which the policy requires that document to be filed was waived by the conduct of the agent of the insurance company.

[5-7] The law abhors forfeitures of contracts. The question of a waiver of this provision of an insurance policy depends upon the circumstances of each particular case. Where a cause of action upon an insurance policy for recovery of loss sustained on account of fire is otherwise valid, the question of a mere delay in filing the required proof of loss, or the waiver thereof, will be determined in favor of the insured when this may be reasonably done without violence to the facts of the case. In 5 Joyce on Insurance (2d Ed.), page 5564, it is said, concerning the question of waiver: "The question concerning whether or not there has been a waiver of this provision must in all cases depend upon the circumstances of each particular case. The courts will construe this provision, as a rule, against the insurer, and will not scan very closely evidence introduced by the insured tending to rebut a technical forfeiture."

On page 5607 of the last cited authority the author says: "If the insurer by its acts and conduct leads the claimant to believe that the company is preparing to adjust the loss, the insurer will be estopped from claiming the proofs were not furnished as provided in the policy."

In view of the foregoing we are of the opinion the findings and judgment are adequately supported by the evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

On January 13, 1930, one Jack P. Dunn sustained injuries arising out of and in the course of his employment by the defendant, which caused his death on the same day. The defendant is a self-insurer under and by virtue of the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act, and the said Dunn left no dependents. On August 4, 1932, this action, based upon the provisions of section 9 (b), subd. 2 (10), of chapter 222, of the Statutes of 1929 (page 423 et seq.), was brought by the Industrial Accident Commission in the name of the people of the state of California, to collect from the defendant the sum of $300 alleged to be due and owing from the respondent to the state of California on account of said death. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained on the ground that the same failed to state a cause of action, and, from the ensuing judgment, this appeal has been taken.

The main question presented is whether those portions of this amendment to the Workmen's Compensation Act which provide for the creation and enforcement of an employer's liability, in compensable death cases where the employee leaves no dependents, to pay the sum of $300 into what is known as the subsequent injuries fund, to be used for the purposes named in the act, are unconstitutional as in contravention of section 21 of article 20 of the Constitution of this state. While this precise question has not heretofore been passed upon, that portion of this amendment which purported to confer upon the Industrial Accident Commission the power to enforce such a liability as is here relied upon was held unconstitutional in the case of Commercial Cns. Ins. Co. v. Indus. Acc. Commission, 211 Cal. 210, 295 P. 11, 13. A somewhat similar act, having a similar purpose, was adopted in 1919 (Stats. 1919, p. 273), a portion of which was held unconstitutional in the case of Yosemite L. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Commission, 187 Cal. 774, 204 P. 226, 228, 20 A. L. R. 994. The effect of that decision was held in People v. Yosemite Lumber Co., 191 Cal. 267, 216 P. 39, 40, to be to render the entire amendment of 1919 void, since no jurisdiction over the enforcement of its provisions was therein conferred upon the courts.

It is appellant's contention that neither the cases referred to nor the principles therein set forth are controlling here, for the reason that the 1929 act materially differs from the 1919 act, in that it specifically confers jurisdiction upon the courts to enforce the liability attempted to be created. The argument is made that the opinion in the earliest of the cases referred to conceded that the Legislature might, under its general powers, provide a fund of the general nature of that involved here, that certain questions were reserved as not necessary to the decision of the two later cases, and that anything said in any of these cases to the effect that the form of liability attempted to be created by these acts was beyond the power of the legislature was unnecessary to the respective decision.

In the case of Yosemite L. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Commission, supra, it was pointed out that the second paragraph of section 21 of article 20 of the Constitution confers no authority to create a tribunal with any other judicial power than to settle disputes arising under legislation authorized by the first paragraph of the section. The court then examines the first paragraph of the section and comes to the conclusion that it provides only for the creation of a liability upon the part of an employer to compensate his own employees for injuries arising out of the employment, or the dependents of such an employee if the injury results in death. In this connection the court said:

"The first grant to the Legislature by the new section is the grant of power 'to create and enforce a complete system of workmen's compensation.' This does not authorize the creation of a liability on any person to pay such 'compensation,' or require any person to contribute funds to support the proposed system. It does not purport to touch upon the subject of liabilities.

"The next phrase of the new section empowers the Legislature 'in that behalf to create and enforce a liability on the part of any and all persons to compensate any and all of their workmen for injury or disability and their dependents for death incurred or sustained by the said workmen in the course of their employment.' This does not authorize the creation of a liability on the part of any person to compensate the workmen of other persons, nor the dependents of workmen of other persons. The phrase 'their workmen' necessarily confines the persons to be compensated to workmen who are in the employ of the person who is made liable. This is also shown by the provision that if the workman is killed by an injury in the course of his employment, the compensation is to be made to his 'dependents' thus excluding any idea of liability in such a case to provide for the welfare of workmen in general, or of a particular class of disabled workmen, in no way connected with the employer who is made liable for the particular injury. Nothing is added to the force of the provision by the use of the word 'plenary.' If the Legislature has power to do a certain thing, its power to do it is always plenary. It is merely surplus verbiage.

"The use in this clause of the words 'any and all persons,' in describing those made liable, and the words 'any and all of their workmen,' in describing those to be compensated, do not show an intent to empower the Legislature to enlarge the liability against a particular employer for a particular injury so as to include compensation to workmen in general as a class, or a contribution to a fund to be applied to the benefit of a class of persons, instead of to the dependents of the workman who may be killed by the injury.

"Nor is such enlarged meaning given to the section by the use of the phrase 'complete system of workmen's compensation,' in the opening clause, or by the elaborate definition of that phrase which follows the first sentence. The section mentions and describes but one kind of liability: The liability of 'any or all persons' to compensate 'any or all of their workmen.' This is in effect a provision for any person to compensate his workmen, which is but another form of saying that any employer shall compensate his employee, for an injury arising out of the employment, or the dependents of such employee, if the injury causes death to him. The language of neither one of these parts of the section shows or expresses an intent to add another liability to that expressly stated. In these circumstances the maxim, 'expressio unius, est exclusio alterius,' is applicable, and the meaning to be inferred is that only which is explicitly stated. And particularly it should not be inferred or implied from such language that so novel and different a thing was intended as the liability to the state which is imposed by the act of 1919."

After reviewing the arguments which had been submitted to the voters in support of the constitutional amendment which is now section 21 of article 20, and further stating that the statute under consideration was in fact a tax measure and that the constitutional amendment was not intended to provide for taxation of any kind, the court said:

"Our conclusion is that section 21 of article 20, as amended in 1918, did not authorize the Legislature to impose a liability on an employer to pay money to the state for the purposes specified in the Act of 1919. It follows by necessity that said section gives no authority to the Legislature to confer on the Industrial Accident Commission jurisdiction to determine any dispute that may arise concerning the liability of employers sought to be imposed by said act of 1919."

The conclusion thus reached, that the jurisdiction attempted to be conferred upon the commission by that act was not authorized by the constitutional amendment, was based upon the holding that the amendment did not authorize the Legislature to impose a liability upon an employer to pay money to the state for the purposes specified in the act, and that the rule of express mention and implied exclusion applied. If the reasoning of that case be correct, the constitutional amendment referred to not only limits the power of the Legislature in conferring jurisdiction upon the commission in such a case, but also prevents its authorizing a court to enforce a liability which it has not the power to create.

The reasoning and conclusions of that case were expressly reaffirmed in People v. Yosemite Lumber Co., supra, in which case it is said:

"In deciding that question this court held that, under the amendment of section 21 of article 20 of the state Constitution, adopted in 1918, investing the Legislature with power to create a system for the enforcement of workmen's compensation through and by means of an Industrial Accident Commission, the powers of the Legislature in that regard were limited thereby to the investment of the said Commission, with jurisdiction to create and enforce a liability on the part of employers to compensate their workmen and surviving dependents for injuries sustained or death incurred by such workmen in the course of their employment, and that such constitutional grant of power to the Legislature did not authorize it to invest said Commission with jurisdiction to create or enforce a liability on the part of employers to compensate the workmen of other employers, or dependents of such workmen, or to require the employers of workmen killed during the course of their employment, but leaving no surviving dependents, to pay into the state treasury the sum provided in said act of 1919 for the rehabilitation and re-education of persons injured in the service of other employers than those upon whom the liability to make said payment was by said act imposed; and that said act, in so far as it attempted, in sections 5 and 6 thereof, to invest such Commission with such jurisdiction was unconstitutional and void."

However, in that case, after recognizing the plausibility of an argument to the effect that section 21 of article 20 of the Constitution so limited the power of the Legislature that it could not impose a liability upon employers for compensation to other than their own employees and their dependents, the court held it unnecessary to decide such a question.

In Commercial Cas. Ins. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Commission, supra, that part of the 1929 statute which purports to confer jurisdiction upon the Industrial Accident Commission in a dispute of this nature was before the court. After reviewing and approving the reasoning and conclusion in the case of Yosemite L. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Commission, supra, and in passing upon a claimed difference between the objects and purpose of the statute under consideration and the statute of 1919, the court points out that the 1929 act imposes a liability upon an employer to make a payment which may be used in whole or in part to compensate employees who are not and never have been in his service. In considering a contention there made that a reasonable construction of section 21, article 20, of the Constitution, permits legislation of this character, the court says:

"The above provision of this section of the Constitution, both that quoted and relied upon by the respondent and the latter part thereof which we have quoted, must be read together, as the two parts form but one complete sentence. As so read, we think that the intent of the framers thereof is clear and unambiguous, and that they intended by this amendment of the Constitution to limit the power of the Legislature in enacting a Workmen's Compensation Act to provide for the compensation by the employers of their own employees, and that any legislation which exceeds these limits is beyond the power of the Legislature, and, therefore, void."

While holding void the particular subsection then under consideration, the court declined to consider the question of the validity of other portions of the act as not involved in that case.

The appellant argues that all that was decided in Yosemite L. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Commission was that under the constitutional provision the Legislature was without power to confer upon the commission jurisdiction over such a dispute as was then under review, and that anything else appearing in the decision in that case was dicta. It is then contended that section 21 of article 20 of the Constitution has not limited the power of the Legislature to making provision for the creation and enforcement of a liability on the part of employers to compensate their own employees and their dependents for injuries or death incurred in the course of the employment, but that this section expressly authorizes the Legislature to provide for "any and all workmen incurring injury in the course of their employment," thus conferring an express authority to impose a liability upon an employer to compensate all workmen no matter by whom they are employed, and further that, aside from the constitutional provision, authority for the legislation here in question may be found in the general police power of the state. However, in the case just mentioned, the court held and based its decision upon the proposition that the liability attempted to be imposed was unconstitutional and void, and that it necessarily followed that the power to adjudicate such a matter could not be conferred upon the commission. The court analyzed the respective portions of the constitutional amendment and concluded:

"The section mentions and describes but one kind of liability: The liability of 'any or all persons' to compensate 'any or all of their workmen.' This is in effect a provision for any person to compensate his workmen, which is but another form of saying that any employer shall compensate his employee, for an injury arising out of the employment, or the dependents of such employee, if the injury causes death to him. The language of neither one of these parts of the section shows or expresses an intent to add another liability to that expressly stated. In these circumstances the maxim, 'expressio unius, est exclusio alterius,' is applicable, and the meaning to be inferred is that only which is explicitly stated."

That this constitutional amendment limits the liability that may be imposed by legislative action to that of an employer in connection with his own employees is reaffirmed in the case of People v. Yosemite Lumber Co., and, while this particular portion of the opinion may not have been necessary to the decision of that case, it has considerable persuasive force under the circumstances. The same may be said of the decision in the case of Commercial Cas. Ins. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Commission, and, while the court there confined its decision to that portion of the statute now under review which attempted to confer jurisdiction in such matters upon the Industrial Accident Commission, it is again stated that the intention of the constitutional amendment is plainly to limit the power of the Legislature, in enacting a Workmen's Compensation Act, to making provision for the compensation by an employer of his own employees, and that any legislation which exceeds such limits is void.

However beneficial and desirable may be the ends sought to be accomplished by the provision here in question, we feel that the decisions we have cited and the principles therein laid down are controlling here. While the decisions in Yosemite L. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Commission and Commercial Cas. Ins. Co. v. Indus. Acc. Commission were limited to the question as to whether jurisdiction had been conferred by the respective acts upon the Industrial Accident Commission, both decisions were based upon the ground that the Legislature had exceeded the limits of the constitutional enabling clause and, in the latter case, that the constitutional provision limited the power of the Legislature to providing for compensation by an employer in connection with his own employees only.

If this conclusion is correct, section 21, article 20, of the Constitution not only does not grant the power in question, but expressly limits the same to the liability of an employer to and for his own employees. It follows that the Legislature may not under the general police power of the state make such a provision as is here attempted. In the absence of any constitutional restriction, it has been held that it was within the general police power of the state to enact a similar statute. State Ind. Commission v. Newman, 222 N. Y. 363, 118 N. E. 794. It has also been held that a statute of this nature is not in conflict with the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution. Sheehan v. Shuler, 265 U. S. 371, 44 S. Ct. 548, 68 L. Ed. 1061, 35 A. L. R. 1056; Mountain Timber Co. v. Washington, 243 U. S. 219, 37 S. Ct. 260, 61 L. Ed. 685, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 642. A different situation is presented where the power of the Legislature has been definitely limited by a constitutional provision adopted by the people, who have thus placed their own limitation upon the power, police or otherwise, which may be used in the particular matter involved. In this particular contention the appellant relies upon certain language used in Yosemite L. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Commission, where it is stated that it may be conceded that under its general powers the Legislature might provide a fund for the benefit of all persons disabled in industry in this state. In view of all the language used in that decision, we do not understand the portion here particularly referred to as conceding that such a fund might be provided for by the Legislature, under its general powers, to be created in the manner attempted in the act of 1919 and again in the act of 1929, in the face of the constitutional provision. The language referred to contains no concession that such a fund might be created by increasing the liability of an employer from one in relation to his own employees in case of injury, to one involving the providing of compensation in whole or in part for the employees of others. This conclusion is confirmed by the above quotation from the later case of Commercial Cas. Ins. Co. v. Indus. Acc. Commission.

A number of other points are raised, notably that the portion of the statute which is here attacked, being a tax measure, imposes a tax without regard to its uniformity of application; that it discriminates without jurisdiction among those within the class it purports to tax, and that it lays the entire burden of a tax for the purpose of compensating all workmen engaged in industry in this state who may be injured in a certain manner, upon a very small proportion of the employers of the state. In view of the conclusion we have reached upon the main issue presented, it becomes unnecessary to consider these other questions.

It is our conclusion that those portions of subsection 10 of section 9 of chapter 222 of the Statutes of 1929, which purport to create and enforce a liability upon the part of an employer to provide compensation for workmen not employed by him, are unconstitutional and void.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

ANDERSON et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al.

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN BOND & INDEMNITY CORPORATION v. MITCHELL, Commissioner of Insurance.
Civ. 8805, 8821.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

1. Insurance ⇐20.

Statute providing that surety company's right to do business "shall remain unimpaired" pending court review of insurance commissioner's action in suspending its license for violation of rules specified therein, does not grant right to do business pending court review of commissioner's action in suspending license for insolvency (Pol. Code, §§ 596b, 625a, 631, 633d; Code Civ. Proc. § 1056).

2. Constitutional law ⇐296(1).

Insurance ⇐4.

Statute prohibiting surety company from doing business until deficiency in assets is paid up, though not providing for notice before commissioner suspends company's license for insolvency, held not unconstitutional as denying due process to suspended insolvent company, which had its day in court in mandamus proceeding against commissioner (Code Civ. Proc. § 1056).

Original applications by Walter N. Anderson and another, and by the Benjamin Franklin Bond & Indemnity Corporation, for writs of mandate prayed to be directed to the Superior Court in and for Los Angeles County, Harry H. Archbald, Judge, and to E. Forrest Mitchell, Commissioner of Insurance, to compel acceptance of surety bond.

Prior opinion, 18 P.(2d) 756.

F. E. Davis, of Hollywood, Edward V. Jones, of Los Angeles, and Milton H. Silverberg, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Everett W. Mattoon, County Counsel, and Fred M. Cross, Deputy County Counsel, both of Los Angeles, and Frank L. Guereña, of San Francisco, for respondents.

WORKS, Presiding Justice.

In each of these proceedings the writ of mandate is demanded. In each, upon presentation of petition therefor, and ex parte, an alternative writ was issued. The two proceedings may be determined by a single opinion. Throughout the opinion petitioner Benjamin Franklin Bond & Indemnity Corporation will be referred to as the bond company.

In the first proceeding, Civil No. 8805, it is alleged in the petition that the bond company exists for the purpose, "among others, of making, guaranteeing or becoming a surety" on bonds and undertakings, and that it had, prior to July 1, 1932, "fully complied with all the requirements of the law" of California regulating its formation and its right to transact business within the state, and that, since the date mentioned, it has regularly done business therein; that petitioner Anderson has been appointed a notary public and that it is necessary for him to qualify himself for the office by giving bond to be approved by a judge of respondent court; that on July 1, 1932, respondent insurance commissioner issued to the bond company the certificate of authority to do business provided for by law; that on November 9, 1932, the insurance commissioner "undertook to and did issue an order of suspension and revocation of said certificate of authority" and that he gave due publicity thereto; that on the last-mentioned date the bond company commenced in respondent court an action against the insurance commissioner, and five days later filed an amended and supplemental complaint in the action, all "under section 631 of the Political Code * * * for the purpose of cancelling the said action of the Commissioner in issuing, filing and circulating the said order of suspension and revocation." Section 631 of the Political Code reads, so far as it is material here, as follows: "If at any time the insurance commissioner revokes the certificate of authority theretofore granted to any insurance company, * * * any interested person or company may commence an action against the insurance commissioner for the purpose of reviewing the facts and the law pertinent to the controversy and for the purpose of obtaining the relief refused or for canceling the action of the commissioner. In any such action the court shall have full power to investigate all the facts de novo without regard to the determinations previously made by the commissioner."

A copy of the amended and supplemental complaint is made part of the petition in this proceeding, and it is alleged in the petition that due service of the pleading was made upon the insurance commissioner, service of summons and of the complaint theretofore having been made, and that the action is still pending and undetermined. It is also alleged that on November 16, 1932, the bond company issued to petitioner Anderson a bond in the amount required by law, to qualify him as a notary public, that the same was presented to a judge of respondent court for his approval but that the judge refused and still refuses to approve it, and that he "will, unless compelled so to do, now and continuously hereafter 'pending final determination by the courts of such controversy' refuse to approve any and all bonds or undertakings issued by the" bond company. Speaking with reference to the action above mentioned it is alleged in the petition that "all of the allegations in the original and supplemental complaints or petitions on file therein are true; and no notice or publication as required by section 1056 of the Code of Civil Procedure was ever given or made, and the liabilities of the said plaintiff, Benjamin Franklin Bond and Indemnity Corporation have never exceeded and do not now exceed its assets; it has never conducted and does not now conduct its business fraudulently, but is carrying out and always has carried out its contracts in good faith and has been guilty of no act, thing or deed, either as specified in section 596b of the Political Code, or otherwise or at all, that would justify the suspension or revocation of its said certificate of authority; and said plaintiff Benjamin Franklin Bond and Indemnity Corporation has never been cited to show cause why its certificate of authority should not be suspended or revoked either as provided by said section 596b of the Political Code or otherwise or at all." It is further alleged that "the said action of the said Insurance Commissioner in suspending and revoking said Certificate of Authority was taken wholly without notice, citation, publication, justification or excuse whatsoever, but was done and taken extra-judicially and without probable cause and with malicious intent."

It was and is now the theory of the bond company that, because of the action begun by it against the insurance commissioner in respondent court, its right to do business in California has been restored and that, therefore, it is entitled to the mandate of this court, in effect undoing what the commissioner did in issuing the alleged order of suspension and revocation, and to that end requiring respondent court hereafter to approve bonds or undertakings issued by the bond company. This theory is based upon language of section 633d of the Political Code, which, after referring to actions "against the Insurance Commissioner for the purpose of reviewing the facts pertinent to the controversy and for the purpose of obtaining relief or cancelling the act of the Insurance Commissioner," reads: "Pending final determination by the courts of such controversy, the right of the company or other insurer whose license to do business in the State of California has been revoked or suspended, shall remain unimpaired."

To the petition in Civil No. 8805, respondents presented return that the only "order" made by the insurance commissioner, affecting the bond company and derogating from the certificate of authority issued to it by him on July 1, 1932, was in the form of a letter, copy of which was addressed to the county clerk of every county in the state. The body of this widely circulated letter reads: "In pursuance of the provisions of section 625a of the Political Code of the state of California, this is to certify that the certificate of authority to transact in this state the business of fidelity and surety insurance, heretofore granted to Benjamin Franklin Bond and Indemnity Corporation, has been suspended as provided in section 1056 of the Code of Civil Procedure of California." This letter was dated November 10, 1932. Section 625a of the Political Code reads in part as follows: "Whenever the certificate of authority of any such corporation to do business in this state shall for any reason be surrendered, revoked, canceled, or annulled, or whenever the said certificate of any such corporation has been suspended as provided in section one thousand fifty-six of the Code of Civil Procedure of this state * * * the insurance commissioner of this state shall forthwith certify to the county clerk of each county of this state, the name of such corporation, and the date of such surrender, revocation, cancellation, annulment or suspension. * * *"

It is unnecessary here to set down any of the allegations of the petition in Civil No. 8821. The two proceedings are much alike as to questions presented, were set down for hearing together, were so heard, and were briefed together. It is proper to note, however, that in response to allegations in the petition in 8821, somewhat similar to those contained in the petition in 8805, respondent Mitchell, who is not a party respondent in the last-named proceeding, in his answer and return "denies that a purported examination was made by respondent of petitioner's financial condition and affairs, and denies that a purported deficiency was found by respondent; and in this connection respondent alleges that subsequent to July 1, 1932, respondent actually examined the financial condition and affairs of petitioner and found an actual excess of liabilities over assets in the sum of $190,795.09," and he also admits the allegations of a certain paragraph of the petition "except that the deficiency was a purported deficiency, and alleges that the notice by respondent to petitioner to pay up the deficiency in sixty (60) days was given by respondent in accordance with the direction of section 1056 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California."

Upon the return day petitioners offered no evidence whatever. Respondents offered and the court received in evidence a lengthy report, of date October 8, 1932, to the insurance commissioner, signed by one designated as "Principal Examiner" and approved by one styled "Supervising Examiner." This report relates to the financial standing of the bond company, includes a mass of figures, is accompanied by a number of pertinent exhibits, and ends with this conclusion: "On the basis of this examination and of the financial statement herein presented, the company's capital stock was impaired on July 31, 1932, to the extent of at least $190,795.09, and may in fact be impaired to a still greater extent determinable only upon findings with respect to which the foregoing report contains specific reservations."

No mention of any revocation or suspension of authority to do business, strictly and properly so called, is made in section 1056 of the Code of Civil Procedure. However, in both sections 631 and 633d of the Political Code a revocation or suspension of authority is referred to, and it is in connection with the mention in the latter that a suit against the insurance commissioner to test the "controversy" is provided for, although such a suit is also mentioned in section 631. No such suit is suggested in section 1056 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It will be observed, also, that section 625a of the Political Code, the material portion of which is quoted above, draws a distinction between procedure under section 1056 of the Code of Civil Procedure and other procedure authorized by law, this by means of the few lines of the section beginning with the words "or whenever" and ending with the mention of that Code. It will be seen that section 1056 provides for the very course indicated by the report made to the insurance commissioner by his examiners in the present instance. Section 1056 reads in part "that the insurance commissioner shall have the same jurisdiction and powers to examine the affairs of such corporations as he has in other cases; shall require them to file similar statements and issue to them a similar certificate. And whenever the liabilities of any such corporation shall exceed its assets, the insurance commissioner shall require the deficiency to be paid up in sixty days, and if it is not so paid up, then he shall issue a certificate showing the extent of such deficiency, and he shall publish the same once a week for three weeks, in a daily San Francisco paper."

These proceedings are apparently made complex because of the fact that the Legislature has tied together section 1056 of the Code of Civil Procedure, providing for a publication, after the lapsation of sixty days, in a San Francisco newspaper, and section 625a of the Political Code, providing for letters to the county clerks of the state, but this apparent complexity is far from real. This is because the newspaper notice and the letters to the county clerks were intended by the Legislature for the protection of the public. Whether the notice was given is a point which is of no interest to petitioners. The bond company was duly notified to make good the deficiency in its assets, and whether or not the newspaper notice was published is a wholly immaterial matter here. The material situation at the present moment is that the action taken by the insurance commissioner was pursuant to section 1056 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and because of a deficiency in the assets of the bond company, and not under the terms of section 633d of the Political Code, as will hereafter more fully be shown.

Section 633d of the Political Code, a lengthy and complex enactment, prescribes various rules for the guidance of those organizations, among them such as the bond company, which are subject under the law to the jurisdiction of the insurance commissioner. After laying down these rules, and after making provision for investigations by the commissioner for the purpose of ascertaining whether they have been infringed, the section contains this language: "Any insurance company or other insurer wilfully violating or failing to observe and comply with any of the provisions of this section, applicable thereto, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and punishable by a fine of not exceeding five hundred dollars for each violation thereof, or the insurance commissioner may revoke the license of such company or other insurer for the remainder of the term covered by such license." Following this excerpt comes the provision, already mentioned, for the institution of suits by aggrieved insurance companies for the purpose of procuring a judicial determination as to the correctness of revocations or suspensions of license imposed by the commissioner—as the section puts it, "for the purpose of obtaining relief or canceling the act of the insurance commissioner." It is during the pendency of a suit thus, and by this authority, commenced, that the right of a company to do business "shall remain unimpaired," to state with brevity a portion of the section which has been set forth more specifically in an earlier part of this opinion.

[1] We think the bond company leans upon a broken reed in ascribing the force it does to the language of section 633d of the Political Code to the effect that, pending a determination of a certain suit, the right of such a company to do business in the state "shall remain unimpaired." We think such a suit is authorized by the section merely to test the rightness of action of the insurance commissioner based upon the matters proscribed by section 633d itself. These are matters of infraction of specific inhibitions of the section—specific "don'ts," if it pleases—which companies may not infringe continuously and with impunity. When it comes to the inhibitions of section 1056 of the Code of Civil Procedure the situation is totally different. The settlement of the matters there touched upon cannot, and the Legislature intended they should not, await the comparatively tardy determination of a court of justice. When a company suffers its liabilities to exceed its assets, summary action must be somewhere possible in order to halt the immense damage likely to result from its continuance in the business of giving surety bonds. It would be most unwise to allow this danger to be revived by the mere bringing of an action at law. The necessity for the giving and maintenance of binding and enforceable—or realizable—surety bonds goes hand in hand with the due administration of justice itself. No one can say that the power to take summary steps in such matters, reposed in the insurance commissioner by section 1056, is ill-placed or that the Legislature in so placing it acted inadvisedly or unconstitutionally. We should here assert, for we have omitted the remark thus far, that section 1056, provides, in terms, that until an ascertained deficiency in assets is paid up, "such company shall not do business in this state." This one provision stands effectually in opposition to the argument of petitioners. Certainly, to our minds, the bond company, under the facts here, is not protected by the clause in section 633d of the Political Code upon which it so confidently relies.

[2] Much of what we have said above is a repetition of matter contained in an opinion rendered by us in the two proceedings some time ago. At the conclusion of our former opinion we rendered judgment in each proceeding that the alternative writ of mandate be vacated and that a peremptory writ be denied. A petition for a rehearing of both proceedings was presented by petitioners, and it was granted. The rehearing was allowed to the end that we might give due consideration to the claim that section 1056 of the Code of Civil Procedure is unconstitutional because parties situated as is the bond company now are denied due process of law under it. In presenting the claim petitioners rely upon Porter v. Investors' Syndicate, 286 U. S. 461, 52 S. Ct. 617, 76 L. Ed. 1226. We think, however, that the situation exhibited by that case is very different from the one presented here. There a state commissioner, acting administratively and not judicially, had attempted to prescribe certain rules affecting the conduct of businesses which were in progress under permits which had been previously issued by him. The rules were designed to modify the nature of such businesses, and therefore to affect profits, without opportunity to be heard, and a statute of the state forbade a resort to the courts as a corrective after the rules were announced and before they took effect, but allowed the corrective only after final judgment to be rendered after the harm had been done. It is true that section 1056 of our Code of Civil Procedure does not provide for notice before the taking of such action as was taken by the insurance commissioner in the instance now before us, but the order of suspension issued by him, if his course be considered as an order of suspension, could not take effect under the statute short of sixty days after it was promulgated, for the section provides, and the order required, that the deficiency in the bond company's assets be made good within that period. The fact that the bond company was accorded due process of law under the laws of the state is evident from the institution and progress of the very proceedings which now engross our attention. Petitioners in the two present proceedings invoked the writ of mandate as a means whereby to halt what they considered as the headlong course of the commissioner, and alternative writs of mandate were issued upon ex parte presentations. Upon return to the writs, an issue was presented as to whether the commissioner's action was supported by the evidence adduced before him. As we have already shown, evidence was presented to us upon but one side of this question. This evidence furnished an ample support for the ruling of the commissioner. The bond company has had its day in court, and it has not been denied, but has been fully accorded, due process of law under the statutes of the state.

In each Civil No. 8805 and Civil No. 8821 the alternative writ of mandate is vacated and a peremptory writ is denied.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Seibert L. Sefton, of San Francisco, for the People.

DESMOND, Justice pro tem.

Defendant was found guilty by a jury of the crime of attempt to commit incest and sentenced to San Quentin state prison. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

One John Wilemon testified that, armed with a revolver, he had secreted himself in a bedroom closet at the home of defendant's daughter Anna, a married woman, referred to occasionally hereinafter as Mrs. N——; that he entered the closet upon his observing the defendant come up the walk toward the front porch of Mrs. N——'s home about 7 o'clock of the evening of August 17, 1932, while he and Mrs. N—— were alone in the house, Mrs. N——'s husband having gone to work a few hours previously; that shortly after defendant's arrival at Mrs. N——'s house, this witness surprised him in the act of attempting to have sexual intercourse with Mrs. N——, his own daughter, against her objection, the witness describing in detail the position in which he found the defendant and Mrs. N—— on the bed as he opened the closet door, the revolver grasped in his right hand. The defendant claimed in his testimony that he was the victim of a "frame-up", that his intention in going to the bedroom with his daughter was at her request to examine the wound left in her side by a recent operation, which the daughter complained had not been a complete success, the defendant having had some experience with wounds and operations during a period of twelve to fourteen years while serving as a nurse or orderly in the hospital at Soldiers' Home, Sawtelle. Defendant testified that his daughter, after he had visited her that same afternoon, had followed him to his automobile as he was leaving for home and asked him for $200 to lift the burden of debt weighing upon herself and her husband, suggesting that defendant could easily borrow $1,500; that he said he could not give her the amount desired, but would consider the request for assistance and would return that night, if possible, with some money to meet current pressing needs; that Wilemon was in Mrs. N——'s house at the time he had this conversation by the street curb, but the daughter's husband had gone to work shortly after defendant arrived that afternoon. Defendant further testified that when he returned that same evening he had $9 which he intended to give to his daughter; that the latter persuaded him to stay a little while and when he entered the bedroom for the purpose of examining Mrs. N——'s wound, Wilemon and the daughter together disrobed him, the former taking off his trousers, the latter his shoes, while Wilemon kept him covered with the gun; Wilemon, on the other hand, testifying that when he opened the closet door and pointed the gun at defendant, he was already undressed, except as to underwear and socks. It is undisputed that defendant was kept thus disrobed and under the threat of the revolver for some two or three hours in the bedroom, and that in the meantime two men who were summoned by the daughter by telephone came in and saw him while he was in that condition; that about 10 p. m. defendant was permitted to return to his home, where his wife (not the mother of Mrs. N——) was ill, Mrs. N—— driving him there, defendant sitting in the auto seat between her and Wilemon; that the two men who had been called to her house by Mrs. N—— followed in another auto; that defendant refused to leave his own home when requested to return to the daughter's house by Wilemon, and later at about 11 p. m. was arrested, having gone to bed after the escorting party had left his house. Defendant testified that while he was held en deshabille in the bedroom of his daughter's house, Wilemon demanded that he pay the sum of $1,500 to the daughter and himself, saying he was to receive $500 of that amount; he also testified that his daughter had urged him, after she had talked with Wilemon in the adjoining hallway, to meet the latter's demands, and indicated by his testimony that the daughter was forced to play her part in the drama through some dominance acquired over her previously by Wilemon, the defendant stating that he did not blame his daughter for what was done. It may be noted here that defendant and the mother of Mrs. N—— had been divorced many years previously when Mrs. N—— was a very young child, and that thereafter Mrs. N—— made her home, until her marriage, with her mother, not with defendant. Meantime the mother of Mrs. N—— and the defendant married other spouses. Wilemon swore that when he caught the defendant in flagrante delicto, the latter offered him $1,000 for his freedom and later increased the amount by $500, but all offers were refused, the witness preferring to hold defendant until the daughter's husband should "settle" with him.

Wilemon testified over strenuous and repeated objections that after leaving O'Bryan's home, he drove the daughter to the police station and that the daughter there complained to Officer Whitehead concerning her treatment at the hands of defendant. The record reads as follows:

"Q. By Mr. Ferguson (Deputy Dist. Atty.): You testified that you came out to the car from O'Bryan's home and found Mrs. N—— at the car? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did you go anywhere with Mrs. N—— at that time?

"Mr. Dalzell: Just a minute; to that we object as incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial. This is after the offense alleged and anything that is done by Mr. Wilemon or Mr. N—— (undoubtedly this should be Mrs. N——) outside of the presence of the defendant is absolutely immaterial, has nothing to do with any of the issues in this case.

"The Court: Let me have the question and answer again. (Question and answer read by the reporter.)

"The Court: Objection overruled.

"Q. By Mr. Ferguson: Did you, Mr. Wilemon? A. I went to the police station in Sawtelle.

"Q. Directly from O'Bryan's home? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. About what time did you arrive at the police station?

"Mr. Dalzell: May it be understood, your Honor, we are making the same objection to all these questions?

"The Court: Yes. A. Around 11 o'clock; it was something like that.

"Mr. Ferguson: May the answer be repeated by the reporter? (Answer read by the reporter.)

"Q. That station, you say, was the West Los Angeles Police Station? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Upon arrival there, who did you see? A. I asked for an officer, and I think—

"Q. Just who did you see, Mr. Wilemon? A. I seen Mr. Whitehead and Mr. Davis.

"Q. This is Mr. Whitehead, the man to whom you refer? A. That is one of the gentlemen, yes.

"Q. Now, did you and Anna N—— talk to those two officers at that time?

"Mr. Dalzell: The same objection, your Honor. A. She did.

"The Court: The same ruling.

"Q. By Mr. Ferguson: At that time and place did Anna N—— make a complaint to Mr. Whitehead and Mr. Davis, the two officers you have mentioned?

"Mr. Dalzell: Just a minute. We object to that—"The Court: You may answer that 'yes' or 'no'.

"Mr. Dalzell: Just a minute.

"A. Yes.

"Mr. Dalzell: I wish to assign counsel's asking of the question as misconduct.

"The Court: Objection overruled.

"Q. By Mr. Ferguson: Was that complaint concerning lewd and lascivious conduct upon her committed by the defendant O'Bryan?

"Mr. Dalzell: To that we object as incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, and an attempt to get hearsay into the record by an indirect method.

"The Court: You may answer the question 'yes' or 'no'. Objection overruled. A. Yes.

"Mr. Dalzell: We assign the asking of the question as misconduct.

"The Court: You may proceed.

"Q. By Mr. Ferguson: How long did you and Anna N—— remain at the police station? A. Until about 1 o'clock, I should judge. Something like that.

"Q. That would be 1 o'clock on the morning of the 18th? A. In the morning, yes.

"Q. Do you recall now the day of the week the 17th was on? A. The best I can remember it was on a Thursday."

Officer Whitehead's testimony on direct examination was as follows:

"By Mr. Ferguson: Q. Mr. Whitehead, you are a Detective Lieutenant of the Los Angeles City Police Force, are you not? A. I am.

"Q. On the 17th day of August of this year, where were you working? A. At West Los Angeles Division.

"Q. Where is the station of that division located? A. Located at 1653 Perdue Avenue, West Los Angeles.

"Q. On the night of August 17th of this year did you see a person who has been described at this case as Anna N——? A. I did.

"Q. Where were you when you first saw her? A. In the police station.

"Q. Was that the first time, to your knowledge, that you had ever seen the woman? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What time did you say that was about? A. Approximately 10:30 p. m.

"Q. Was there anyone present with you at the time you first saw Mrs. N——? A. Mr. Wilemon.

"Q. Anyone else? A. Not at the first time. Shortly thereafter I called Mr. Davis, my partner at that time.

"Q. Did Mr. Wilemon and Mrs. N—— come into the police station? A. They did.

"Q. You saw them in one of the rooms of the police station? A. I did.

"Q. At that time and place did Anna N—— make a complaint to you concerning a lascivious attack committed upon her by her father, O'Bryan, the defendant in this case?

"Mr. Dalzell: Just a minute. We object to that as incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, hearsay, a statement not in the presence of this defendant.

"The Court: Objection overruled. You may answer 'yes' or 'no'. A. Yes, sir.

"Mr. Ferguson: Cross-examine.

"Mr. Dalzell: No questions."

Wilemon was permitted to testify, over defendant's objection, to a conversation between defendant and his daughter in the early morning of August 8th, after the defendant had spent the night at the home of his daughter, occupying the bedroom in which he was apprehended ten days later. Wilemon testified that during the preceding night he and the daughter had occupied the living room of the house, he sleeping on a duofold and Mrs. N—— on a day bed. As to this testimony the record reads as follows:

"Q. By Mr. Ferguson: Did you have any discussion with O'Bryan concerning him staying there that night? A. Yes, I offered to take him home.

"Q. And what did he say? A. He first said that he would let me take him home, and then he backed out; he wouldn't go.

"Q. Did he say anything else? A. He said he would go to bed back there, and he did, went to bed in Mrs. N——'s bedroom.

"Q. What bed did he occupy? A. The bed in the back bedroom.

"Q. That is the same bedroom, of course, that you have previously testified about? A. Yes, sir, it is.

"Q. Did you hear any conversation between O'Bryan and Mrs. N—— the night of the 7th?

"Mr. Dalzell: I object to that as incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, and that it cannot have any bearing on any issue in this case.

"Mr. Ferguson: I think that it will have, your Honor. I would be glad to state my purpose if we may approach the bench.

"The Court: I think you had better. I do not see the point at the present time. (The following proceedings were had at the Judge's bench, out of the hearing of the jury):

"Mr. Ferguson: I expect the witness to testify in response to the pending question that on the night of the 7th, the defendant in this case offered Anna N—— $90.00 to go back in the bedroom with him, and perhaps additions to that, which additions are matters which would suggest a proffered act of sexual intercourse.

"Mr. Dalzell: I object to that, Mr. Ferguson. The witness could hear what you were saying.

"The Court: Perhaps we should be more careful and not make any further offers of proof up at the bench.

"Mr. Ferguson: Well, I suggest that your Honor ask the witness if he heard what I said, and if he did, I will withdraw the question.

"The Court: Did you hear any part of what we were discussing, Mr. Wilemon?

"The Witness: I was not paying any attention to you, Judge, at all.

"Mr. Dalzell: I insist upon my objection.

"The Court: The objection is overruled. (The following proceedings were had in the presence and hearing of the jury):

"Mr. Ferguson: Will you read the question, Mr. Reporter? (Question read by the reporter as follows: 'Q—Did you hear any conversation between O'Bryan and Mrs. N—— the night of the 7th?') A. Well, I heard a conversation about 6 o'clock in the morning. I didn't hear any during the night.

"Q. Would that be the morning of the 8th? A. Yes, it would be the morning of the 8th.

"Q. Where were you when you heard that conversation? A. I was laying on the duofold.

"Q. Where was Anna N——? A. She was over by the kitchen door, the best I remember. I wouldn't say positively she was by the kitchen door, but she was there in the room.

"Q. And could you tell where the defendant O'Bryan was? A. He was in the front room. I was laying with my face to the wall, and my back towards where they were at.

"Q. How close were they together, that is, O'Bryan and Anna N——, at that time? A. I didn't see them; I just heard them talk.

"Q. And what did you hear on that occasion? A. I heard him tell her that he had $90.00 for her if she would have come back when he called that night. He said, 'You know when I called you back I had $90.00 for you if you come back there, but I guess you were afraid of your cowboy friend.'

Wilemon had previously testified that he was a rodeo entertainer, and presumably could be classed as a cowboy, although that had not been his sole occupation. After Wilemon had given the testimony last quoted, he was asked under cross-examination if he had ever mentioned this conversation of August 8th between defendant and his daughter in any of the proceedings in this cause, there having been two former trials in which the jury had failed to bring in a verdict. This question the witness was not permitted to answer, the district attorney objecting on the ground of immateriality. Later, the defendant gave his own version of the incident, denying any such conversation, but saying that in the early morning of August 8th he had gone into the living room to get his keys and found Wilemon and Mrs. N—— occupying the same bed. On cross-examination defendant was asked if this occasion was not the first on which he told what he had seen on this morning of August 8th. Objection was made on the ground that the inquiry was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, but the objection was overruled, the defendant required to answer and did so, in the affirmative.

[1-3] Appellant claims on this appeal that all the quoted testimony relative, first, to the complaint, second, to the conversation of August 8th, was improperly admitted. We proceed therefore immediately to a discussion of this contention. We think it may be fairly stated as the general rule that evidence as to the complaints of an outraged woman may be admitted only as corroborating or sustaining her testimony, and that when she does not appear as a witness, even the fact that she made complaint, however recently after the injury, is not admissible. There is an exception to this rule in the case of a child too young to testify, the courts holding that testimony as to the complaint in such case and under certain circumstances may be given by the person to whom complaint is made. People v. Figueroa, 134 Cal. 159, 162, 66 P. 202; People v. Bianchino, 5 Cal. App. 633, 636, 91 P. 112. We know of no other exception. Whether the alleged victim of the assault in this case would have testified that she made complaint to the police officers we shall never know, because she died before the case first came to trial. Having in mind the fact that testimony of a complaint made as soon as possible after an attack is admissible in the case of an adult victim of rape to demonstrate the fact that the act was committed against her will, and knowing that instead of making an immediate complaint the woman alleged to have been injured in this case did not telephone the police or go to the police station, if at all, until approximately four hours after the time of the offense charged, and then only after defendant had refused to go back to her house at the point of Wilemon's gun there to settle with her husband we seriously doubt whether the admission of her own testimony on these points would have been justified. If it be urged that she is dead and cannot testify, and therefore that the testimony of Wilemon and the police officers was properly admitted as in the case of a child unable to testify, then we must rule against that contention, a compelling reason being furnished by the nature of the inquiries made by the district attorney and the answers thereto. We need only quote here the well-known rules set out in 22 California Jurisprudence page 385: "Particulars of Complaint.—While the fact of complaint is admissible in evidence, the particulars or details thereof may not be shown. Any statement as to the name of the perpetrator by the prosecutrix is, therefore, inadmissible, unless made merely to identify the complaint and not for the purpose of disclosing the guilty party." In addition to cases there cited, see, also, People v. Avila, 50 Cal. App. 228, 230, 194 P. 768, 769, where it is said "the true rule is to admit evidence of the fact of complaint in all cases, and in no case to admit anything more. The evidence, when restricted to this extent, is not hearsay, but in the strictest sense original, evidence. When, however, these limits are exceeded, it becomes hearsay in a very objectionable form. There is every reason, therefore, why it should be admitted to the extent indicated, and none why it should be admitted further." Citing People v. Mayes, 66 Cal. 597, 6 P. 691, 56 Am. Rep. 126; 3 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 213.

[4, 5] As in the Avila Case, where evidence over defendant's objection was adduced from the officer who arrested defendant, we must say here that the court in ruling that such evidence was admissible committed prejudicial error. As to the testimony given by Wilemon over objections of the defendant, regarding a conversation which he says he overheard between defendant and Mrs. N—— on the morning of August 8th, we feel that it was improperly admitted. Conversation is not a crime, nor is it an attempt to commit a crime. To constitute an attempt there must be an act done with the intention of committing a crime tending to but falling short of the act intended. 7 Cal. Jur. p. 875. See discussion of this subject by Field, C. J., in People v. Murray, 14 Cal. 159, where defendant was indicted for an attempt to contract an incestuous marriage. As is said in Ex parte Floyd, 7 Cal. App. 588, 590, 95 P. 175, 176, "Mere soliciting one to commit an act which would constitute a crime, if committed, is not made criminal by our Penal Code."

We are familiar with the rule invoked by respondent to support the admission of the testimony complained of, namely, that evidence of similar offenses between the same parties may be introduced for specific and limited purposes, in prosecutions involving sexual crimes. But neither the events nor conversation of August 7th and the early morning of August 8th constituted an offense of any sort, similar or otherwise. Whether evidence relating to them was introduced at the first or second trial, we do not know, but such evidence, if believed by the jury in this case, of course, worked serious prejudice to the defendant, perhaps just enough to enable this third jury to find defendant guilty. We have read the entire transcript in this case and have considered other points urged by appellant; however, find it unnecessary to discuss them, since on the matters already referred to, his position on this appeal must be sustained.

Judgment and order reversed.

ARCHBALD, Justice pro tem.

Action by plaintiff to recover from defendants an alleged secret commission claimed to have been obtained by them in acting as agents for plaintiff in the leasing of certain prospective oil lands. From a judgment rendered against them defendants have appealed.

The contentions of appellants are many, but we think the material ones may well be summed up and considered as a claim that the findings are not supported by the evidence.

The findings state, in substance, that plaintiff was the owner of certain lands adjacent to the Santa Fe Springs oil field; that defendant Wingert was an attorney and defendant Koon a licensed real estate broker; that Wingert and Koon entered into an agreement, which was in effect at all times mentioned, wherein and whereby Koon agreed to open up and operate a real estate and insurance office, to keep an itemized account of all operations and furnish Wingert with a monthly statement of such operations, and after deducting operating expenses the net profits were to be divided equally between the two; that Wingert on his part was to pay to Koon $150 on the 1st day of each and every month; that plaintiff had no knowledge of such agreement; that Wingert was at all times mentioned in the complaint employed by plaintiff as her attorney; that on or about July 10, 1928, "for the purpose of secretly and without the knowledge of the plaintiff securing the right to sell or lease her property," and for the further purpose of "secretly and without plaintiff's knowledge, deriving a financial benefit through such handling of her property and sharing such financial benefit" with Koon, Wingert introduced the latter to plaintiff and "represented to her that he was a reliable real estate broker and one to whom she should [sic] entrust the handling of said property," and that he (Wingert) would act as her legal adviser in all matters handled by Koon; that relying upon said representations plaintiff employed Koon to represent her "in the matter of any sale or lease" of said property; that she "promised to pay" Koon, "as compensation * * * for any sale or lease thereof" a commission of 5 per cent., and that the latter agreed to accept the same as compensation for his services; that during the months of August, September, and October of 1928 defendants, acting through Koon, represented to plaintiff that it was necessary for her to execute and deliver to Koon various instruments for the purpose of showing to prospective lessees that he was authorized to execute a lease for said property; that, believing such representations to be true and relying thereon, "the plaintiff executed and delivered to said defendant Koon, but only for the purpose aforesaid, various instruments, which said instruments, however, in fact, purported to give to said defendant Koon an option to lease said property for his own use"; that on or about October 3, 1928, "with intent to deceive and defraud" plaintiff, and to enable defendants "secretly to derive a financial benefit at the expense and to the detriment of plaintiff," the defendants, acting through Koon, represented that the latter had secured a lessee for said property, and "falsely and fraudulently represented to plaintiff that the highest and only consideration or amount which said lessee was willing to pay for the use of said property under such lease" was $10,000 cash and other consideration out of the proceeds of the oil produced; that relying upon said false and fraudulent "representations," and "believing the same to be true," she executed two leases of the property, one covering the east half and the other the west half, to one Alfred L. Marsten; that in truth and in fact said Marsten had offered $15,000 cash to said Koon and a certain royalty to be paid out of production; that defendants retained $5,000 thereof for their own use and benefit and paid plaintiff $10,000 only; "that plaintiff has acknowledged her willingness to pay defendants the sum of $750.00 as compensation in full" for the services rendered by them; that plaintiff executed the oil lease option agreement attached to the answer of defendants "upon the representation of the defendants, acting through Koon, that it was necessary for her to execute the same for the purpose of enabling said defendant to show prospective lessees that he was authorized to negotiate a lease of said property on her behalf," and that it was executed "relying upon said representation, and solely for the purpose aforesaid."

The findings were evidently prepared by the court, a copy was sent to counsel for each party, and an order made permitting the filing of an amended complaint to "conform to proof" in accordance with such findings, the allegations thereof to be "deemed denied." Judgment was entered for $4,250 of the alleged secret commission, being the $5,000 paid Koon by Marsten less $750 allowed for compensation.

[1] It is not clear from plaintiff's testimony when the introduction of herself to Koon was made by Wingert, but the testimony of Koon fixes it as of July 10, 1928, and so do the findings. Nor is the service that Koon was to render made any more definite by the evidence of plaintiff. The latter quotes defendant Wingert as saying of Koon at the time of the introduction, "He is a man of considerable experience; I know he will be a man that will treat you fair and handle your property in the right way"; to which she said Koon responded after acknowledging the introduction, that "he thought he could put over a deal for us, or work up a deal that would be satisfactory to us," and that Wingert said "the customary commission was 10%," but that "Mr. Koon had agreed to do this and work it up for 5%." Mr. Wingert admitted that he said to Mrs. Keck, substantially, "that Mr. Koon's compensation would ordinarily be 10%, but on this deal I think he is willing to take 5%," and that thereafter Koon entered into negotiations with respondent. Koon's testimony is to the effect that after the introduction Wingert said that Mrs. Keck "had some property out at Santa Fé Springs" that "she was trying to dispose of,"

and asked if he would look at it "and try to dispose of it for her"; that respondent asked as to his fee "in case I made a sale of the property, and I told her that real estate code of ethics put a 5% commission on a sale." It will be seen that the only definite statement as to what he was to do for the 5 per cent. commission was to sell the property. This definite testimony as to what was to be done by Koon for the 5 per cent. commission is not controverted. In view of the evidence we fail to see how the finding that "plaintiff employed Koon as her agent * * * and particularly to represent her in the matter of any sale or lease" of said property, and at "a commission of five per cent. of all moneys that might be obtained upon any such sale or lease," can be upheld. Koon interested certain people in paying $1,000 for a three days' option to buy a part of the property and to lease a part of it. The option was not taken up and the $1,000 was forfeited to Mrs. Keck.

[2-4] A new well came in on the Santa Fé Springs field and Koon came to the conclusion that a lease might be made to the advantage of respondent. A written thirty-day option to lease her property was made by Mrs. Keck in favor of Koon, dated August 20, 1928, calling for a cash consideration of $15,000, $25,000 to be paid out of 15 per cent. of the first oil production and a royalty of one-sixth of production, a well to be spudded in within sixty days from date of the lease. With regard to this option respondent testified on direct examination to the following conversation with Koon, evidently after her first reading of it: "Mr. Koon, this looks like a straight option from me to you," to which she stated he replied, "It doesn't mean anything at all except this: these big companies won't allow me to come into their offices unless I have some kind of a paper," the witness adding, "and we had asked him to try to lease the place to a big company." She was then asked, "And you signed the agreement?" to which she answered, "I signed it." The witness then identified another "Oil Lease Option Agreement," dated August 24, 1928, and testified that it was signed by herself and defendant Koon. This instrument was the same as the first, except that it was a ninety-day option instead of thirty days, the cash bonus was $10,000 instead of $15,000 and the well was required to be spudded in within one hundred and twenty days instead of sixty. Both options were introduced as plaintiff's exhibits. With regard to the second option, the attention of plaintiff was called by her attorney to the bonus of $10,000 cash provided for therein, "it appearing there have been some erasures," and she was asked whether or not at the time she signed it "the words ten thousand dollars cash appeared in it," to which she replied: "This is the paper Mr. Koon showed me the evening in Mr. Wingert's office that had been erased, and it was in figures, and then later it had been erased, or looked as though it had been erased or something. It is in letters now." The witness was then asked: "The question is was that $10,000 or $15,000?" to which she replied, "It was $15,000.00. Q. At the time you first saw it? A. Yes." The court then asked plaintiff "whether the words 'ten thousand dollars' and the figures '$10,000.00' appeared in the document at the time" she signed it. To this the witness answered: "I haven't the duplicate of this—I don't know where—I kept all my papers together, but at the end I came to find out my papers were not dated like this paper was. I didn't have any 24th; but we were holding out for $15,000.00, and the evening we were in Mr. Wingert's office I discovered this had been $15,000.00—according to my memory it was $15,000.00, and I discovered it had been $15,000 and had been erased and put $10,000.00." This evasive answer did not satisfy and Mrs. Keck was again asked if the $10,000 was there at the time she signed the paper; her reply being: "I have nothing to go by except my memory. I know we were holding out for $15,000 and I haven't a duplicate of those papers. The fact that we were claiming and wanting $15,000 and trying to get $15,000, and then when I asked Mr. Koon to let me see this option paper he bet me $100.00 I couldn't produce one like it, and I said to him, 'you know the reason why'"—at which point the witness was interrupted by the question: "You haven't answered the court's question, madam. You can answer it yes or no. In this document to which you have just referred, at the time you signed it, had the figures been changed from $15,000 to $10,000?" After this instruction to the witness to answer the question "Yes" or "No," she replied, "No, sir." Apparently the court was still not satisfied, as the following question was next asked: "What was the amount, so far as those figures were concerned, at the time you signed the document?" to which the plaintiff responded, rather evasively, "As well as I remember they were $15,000.00."

The testimony of Koon is to the effect that, when he first talked to Mrs. Keck, the commission he named and the one to which the conversation related was on the basis of a sale of the property. He then goes on: "But after I went into the deal and this other well out there came in the property got more valuable for leasing. Then I went to her and explained to her that in trying to lease the property I wanted an option to work on, and that I would get my profit out of the other people, and she would know in advance what she was getting out of the property. And she gave me the option of the 20th and I gave it back to her on the 23rd." The witness had previously testified that the commission in leasing prospective oil property was a matter of agreement and was not fixed by the realty board rules. There was no conflict in the evidence as to such statements. Defendant Koon further testified that on his next visit after receiving the option of August 20th, and which was evidently on August 23rd, when he "took it [the option] back to her," he told Mrs. Keck—and there is no conflicting evidence on this point—"that the oil men were kicking on the 60-day drilling clause," and asked her "to give me another option with a 120-day drilling clause in place of the one for 60 days, and she agreed to do so. I went up and had one prepared on the 24th day of August," which "read $15,000 cash and drilling in 120 days." And: "When I went down to Mrs. Keck's on the 24th Mrs. Keck said that the family had decided they would rather take a less cash bonus and get it in the hands of someone who would drill quicker, than to hang out for five or ten thousand dollars more cash bonus and take a chance on someone else proving out the field and drilling close to them; and for that reason they agreed that evening of the 24th before the papers were signed to change it from $15,000 to $10,000." Koon stated that he took both copies of the agreement back to his office and had the stenographer make the change from $15,000 to $10,000, which she did by erasing the former and inserting the latter amount with her typewriter in both copies. The stenographer's testimony corroborates that of defendant Koon in regard to such change. After the change was made, according to his testimony, Koon took both copies, then unsigned, to plaintiff, who read them over and called his attention to the fact that the option period was extended from thirty to ninety days, whereupon he asked her if that was satisfactory and she said it was, that each of them signed both copies, and that he left one with Mrs. Keck.

The evidence shows without dispute that on August 25th plaintiff executed another option to purchase the west six acres of the property mentioned for $20,000 cash and to lease the east four acres thereof for a bonus of $10,000, to be paid out of the first 15 per cent. of the oil produced, good for three days and made as an alternate to the option of August 24th. This was followed by an option covering the whole property, dated October 3, 1928, good for ten days, also made "as an alternate" to the option of August 24th, providing for no cash bonus but for $35,000 to be paid out of the first 15 per cent. of oil produced. Each option in effect grants to L. A. Koon, erroneously designated "optioner," his heirs or assigns, the exclusive right and privilege of leasing the property for the purpose of prospecting or drilling for oil, gas, or other hydrocarbon substances on the terms and within the time stated therein. The option of August 24th, under which it appears the lease was finally made, reads: "It is specifically understood that owner [Katie Keck] is to execute oil lease to optioner [Koon] or his assigns, at his or their request." It appears that each option, with the exception of that of August 24, was specially designed to fit a deal with particular parties with whom Koon was working, and that he had no success until he met Alfred L. Marsten of San Francisco, about October 3d, and finally concluded negotiations with him. During such negotiations the option of August 24th was shown Marsten, who thereupon, according to Koon's testimony, asked what he (Koon) wanted, to which the latter replied, "$5000.00, 2% overriding and $5000.00 out of oil." Two leases were executed on October 9, 1923, between plaintiff and Marsten, in accordance with the option agreement of August 24th, except that, complying with plaintiff's request, two leases were made instead of one, one covering the east half and the other the west half of her property. No oil was found on the premises so leased, and before the trial date herein the owner of the leases had quitclaimed his rights to plaintiff.

The deposition of Marsten is to the effect that the cash price named in the option shown him was $15,000, and that Koon was to get $5,000 out of oil and a gross overriding royalty of 2 per cent. That he was confused in the amount named in the option agreement is clearly shown from figures prepared by himself at the time and handed to his lawyer with instructions to draw up the lease. Such figures show how the amounts agreed upon between himself and Koon were to be divided. The memo thereof was introduced in evidence by the attorney for Mr. Marsten, and reads as follows:

	Owner	Koon
Percentage	16-2/3%	2%
Cash	10,000	5,000
Oil	25,000	5,000

The testimony of the attorney corroborated that of Koon as to the instrument reading $10,000 to plaintiff at the time he saw it, and is to the effect that he drew the lease in accordance with such instruction.

The conversation hereinbefore referred to which took place in the office of appellant Wingert, and during which the offer to bet $100 was made by respondent, occurred in the latter part of January or the first part of February of 1929. At the time there were present the defendant Wingert, an associate of his, Mr. Nicholas, Koon, Mrs. Keck, and her attorney, Mr. Luth. With regard to the wager of $100, plaintiff and her attorney testified that it referred to the production of a copy of the option of August 24th, the other witnesses that it went only to the production of an option of that date with the sum $15,000 appearing therein. Mrs. Keck apparently had duplicates of all the other option agreements, but strangely enough the particular one in question was missing. Evidently there is no denial that Koon gave her a copy of the option of August 24th, and there is no denial of the fact that under the lease she signed with Marsten she was only to get $10,000. Respondent rests her contention on the claim that she did not know Koon was to get anything out of the deal except a 5 per cent. commission, which the record shows without dispute she never offered or agreed to pay him at any time, although her sworn complaint alleges that she promised and agreed to pay a commission of 5 per cent. Koon's testimony is to the effect that at the time he took the $10,000 check to respondent in payment of the cash bonus under the Marsten lease, he at the same time exhibited to her his check for $5,000 and told her what he was to get out of the oil produced, and that she said she was "awfully glad" he did that well for himself. This is denied by Mrs. Keck, who testified, however, that she asked Koon two or three days later what he got out of the deal and that he told her, and also that he had given Wingert one-half of it, to which she remarked, "Poor Mr. Wingert, I guess he needed it." No complaint was made by her that she had been deceived or that the $5,000 belonged to her, and there is no showing of the indignant wrath one might expect upon discovering a loss of $5,000 through trickery, as respondent contends.

The evidence shows without dispute that appellant Wingert was seriously ill in a hospital from August 18, 1928, to some time in January of 1929, and knew nothing about the options or the making of the lease until after it was done. Wingert's wife, however, testified that Mrs. Keck called on her on October 11, two days after the negotiations were completed, and gave her some flowers, saying "she was glad Mr. Koon had closed the deal at this time since Mr. Wingert was in the hospital and our expenses must necessarily be very high; she was so glad it was through this deal this money had come to us at this time."

The trial commenced December 3, 1929, and the cause was submitted December 8th. The case was apparently reopened on April 8, 1930, for the purpose of introducing the testimony of two witnesses for defendants, B. J. Bradner, attorney for Mr. Marsten, and Herbert R. MacMillan. We have already alluded to the testimony of Bradner. MacMillan was an oil man with whom Koon was negotiating. He testified that Koon had shown him the option of August 20th on August 23d; that a few days later Koon returned and exhibited the option agreement of August 24th, and at that time the witness noticed that the cash bonus to be paid respondent was $10,000 instead of $15,000, as in the former option; that in the latter part of September or the first of October he went with Koon to call on Mrs. Keck; that the agreement of August 24th was on the table when they were talking; that he told respondent he understood she was to get $10,000 in cash and $25,000 out of oil, and that he was "to pay Mr. Koon $5,000 in cash and $5,000 in oil and a 2% royalty out of oil"; that she said "she was very glad to see Mr. Koon get the money as he had worked hard on the deal." It appears that one of the "sticking points" in the negotiations with MacMillan was a cloud on the title which he (MacMillan) wanted "lifted." In the agreement finally concluded with Marsten that burden was assumed by him. During the conversation above referred to Mrs. Keck's daughter was present. Mrs. Keck denied that MacMillan said he was to pay her $10,000 and Koon $5,000. The daughter, however, was not so positive, stating that "as far as she could recollect" there was nothing said as to that.

We have gone into the details of evidence that might on its face seem conflicting more than we should, but it is deemed important in view of the conclusion that we are forced to make, i. e., that there is no real conflict on material matters. It is clear that Mrs. Keck knew what she was signing at the time she executed the first option agreement; that the agreement was signed voluntarily and without fraud on the part of any one; that thereafter she executed in a similar manner three other options along lines that seemed to fit negotiations being conducted by Koon; that the one of August 25th called for no cash bonus, but for a bonus of $10,000 to be paid out of oil; and that respondent attempted to avoid the effect of such documents, and particularly the one of August 24th, by the statement that Koon told her they did not mean anything except that he needed them to get into the offices of the big companies. There is no ambiguity in the option last referred to, or in any of them, and no room for interpretation of terms and meaning; and we know of no principle that permits one who has executed a document which is clear on its face, with a knowledge of what it means to set it at naught on such evidence as appears in the record of this case. It has been frequently held that oral testimony which rests upon the memory of witnesses is not as trustworthy as written or documentary evidence, and that a party seeking to establish a fact contrary to the written evidence must make out his case with more than usual clearness. Von Dorn v. Crary, 198 App. Div. 931, 189 N. Y. S. 252, 258. "A written instrument unquestionably executed by a person by whom it purports to have been made * * * cannot be properly condemned as false and fraudulent except upon clear and satisfactory evidence." Russell v. Scofield, 134 Wis. 21, 113 N. W. 1094, 1095. The evidence in this case shows no real conflict on material points (White v. Greenwood, 52 Cal. App. 737, 199 P. 1095), and to set aside clear and unambiguous written instruments and stamp the character of a transaction as fraudulent on the evidence presented here would be a miscarriage of justice.

[5] Defendants have also appealed from the order denying their motion for a new trial. There is no such appeal in civil cases. Section 963, Code Civ. Proc.

The appeal from the order denying motion for new trial is dismissed. The judgment is reversed.

Civ. 7826.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.

June 9, 1933.

As Amended on Denial of Rehearing July 3,

1. Automobiles ⇨245(40).

Evidence of speed of motor vehicle in excess of permissive limits under statute constitutes prima facie evidence for jury's consideration in determining whether driver exercised care (St. 1923, p. 553, § 113).

2. Appeal and error ⇨110.

No appeal lies in civil cases from order denying motion for new trial (Code Civ. Proc. § 963).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Percy Hight, Judge.

Action by Walter Minear Atkins and wife against W. L. Barnum. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying motion for new trial.

Judgment affirmed, and appeal from order dismissed.

Paul Nourse, of Los Angeles (Forrest A. Betts, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

Russell H. Pray, of Long Beach, for respondents.

ARCHIBALD, Justice pro tem.

Action by husband and wife to recover damages to the latter resulting from the alleged negligence of defendant. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendant has appealed.

An automobile driven by defendant north on Linden street in Long Beach collided at the intersection of that thoroughfare and Eighth street with a Ford truck driven by one Eva Bond, who was proceeding easterly on Eighth street, with the result that the truck, struck on the right rear wheel, swung around to the northeast, striking plaintiff Annie Marie Atkins, a pedestrian crossing Eighth street, seriously injuring her.

[1] Appellant does not question the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict and judgment, but urges that the court erred in giving an instruction to the effect that exceeding a given speed made a prima facie case of negligence. The instruction complained of reads: "The law of this state does not make the driving of an automobile at any particular rate of speed necessarily unlawful. The law merely provides that any person driving a vehicle on the public highways of this state shall drive the same at a careful and prudent speed not greater than is reasonable and proper, having due regard to the traffic, surface and width of the highway, and no person shall drive any vehicle upon a public highway at such speed as to endanger the life, limb or property of any other person. But the law does provide that if a person shall drive at a rate of speed in excess of fifteen miles an hour in traversing an intersection of highways when the driver's view is obstructed, within the meaning of the law as stated in these instructions, such fact shall in itself constitute evidence of a violation of the law. Such fact shall not constitute conclusive evidence but will constitute evidence which must be taken into consideration by the jury along with the other evidence in a case in determining whether or not a person driving a vehicle over an intersection drove such vehicle at a careful and prudent speed and at such a speed as not to endanger the life, limb, or property of other persons. Such fact will constitute prima facie evidence and will be sufficient to show negligence on the part of the driver unless the effect of such evidence be overcome by other satisfactory evidence in the case."

It is appellant's contention that, when the Legislature amended section 22 of the then existing California Vehicle Act in 1923 by changing the expressly prohibitory speed limits of the act as they existed theretofore (Stats. 1919, p. 220, § 22 [a]), to permissive limits, and by adding subdivision (c) in the amended section (Stats. 1923, p. 553, § 113), it changed the rule as to speed in excess of such limits being a violation of law and hence evidence of negligence. This court has recently decided this question adversely to such contention. Thompson v. Dentman, 21 P.(2d) 1609. The act as amended in 1923 (Stats. 1923, p. 553) divided the subject-matter of the former section 22 into three subdivisions, (a), (b), and (c), and numbered it 113. The section as so amended, in effect at the time of the happening of the accident here involved, so far as material reads as follows:

"Sec. 113. Restrictions as to Speed. (a) Any person driving a vehicle on the public highways of this state shall drive the same at a careful and prudent speed not greater than is reasonable and proper, having due regard to the traffic, surface and width of the highway, and no person shall drive any vehicle upon a public highway at such a speed as to endanger the life, limb or property of any person.

"(b) Subject to the provisions of subdivision (a) of this section and except in those instances where a lower speed is specified in this act, it shall be lawful for the driver of a vehicle to drive the same at a speed not exceeding the following: * * *

"2. Fifteen miles an hour in traversing an intersection of highways when the driver's view is obstructed. * * *

"(c) In all charges for a violation of this section, speeds in excess of those set forth in subdivision (b) of this section shall be taken as prima facie but not as conclusive evidence of a violation of this section. * * *

It is contended that subdivision (c) relates only to criminal charges, and with that contention we agree. In our opinion, however, appellant is confused in his claim. The usual legislative method of regulation is by prohibiting the doing of an act. The express prohibition in this section is in subdivision (a); i. e., "No person shall drive any vehicle upon a public highway at such a speed as to endanger the life, limb or property of any person." That is the prohibited act made an offense under the California Vehicle Act. Any violation of that positive prohibition would not establish a "prima facie" case of negligence. It would be conclusive evidence of negligence. Scragg v. Sallee, 24 Cal. App. 133, 144, 140 P. 706.

By enacting subdivision (b), however, in our opinion the Legislature prohibits traveling at a speed in excess of the limits fixed therein. Under the plain language of such subdivision, traveling at a speed under the limits set is only lawful when done in accordance with the provisions of subdivision (a). By setting a permissive speed, the Legislature has said that traveling at a speed in excess of such limits is not lawful per se. All that is necessary to make a prima facie case of a violation of subdivision (a) (the positive prohibition), is to show that the limits prescribed by (b) have been exceeded. The burden then shifts under (c) to show that as a matter of fact there has been no violation. In other words, such limits were placed there to establish the boundary between the zone in which travel is prima facie lawful and that in which it is prima facie unlawful. Any other construction of the section would make subdivisions (b) and (c) meaningless.

In the instruction given the court has clearly told the jury that exceeding the limits named in itself constitutes "evidence of a violation of the law"; "not conclusive evidence," but evidence to be taken into consideration by the jury in determining "whether or not a person driving a vehicle over an intersection" drove such vehicle "at a careful and prudent speed and at such a speed as not to endanger the life, limb or property of other persons." We are of the opinion that such instruction correctly and clearly states the law. Similar instructions have been upheld many times by the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal.

[2] Appellant has also appealed from the order denying his motion for a new trial. No such ground of appeal exists in civil cases. Section 963, Code Civ. Proc.

The appeal from the order denying motion for new trial is dismissed. Judgment affirmed.

Civ. 4880.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

May 31, 1933.

Rehearing Denied June 30, 1933.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court July 28,
1933.

1. Mechanics' liens ⇨93.

In action to foreclose mechanic's lien, whether building was adequate to serve purposes for which built held immaterial, where it was erected according to plans and specifications furnished by lessee having contract to purchase.

2. Pleading ⇨126.

In action to foreclose mechanic's lien for erecting building, denial that all land described in lien was necessary for use of such building raised no issue (Code Civ. Proc. § 1185).

The complaint alleged in substance that all of 8-acre tract was required for reasonable and convenient use of preserving building constructed for use in connection with winery and fruit juice factory. The answer recited: "Deny that all of the real property described in said lien * * * is necessary to, or is required for the use of the preserving building alleged to have been constructed by said plaintiffs, * * * and that the building constructed by plaintiff is a small building and covers only a small fractional portion of one acre, and that the remainder of said real property is in no ways connected with, or an adjunct to said building."

3. Appeal and error ⇨983(3).

Mechanics' liens ⇨291(6).

Area to be included in order of sale on foreclosure of lien for erection of building is fact question determinable largely within trial court's discretion, which will not be disturbed unless abused (Code Civ. Proc. § 1185).

4. Mechanics' liens ⇨182.

Determination of area to be covered by mechanic's lien for erection of building must take into consideration intended use for which building is erected (Code Civ. Proc. § 1185).

If building is erected for use as a separate and distinct unit, area of land required for its convenient use may properly be limited to an area necessary for ingress and egress, but, if its use is dependent on, and connected with, uses made of other buildings or uses made of other portions of tract on which it is situated, then, if all the larger tract is required for "the necessary and convenient use" of building involved, such larger tract may properly be included in order of sale.

5. Mechanics' liens ⇨281(1).

Evidence sustained finding that entire 8-acre tract on which preserving building erected for use in connection with other buildings used in winery was necessary "for convenient use and occupation" of preserving building, within statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 1185).

There is a difference between the "necessary and convenient use" within Code Civ. Proc. § 1185, which includes the purpose for which the building is erected, and a distinct and separate use which may prove profitable in the operation or use of the building on which the lien is sought to be foreclosed. The fact that the use might prove profitable cannot be considered unless it is a "necessary and convenient use" and one contemplated in the erection of the building.

6. Mechanics' liens ⇨161(4).

In action to foreclose mechanic's lien for erecting building under cost plus contract, interest held properly allowed from date of filing of complaint, though time of payment was not mentioned in contract (Civ. Code, § 3287).

Record showed that, shortly after filing of complaint, plaintiffs, mechanic lienors, furnished to defendants a bill of particulars showing every item of cost incurred in erection of building, and, since amount of indebtedness or amount owing could be calculated and determined from statement rendered, and statement was found to be true and correct, it was a matter of mere calculation within statute, accuracy of bill of particulars rendered by plaintiffs not being questioned at trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; M. G. Woodward, Judge.

Action by Angelo Anselmo and another against Samuel Sebastiani and others. From an adverse judgment, named defendant and a certain other defendant appeal.

Affirmed.

Charles M. Jones, of Stockton, and Albert Picard, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Glenn West, of Lodi, for respondents.

Mr. Justice PLUMMER delivered the opinion of the court.

The plaintiffs had judgment against appellants for the foreclosure of a lien for and on account of the erection by the plaintiffs of a certain building upon a tract of land belonging to the defendants situate in the town of Woodbridge, county of San Joaquin. From this judgment the defendants Sebastiani and Woodbridge Vineyard Association prosecute this appeal.

It appears from the record that on or about the 6th day of December, 1929, the defendant Salvatore Castorina entered into an agreement with the plaintiffs to erect a certain structure known as a "preserving building," to be situate on the premises belonging to the appellants. The building was erected on a portion of the premises which had been leased by the owners to Salvatore Castorina. It appears that at the time mentioned the appellant Sebastiani had a contract for the purchase of the premises, from the appellant Woodbridge Vineyard Association, and on January 28, 1930, the premises involved herein were conveyed by the Woodbridge Vineyard Association to the appellant Samuel Sebastiani. The premises involved are described as two parcels of land, one containing 5.49 acres and the other as containing 2.5 acres. The parcels, however, are contiguous, and really constitute one tract, and at all the times herein mentioned was known as the "Woodbridge Winery." The premises upon which the preserving building was erected contained five other buildings, all used in connection with the winery. The building erected by the plaintiffs was to be used as a part of the plant. It was not, and is not, in addition to any building theretofore erected and being used by the Woodbridge Winery, but was a building designed to be used in connection therewith in the storing and preservation of pumice, until such time as the pumice might be used in the manufacture of alcohol and such other by-products as might be obtained therefrom. The pumice to be stored in the preserving building was the refuse of grapes, such as seeds and skins, after the juices had been extracted therefrom in the process of making grape juice and wine, carried on in the other buildings, the pumice then being conveyed from the building just referred to and stored in the building, and to be stored in the building erected by the plaintiffs known as the preserving building.

The contract for the building was oral, and was upon a cost plus basis, to wit: That the plaintiffs were to furnish all the material, labor, etc., erect the building according to plans and specifications furnished by an architect, and were to receive as compensation 10 per cent. in addition to the cost.

After the completion of the building, payment not having been made therefor, the plaintiffs filed a lien in which it is set forth that the building cost the sum of $4,527.80, plus 10 per cent. agreed to be paid to the plaintiffs for erecting the building, making a total sum of $4,980.58. Not having received payment, this action was begun for the foreclosure of the lien filed by the plaintiffs. Judgment went for the plaintiffs for the full amount of the lien plus 10 per cent., as just stated, together with interest from the date of the beginning of the action, less the sum of $500 paid on account.

Upon this action the appellants contend that the building was not completed substantially according to the plans and specifications, and that the building was useless for the purposes for which it was constructed, etc.; that the area of land decreed to be sold was far in excess of the land containing a convenient space about the building required for its convenient use and occupation.

It is further contended that the court was in error in allowing interest from the 18th day of March, 1930, the date of beginning of the action, and that the interest should have been allowed only from the date of the entry of judgment.

[1] The court found, upon conflicting evidence, that the building was erected according to the plans and specifications. Whether the building erected according to the plans and specifications was or was not, or is or is not, adequate to serve the purposes for which it was built, is immaterial. The defendant Castorina furnished the plans and specifications, and directed the modifications thereof. The plaintiffs, as found by the court, constructed a building, as we have just stated, according to the plans and specifications. It would serve no useful purpose to review the conflicting testimony relative to certain alleged defects, and it suffices to state that a review of the testimony shows that the findings of the court are amply supported. The testimony is not set out in the briefs, but reference is made to the transcript which we have examined.

[2] The real controversy presented by the appellants relates to the area of land ordered sold, and the allowance of interest. The complaint, after describing the land upon which the buildings to which we have referred are situate, and the erection of the preserving building, contains the following allegation: "That all of said land is required for the reasonable and convenient use of said improvements and addition to said building and structure, to-wit: The addition to said winery and fruit juice factory."

The answer referring to the parcels of land necessary and convenient for the use of the structure erected by the plaintiffs reads as follows: "Deny that all of the real property described in said lien is covered by, or is necessary to, or is required for the use of the preserving building alleged to have been constructed by said plaintiffs, and in that behalf allege that the tract of land described in said lien contains approximately 8 acres, and that the building constructed by plaintiff is a small building and covers only a small fractional portion of one acre, and that the remainder of said real property is in no ways connected with, or an adjunct to said building." This denial, of course, is insufficient to raise an issue, and would preclude our holding that the finding of the court that all of the property was necessary to the convenient use and occupation of the building erected by the plaintiffs, were there no testimony in the record to support the finding.

In the case of California Corrugated Culvert Co., a Corporation, v. Stewart, 215 Cal. 120, on page 123, 8 P.(2d) 1013, we find the following: "In the present case the issue was tendered by the allegation in the complaint that 'the whole of said real property is necessary for the convenient use and occupation of said barn and grain elevator.' The only plea in the answer with reference to the foregoing allegation is as follows: 'Denies that the whole of said real property is necessary for the convenient use and/or occupation of the barn and/or grain elevator.' The denial in this form concedes the truth of the allegation. [Citing a number of cases.] The allegation of the complaint must be deemed admitted, and it was not necessary to find on the fact so admitted. [Citing additional authority.] If the court had found the fact contrary to the admission in the pleading, the finding would be disregarded. [Citing Bradbury v. Cronise, 46 Cal. 287.]"

Without deciding this question upon the failure of the appellants to deny the allegation of the complaint, we will set forth the testimony showing the connection and the use of the building and intended use of the building erected by the plaintiffs, as it relates to the other buildings situate and used on the same tract of land, being testimony of John T. Hunt, witness for plaintiff:

"Q. You have looked over this property, have you? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Approximately 8 acres that is called for in the description set out in the claim of lien? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And the buildings are on that property all told? A. Well, there is a big place where they keep all the wine vats, a winery in general.

"Q. And then there are office buildings? A. Yes, sir. A still house and the sherry house and this pulp house.

"Q. And there are roadways into the winery and out? A. Yes, sir; there would have to be to get around those buildings.

"Q. And also a spur-track? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And this preserving house which was built on these plans and specifications, which you and Anselmo built, is situated right next to the winery and the other buildings? A. Yes, right where they crush the grapes, within 16 or 20 feet.

"Q. How was it used in connection with the winery? A. You mean what they use the pumice for?

"Q. What is its connection with the rest of the building? A. In order to preserve the pumice after the juice is taken out of the grapes.

"Q. That is taken out of the grapes in the winery part? A. Yes, sir, and then this pumice is conveyed over a distance of about 15 or 20 feet and then dropped into this preserving house.

"Q. That is the house that you and Anselmo constructed? A. Yes.

"Q. How is it conveyed over? A. It has a little conveyor there.

"Q. Kind of an endless belt? A. And chain.

"Q. Do the winery and the preserving house use the same spur track? A. They would have to.

"Q. And the same offices? A. Yes.

"Q. And the same roadways where the trucks drive in there? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Now, these buildings and improvements which you have mentioned, including the winery, office buildings and preserving house building and all other improvements which you have mentioned, practically cover the entire 8 acres? A. Yes, sir, the entire 8 acres.

"Q. Also a part of the 8 acres there used for dumps, pumice piles? A. Yes, sir; instead of it being put out like that, it is put into this house."

The ground floor of the preserving house was approximately 26x63 feet in area. We do not find any statement of the height of the building. From the testimony which we have quoted it is clear that the preserving building was intended for use in connection with the other buildings constituting the plant known as the "Woodbridge Winery," that the roadways, spur tracks, and drives referred to were and are all necessary for the use of the preserving building, and that at least a portion of the unoccupied tract of land described in the complaint was and is necessary for the piling of pumice and refuse matter after the alcoholic content and other by-products should be extracted therefrom. The pumice out of which the alcohol and by-products were to be extracted must come from other portions of the plant. The only testimony offered by the appellants on this question was that the preserving building stood at a distance of some 25 or 30 feet from the nearest structure on said tract of land. Not one word is offered concerning what might be necessary or convenient for its use, or as to any use to which said building might be devoted other than it was intended for preserving purposes, as we have stated. The preserving house, standing alone under the conditions disclosed, would have neither use nor salable value.

Section 1185, Code of Civil Procedure, authorizes the court to include in the order of sale in foreclosing a lien, not only the land upon which the building or structure is erected, but also a convenient space about the same, or so much as may be required for the convenient use and occupation thereof. We may here state that the record shows the building was erected with the knowledge of the owner of the premises, and that no limiting notice as to responsibility was ever posted on the premises or filed as required by law. The lease under which the defendant Salvatore entered upon the premises contemplated the erection of the building involved in this action.

[3, 4] Determining the area of land that shall be included in the order of sale upon the foreclosure of a lien for the erection of a building is largely within the discretion of the trial court, and, unless abused, will not be disturbed. The determination of this area must take into consideration the intended use for which the building is erected. If erected for the purposes of use as a separate and distinct unit, then the area of land required for its convenient use may properly be limited only to an area necessary for ingress and egress, but, if its use is dependent upon and connected with the uses made of other buildings or the uses made of other portions of the tract of land upon which it is situate, then, if all of the larger tract is required for the "necessary and convenient use" of the building involved, such larger tract may properly be included in the order of sale.

In the case of California Corrugated Culvert Co. v. Stewart, supra, the facts show the erection of a barn and the construction of an elevator to store a crop of rice that might be grown upon a tract of land embracing 729 acres. The trial court ordered a sale of the entire 729 acres. Subsequent thereto it made an order limiting the number of acres that should be sold. From this subsequent order the plaintiffs appealed. The last order was vacated and the cause remanded to the trial court to do one of two things: First, enter judgment for the plaintiffs and the findings of fact and conclusions of law as originally made; or, second, to again proceed and determine the extent of the area required for the convenient use and occupation of the barn and elevator. The cause just referred to was, as here, tried upon the theory that the whole of the farm was necessary for the convenient use and occupation of the buildings. The elevator could not be used for conveying rice into the barn for storage purposes unless there was rice raised for that purpose; nor could the barn be used for the storage of rice without the rice first being produced. In other words, the holding of the court in such cases should find a basis in the uses and purposes for which the building is erected, in determining the area of land necessary and convenient for its use. A residence might only require sufficient land to afford ingress and egress, which would not be a rule applicable to buildings intended for other uses.

The arguments of the appellants herein appear to be based upon the theory that all the land that can be included in an order of sale is only such as may be required for ingress and egress. As stated, the land required is a question of fact to be determined by the trial court. California Corrugated Culvert Co. v. Stewart, supra.

[5] As stated in 17 California Jurisprudence, 154: "The land about a building, required for its convenient use and occupation, is such as is necessary to the enjoyment of the building for the purpose of its construction. Accordingly, the use to which a building is to be put may determine the land necessary to its convenient use and occupation, but this does not include adjacent areas or structures necessary merely to create business or custom or furnish supplies for the enterprise conducted in the building." The purpose for which the building in question was erected is intimately and directly connected with the operations carried on in the adjacent buildings as to become an essential part and parcel of the plant known as the "Woodbridge Winery." The work carried on in the preserving house could not be carried on disconnected with the processes conducted in the other buildings. Nor could the complete process of extracting all of the commercial elements from the grapes crushed be completed in the adjacent buildings without the use of the preserving house.

Appellants call our attention to the case of Gregg v. H. & M. Drilling Co., a Corporation, et al., 92 Cal. App. 189, 267 P. 903, where it was sought to enforce a lien upon a larger tract of land for the value of gravel placed upon a short strip of roadway leading thereto. The conclusion was that the strip of land could be used as a roadway, disconnected with the larger tract of land. In that case reference is first made to Cowan v. Griffith, 108 Cal. 244, 41 P. 42, 49 Am. St. Rep. 82, where an attempt was made to establish a mechanic's lien on a forty-acre tract of land upon which a residence had been constructed. Likewise, reference is made to the case of Tunis v. Lakeport, etc., Ass'n, 98 Cal. 285, 33 P. 63, 447, where an attempt was made to foreclose a mechanic's lien on a sixty-acre tract of ground upon which an hotel had been erected.

In the case of Cowan v. Griffith, supra, the facts show that the residence could be occupied and used conveniently without any reference to the forty-acre tract. Likewise, in the case of Tunis v. Lakeport, etc., Ass'n, supra, the facts show that the hotel could be used irrespective of the race track, corrals, etc., situate upon the sixty-acre tract of land. There is a difference between the "necessary and convenient use," which includes the purposes for which the building is erected, and a distinct and separate use which may prove profitable in the operation or use of the building on which the lien is sought to be foreclosed. The fact that the use might prove profitable cannot be considered, unless it is a "necessary and convenient use," and one contemplated in the erection of the building.

Thus, as epitomized in 18 Ruling Case Law, p. 948: "Generally, however, a mechanic's lien is enforceable against the land on which the building or improvement stands and also the land thereabout, used with it, and necessarily or reasonably convenient to its use. As illustrating the different applications of this rule, it has been held in one case, under a statute extending a mechanic's lien on a building to the land necessary for the convenient use and occupation thereof, that the court cannot set aside forty acres with a dwelling as necessary for its convenient use, the court saying that the statute does not contemplate that the dwelling shall include lands sufficient to support the owner while living therein, while on the other hand, and on the idea that a farm is a unit and that it is immaterial whether it is large or small, a lien has been granted for farm buildings erected on a contiguous tract of 350 acres made up of several farms owned originally by different owners, where it was the intention to use the whole of the land with such buildings."

The question of use and purpose for which the improvement is intended, and therefore the area of land that should be included in the order of sale, is well illustrated in the case of Western Well Works, Inc., v. California Farms Co., 60 Cal. App. 749, 214 P. 491, where it was held that a small circle of land surrounding a well capable of furnishing 2,000 gallons per minute did not meet the requirements of "necessary and convenient use," and the whole tract of land upon which the well was dug, and for which the well had a capacity of furnishing sufficient water, should be included within the order of sale. A mere showing that the nearest building to the structure erected by the plaintiffs is 25 or 30 feet away has no bearing upon the question of "necessary and convenient use" or the purposes for which the structure was erected. That the purposes and intended use for which the building is erected or improvement made is to be considered in determining the tract of land necessary and convenient for its use is fully sustained by the extended notes appended to the case of Wirsing v. Pennsylvania Hotel & Sanitarium, 226 Pa. 234, 75 A. 259, as reported in 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 831.

[6] Was it error for the court to allow interest from the date of the filing of the complaint? The record shows that, shortly after the filing of the complaint, the plaintiffs furnished to the defendants a bill of particulars showing every item of cost incurred in the erection of the preserving building. Section 3287, Civil Code, reads: "Every person who is entitled to recover damages certain, or capable of being made certain by calculation, and the right to recover which is vested in him upon a particular day, is entitled also to recover interest thereon from that day," etc. The contention is made that the amount which the plaintiffs are entitled to recover in this case is unliquidated, and therefore interest should not be allowed until the entry of judgment. This contention, however, is not determinative of the question of interest. If the amount of the indebtedness or the amount owing can be calculated and determined from the statements rendered by the plaintiffs to the defendants, and that statement is found to be true and correct, it is a matter of mere calculation. The court in the instant case found the costs just as set forth by the plaintiffs in their bill of particulars furnished the appellants.

In 8 California Jurisprudence, 791, we find the following: "The fact that proof of the market value of goods is required to establish the amount of a claim does not render it incapable of being made certain by calculation, so as to prevent the allowance of interest under section 3287 of the Civil Code. Nor will the proof of two market values, as of goods if uninjured, and goods as injured, do so. The fact that the amount due depends upon whether the plaintiff had a third or a half interest in a partnership, but is certain in either case, does not render the amount unliquidable. And the existence of a setoff or counterclaim does not create such an uncertainty as will prevent the allowance of interest, even though it be itself unliquidated. A dispute as to the price agreed, or as to the amount of work done or its cost, will not prevent the allowance of interest. * * * Where the data necessary to determine the amount due are supplied to the debtor by an invoice or statement, he will be charged with interest for failure to pay."

Again, in 15 Ruling Case Law, 7, the rule is thus stated: "While, as a general rule, interest is not allowable on unliquidated demands, yet it has frequently been held that interest may be allowed as damages, even in the case of unliquidated demands, where the latter are capable of ascertainment by calculation or where they may be determined by reference to well-established market values, together with computation."

It does not appear that the accuracy of the bill of particulars rendered by the plaintiffs to the appellants was questioned at the trial of this action. It was urged that certain work was not done, and that the work done was not of the value set forth in the bill of particulars, and a counterclaim was set up in the answer. All of these matters were found against the contention of the appellants. This brings the circumstances within the case of McCowen v. Pew, 18 Cal. App. 482, 123 P. 354, where, under similar circumstances, interest was allowed.

The action in this case is not based wholly upon quantum meruit; it is based primarily upon the contract to pay the cost of the building, plus 10 per cent. The value of the building after its construction, or its adaptability to the uses and purposes intended, is immaterial. The item of costs being presented, the amount thereof was easily ascertained. It appears that there was a payment of the sum of $500 made to the plaintiffs after the completion of the building, and some promises made as to the payment of the amount still remaining due to the plaintiffs. This we need not consider, further than to state that the court allowed a credit of $500 on the amount claimed by the plaintiffs. There is a difference between the amount claimed by the plaintiffs and the amount allowed by the court in the sum of $23.08. Appellants urge that this shows appellants' claim to be unliquidated and incapable of ascertainment by calculation. This sum is so negligible in quantity that we pass it by without further mention.

The case of Combs v. Eberhard, 120 Cal. App. 25, 7 P.(2d) 338, may be distinguished from the case at bar. In that case interest was allowed on account of claims and liens filed against the property belonging to the defendant, other than for work and labor and materials furnished by the contractor under the contract, and involved the question of quantum meruit only.

Nor is the case of Kimes v. Davidson Investment Co., 101 Cal. App. 382, 281 P. 639, controlling here. In the case just mentioned the defendant had breached its contract, and the plaintiff was suing for the value of the work and labor performed. It was clearly a case of quantum meruit. The amount due could not be calculated nor ascertained until the judgment of the court was entered.

It may be considered that time of payment was not mentioned in the contract, but under the rule enunciated in 17 California Jurisprudence, p. 220, the time would run from the date of filing the complaint, which date was taken by the trial court as the time from which interest should be calculated.

Nor do we think that the case of Mabrey v. McCormick, 205 Cal. 667, 272 P. 289, precludes the allowance of interest to the plaintiffs in this action. The contract in that case was not upon a cost-plus basis, as is shown by the following statement: "Plaintiffs claim interest from the date of the third bill rendered by them, at which time they state the amount due became certain (section 3287, Civ. Code). Had the court found for them, this contention would be sound. Here, however, the record shows no refusal of defendants to settle with plaintiffs under the true contract. Defendants being ready and willing to settle thereunder, were not at fault, because plaintiffs not only abandoned the work, but insisted on recovery upon a different basis. In other words, by reason of the action of plaintiffs, the amount due was unliquidated until determined by judgment of the court; hence interest prior to judgment, as damages, was not allowable"—citing cases. The opposite is the truth in the instant case as found by the trial court. We conclude that interest was properly allowed.

The judgment is affirmed.

RECHT v. STATE BAR OF CALIFORNIA.
L. A. 13993.

Supreme Court of California.

June 21, 1933.

1. Attorney and client ☞53(2).

Evidence held to warrant findings of state bar committee that attorney solicited and obtained employment by investors in investment trust, without revealing his professional association therewith, and exacted exorbitant fee for recovering amount of their investments, though he knew trust intended to return money.

2. Attorney and client ☞58.

Attorney, soliciting and obtaining employment by investors in investment trust, without revealing his professional association therewith, and exacting exorbitant fees for recovering amount of their investments, which he knew trust intended to return, held properly suspended for three months, instead of being disbarred, in view of his youth and brief practice.

In Bank.

Proceeding by Alan Recht against the State Bar of California to review a recommendation of the Board of Bar Governors that petitioner be suspended from the practice of law for three months.

Petitioner ordered suspended from practice for three months.

Clyde P. Harrell, Jr., of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Philbrick McCoy, of Los Angeles, and A. B. Bianchi, of San Francisco, for respondent.

IRA F. THOMPSON, Justice.

The proceeding is one to review the recommendation of the board of bar governors of the state of California to the effect that petitioner be suspended from the practice of law for the period of three months. The local administrative committee No. 9 made its recommendation that petitioner be given a private reprimand, which conclusion was arrived at after the committee had made its finding that the accused attorney, while representing the Pacific Investment Trust and gaining information of a confidential character, had solicited employment from two women investors therein, without revealing to them his professional association with the trust, and had secured them to sign contracts with him by which he would and actually did exact an exorbitant and unconscionable fee for demanding and receiving from the trust the amount of their investment; and had falsely represented to them, for the purpose of securing them to sign the agreements, that he had been investigating the trust and had tied up the money; and that he and no other attorney could make the recovery for them, although he knew at the time that the Pacific Investment Trust intended to turn the money back to them and that such conduct on the part of petitioner was dishonest and oppressive.

The petitioner claims that these findings are unsupported by the evidence and in his petition recites his version of the affair.

[1] We cannot but conclude, in view of the rule which requires a petitioner for a writ of review to "fairly state all the material evidence relative to the point," when his claim is founded upon the ground that the testimony is insufficient (204 Cal. XCV), that petitioner has not dealt fairly or frankly with the court. In view of his petition, we have read the entire transcript and even partisanship and zeal should not bind one to the fact that every finding of the committee is amply warranted. In fact, the findings fail to reveal completely the lack of appreciation and understanding by petitioner of the ideals and aspirations which should animate and the conduct which should characterize a member of the profession of the law. It is only when we review the evidence itself that we have a full and complete comprehension of petitioner's activities. Corroborating the testimony to the effect that he knew all he had to do in order to recover the money for Mrs. Liggins, one of the clients, was to make a demand, is his own statement that he told her to come back to his office the next or the succeeding day and he would have the money. And yet he exacted from her in the manner outlined a contract for one-third thereof. But worse than that was his conduct with the other client. He was not satisfied with one-third of the $1,500. According to the testimony of Mrs. Rudd's son, petitioner asserted that he had been compelled to lay out some expense money in connection with the negotiations and, for that reason, retained $600. He says he was not employed by the Pacific Investment Trust, but by a man named Shostak. Letters sent out by petitioner, however, establish conclusively that he was endeavoring to collect money for the concern and not for Shostak, who, it may be said, became the manager of the trust at about the same time petitioner was employed. There is a patent endeavor by petitioner to shift the blame onto the shoulders of Shostak. We are not inclined to detail the testimony of the two. It is sufficient to say that petitioner's cause is not benefited by a comparison of their statements. Some time was devoted in the oral argument to efforts made by petitioner to restore to the parties some of the exorbitant and excessive fee. When we read the proceedings, however, it appears that such a thought never entered his mind until the local administration committee, in an apparent effort to do something for the two women who had thus been oppressed, suggested to petitioner and his counsel that their recommendation might be affected by some effort in this direction. For aught that appears, however, no restitution has been made.

[2] Should we approve the recommendation of the board of governors? Considerable emphasis has been laid upon the fact that petitioner had only been practicing four years and was only 27 years of age. This, however, is not a case of the mere violation of the rule against the solicitation of business, nor is it so much an infringement of the canon against representing conflicting interest, as it is a violation of the very fundamentals of common honesty and fair dealing. The license to practice is not a license to mulct the unfortunate, but to assist in righting their wrongs, so far as humanly possible. It is doubtful, in view of the record in this case, if petitioner can thoroughly appreciate the full significance of the foregoing statement in a period of three months. If he were older in the profession, we should have no doubt concerning his disbarment. As it is, the least disciplinary punishment, under the circumstances, was recommended by the board of bar governors.

It is, therefore, ordered that petitioner be suspended from the practice of law in all the courts of this state for a period of three months, said suspension to begin with the date of the filing of this order.

Action by Vina Smith against the California Highway Indemnity Exchange. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Prior opinion, 17 P.(2d) 1005.

John Ralph Wilson and Carl E. Day, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Daniel A. Ryan, Thomas C. Ryan, and George F. Snyder, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHENK, Justice.

On August 30, 1924, Ray H. Davis was the owner of a Chandler automobile which he operated as a jitney bus in the city and county of San Francisco. In operating the car on that day he injured the plaintiff, whose name was then Vina Nicol. She sued Davis alone and recovered a judgment for damages. On appeal, the judgment was affirmed. Nicol v. Davis, 107 Cal. App. 26, 290 P. 114. The judgment remained unsatisfied, and the plaintiff brought this action against Davis' insurance carrier, the defendant herein. At the close of all the evidence, the court instructed the jury to return a verdict for the plaintiff; hence this appeal.

[1] The first question presented is whether the accident was one covered by the insurance policy. Davis was operating his jitney bus on the "29th and Mission" route, which extended from the ferry at the foot of Market street to Valencia street, thence to Twenty-Ninth and Mission. He resided at 311 Jersey street, which is about five blocks from Twenty-Ninth and Mission streets. On the afternoon of the accident he had returned to his home for the purpose of taking a rest, in preparation for his night run. He parked his car in front of his home, on a grade. After his rest, he entered his car, released the brake, and backed down grade to the corner of Noe street, where he struck the plaintiff. It is contended by the defendant that the streets from Davis' home to Twenty-Ninth and Mission streets were not on the route over which he was authorized to conduct the jitney bus, and therefore that the accident was not covered by the policy.

The policy indemnified the subscriber (Davis) against loss on account of damages for personal injuries suffered by any person resulting from the "use or maintenance" of the described automobile "wherever any automobile covered hereby may be in the service of the subscriber." In an indorsement it is provided that the automobile covered "is to be operated in the service of the subscriber as a jitney bus * * * within the city and county limits of the city of San Francisco, and not elsewhere or otherwise, and that this policy is not intended to, and shall not cover any accident that may occur while said car mentioned in the schedule attached hereto is being operated for any other purpose and at any other time or place than herein stated, but it is intended that this policy shall cover said car when used as in this paragraph provided." There is nothing in the policy which defines the route over which the jitney bus is to be operated. The schedule attached thereto specifies the address of the subscriber as 311 Jersey street, and that the use to which the automobile is to be put is "jitney bus or occasional rent car." It is further provided that the contract does not cover loss arising while the automobile "is being used or maintained for any purpose or business other than as specified in the schedule."

It cannot be doubted that the Chandler automobile was "maintained" by Davis for the purpose and business of a jitney bus at the time of the accident. It was operated at the time "in the service of the subscriber as a jitney bus * * * within the city and county limits of the city of San Francisco," and it may not fairly be said that the car was at the time operated for any other purpose than that of a jitney bus. Necessarily Davis was required to keep the car somewhere, and it was kept at his home, which was the place specified in his operator's permit where it was to be kept, and which was in the vicinity of the Twenty-ninth and Mission terminus of the route. At the time of the accident he was operating, using, and maintaining his car with the equipment, plates, and badge placed and displayed as required by local regulations. The policy did not specify the particular or any route over which the car should be operated. The limits of the operation thereof were the city and county of San Francisco. We have no hesitancy in concluding that the accident was included within the terms of the policy considered as an independent document.

The policy sued on was obtained by Davis in pursuance of the requirement of an ordinance of the city that before any person could operate a jitney bus he must obtain an operator's permit from the board of police commissioners, and should also furnish a policy insuring the owner or operator against loss by reason of damage resulting from the operation of the jitney bus. This ordinance defined a jitney bus as "a self-propelled motor vehicle, other than a street car, traversing the public streets between certain definite points or termini and conveying passengers for a fixed charge * * * between such and intermediate points, and so held out, advertised and announced."

It is insisted by the defendant that the terms of the ordinance are a part of the contract of insurance, and that its liability is limited to the operation of a jitney bus as defined in said ordinance and within the particular route assigned to Davis by the police department. It is assumed that the terms of the policy must be consistent with the terms of the ordinance which required its issuance, and that the provisions of the ordinance may be considered in connection with the terms of the policy in order to determine the liability of the defendant.

The ordinance provided that, "in order to insure the safety of the public, it shall be unlawful for any person to drive or operate such 'jitney bus' unless he shall have furnished the contract of indemnity against loss to persons or property resulting from the negligent operation of the jitney bus. There is nothing in the ordinance which defines the routes in the city over which jitney busses might operate; and there is nothing in the policy which confines the effectiveness of its provisions within definite limits of operation as was the case in Interstate Casualty Co. v. Martin (Tex. Civ. App.) 234 S. W. 710, where the coverage of the policy was confined to the "Montgomery Avenue Route" in the city of Houston, Tex. The only justification for the argument of the defendant is the definition of a jitney bus as contained in the ordinance read in connection with the terms of the policy requiring that the car "be operated in the service of the subscriber as a jitney bus" within the city and county of San Francisco "and not elsewhere or otherwise," and providing that the policy shall not cover any accident that might occur while the car was "being used for any other purpose and at any other time or place than herein stated." Either the car was being operated "in the service" of Davis as a jitney bus at the time of the accident involved herein or it was not then so operated. Certain it is that the car at the time was not being operated for a purpose apart from the "service of the subscriber" as a jitney bus, as was the case in Heriter v. Central Indemnity Co., 109 N. J. Law, 313, 162 A. 573; but was within the general and incidental service of Davis' business as a jitney bus operator. It was not then used for any other purpose than in connection with the jitney bus business, and we are not inclined to apply the going and coming rule of certain industrial accident cases to the situation here presented.

[2] There is no merit in the contention of the defendant that the plaintiff is foreclosed from recovery by her failure to give notice to the attorney in fact of the defendant as a prerequisite to court action against him. This action is against the Exchange itself, and no preliminary notice to it was required by the policy.

The judgment is affirmed.

SHENK, Justice.

This appeal is from a judgment in favor of the defendant in an action to obtain specific performance of an alleged agreement to sell real property.

If the agreement exists no question of the plaintiffs' right to the relief sought is raised. The complaint alleged a written contract, and the plaintiffs offered and relied upon the following as establishing an agreement to sell on the part of the defendant.

The record shows that prior to October 21, 1929, the plaintiffs had been the owners of the residence property situate at 25 Hartford street in San Francisco, upon which the defendant held a deed of trust in the principal sum of about $4,800. The plaintiffs were in arrears on the payments of principal and interest and a sale was duly conducted under the terms of the deed of trust, pursuant to which the defendant became the owner of the property. The plaintiffs expressed a desire to remain on the premises and, if arrangements could be made, to repurchase it. A rental of $50 a month was agreed upon and the following document was issued to the plaintiffs: "San Francisco, November 1, 1929. Wells Fargo Bank & Union Trust Co. hereby acknowledges receipt from Thomas Sontag and Irene Sontag, his wife, the sum of $50.00 for one month's rent, commencing October 21st, 1929, and ending November 20th, 1929. In the event said Sontags purchase the property it is agreed that this payment will be applied first to interest and the balance to principal as an instalment on the purchase price of $4,800 of said property; interest to begin October 21st, 1929."

Subsequently the plaintiffs received from the defendant a letter dated November 5, 1929, which reads: "On November 1, 1929, we issued to you our receipt covering one month's rent of $50 from October 21st to November 20, 1929, for occupying premises at 25 Hartford Street, this city. In the receipt it is (re-) cited that in the event you purchase the property all rent payments will be applied towards the purchase price. That is to say, it will be applied first on interest and any balance in reduction of principal. This is on the purchase price of $4,800 which you understand, includes accrued interest and costs."

On March 1, 1930, the plaintiffs sent the following letter to the defendant: "Pursuant to your receipt of November 1, 1929, for rent of the property known as 25 Hartford Street, together with right and option to purchase the same, as per receipt given by you to me, I hereby notify you that we accepted the option to purchase, and request that the said $50.00 paid by us on October 21st, 1929, and all subsequent payments made thereon to date shall be applied upon the purchase price of said real property, namely $4800.00."

Other evidence, oral and documentary, was received. The trial court found that no contract for the sale and purchase of the property involved existed, and that the only contract entered into between the parties was a month-to-month leasing arrangement at a rental of $50 a month. The court ordered judgment for the defendant on its cross-complaint for unpaid rental earned and for expenses of removing the belongings of the plaintiffs from the premises.

The principal contention of the plaintiffs is that the court erred in finding that no agreement of sale was made by the defendant. The plaintiffs urge that the writings signed by the officers of the defendant constitute an agreement on its part to sell the property involved at a price of $4,800 in installments of $50 per month with interest on deferred payments, which the plaintiffs alleged they were ready and willing and able to perform on their part; and that it is such a contract which the plaintiffs are entitled to have the defendants perform specifically.

[1] There is no foundation in the record to support the contention that the evidence bears the construction contended for as a matter of law, or that the court erred in its construction of the negotiations between the parties. The foregoing evidence, together with all the other documentary evidence and the oral testimony received, clearly supports the court's finding that the transaction contemplated only a rental of the premises at $50 a month. The inferential conclusion that the statements of the defendant concerning a purchase of the property by the defendants were only an invitation to negotiate in the future on the basis suggested, which obviously does not include all of the terms necessary to be agreed upon, is justified by the record. That such an interpretation and construction of their negotiations was correct is indicated by the conduct of the parties themselves, and particularly by the conduct of the plaintiffs. It is in evidence that the plaintiffs were engaged in a lawsuit as to which they had expressed to the defendant the expectation of recovering a substantial judgment. The court could properly infer from the plaintiffs' conduct that they were awaiting the outcome of that litigation before negotiating for the repurchase of the property from the defendant. Furthermore, the plaintiffs' understanding of the limited nature of the parties' negotiations is indicated by a letter dated February 17, 1930, written to the defendant by the plaintiff Thomas Sontag, wherein he requests that a cashier's check for $50 inclosed be applied "to my rent for the month of March," also requesting a receipt. It was not until the subsequent receipt by the plaintiffs of notices dated February 19 and 25, 1930, terminating the tenancy on March 20th following, that the plaintiffs framed and posted their letter of March 1, 1930, in an attempt to accept what they thereby declared to be an option to purchase. Even assuming that the writings of the defendant of November 1 and 5, 1929, could be so construed, or could be construed as an offer to sell, the record amply supports a conclusion that the option or offer had been duly withdrawn prior to any attempted acceptance on the part of the plaintiffs.

It may also be added that the writings upon which the plaintiffs rely are too indefinite and uncertain in their terms to become the basis of a claim for specific performance. Klein v. Markarian, 175 Cal. 37, 40, 165 P. 3.

[2] The plaintiffs also contend that the evidence compels a finding that an oral contract was proved as to which the defense of the statute of frauds was not pleaded. A substantial conflict exists in the evidence as to what were the oral negotiations between the parties. The presence of this conflict in the record, under well-recognized rules, forecloses this court from giving further consideration to this contention.

The judgment is affirmed.

HILTBRAND v. HILTBRAND.

L. A. 13292.

Supreme Court of California.

June 16, 1933.

1. Judgment ⇨142.

Ordinarily defendant served by publication has right at any time during one year, upon tendering proper answer, to apply for order setting aside default upon such conditions as court may see fit.

2. Judgment ⇨142.

Relief against default after service by publication will not be granted where there is affirmative showing of laches or inexcusable neglect sufficient to create estoppel.

3. Divorce ⇨161.

Denying wife right to reopen default divorce decree held not abuse of discretion, where record showed that wife was guilty of inexcusable delay and neglect in not earlier presenting defense.

Record disclosed that divorce action was commenced on July 7, 1930, and that wife who resided in Switzerland received summons on July 24, 1930. On August 9, 1930, wife wrote to husband's attorney protesting against action to which attorney did not reply. On November 7, 1930, interlocutory decree of divorce was entered. On November 9, 1930, wife wrote to Divorce action. Appeal from order of trial court denying motion to reopen a default and to that end to set aside the interlocutory decree of divorce theretofore made in the action.

The order appealed from is dated July 24, 1931. The action was instituted July 7, 1930. The affidavit of plaintiff husband showed defendant to be residing at Throd, Berne, Switzerland. The regular period of publication was had and copy of the summons and complaint was mailed to the address given and actually received by defendant on July 24, 1930. On August 9, 1930, defendant wrote a letter to the attorney for plaintiff protesting against the action, to which apparently no response was made. On November 7, 1930, her default was entered and on the same day interlocutory decree of divorce was entered. On November 9, 1930, defendant wrote to an attorney at Los Angeles requesting him to investigate the matter and represent her in the action. However, no active step was taken by him until May 15, 1931, when he filed notice of motion to set aside the default and reopen the cause, accompanied by a proposed answer denying the material allegations of the complaint. On May 28, 1931, the motion was heard and denied without prejudice. On June 30, 1931, notice was given of a second motion to the same effect. This motion was likewise heard and denied without prejudice on July 24, 1931. The appeal of defendant was filed on August 8, 1931.

The sole question for our consideration here is whether under these facts defendant was entitled as a matter of right to a reopening of the cause. Or, stating the question in another form, was there under these circumstances any room for operation of the discretion of the trial court in passing upon the motion?

[1, 2] Since the case of Gray v. Lawlor, 151 Cal. 352, 90 P. 691, 12 Ann. Cas. 990, it has been the settled law of this state that under all ordinary circumstances, a defendant, served by publication of summons, has the right, at any time during the period of one year, upon tendering a proper answer, to apply to the court for an order setting aside the default and to receive such an order as a matter of right, upon such terms and conditions as the court may see fit to impose. But even this case does not hold that such relief will be granted where there is an affirmative showing of laches or inexcusable neglect of sufficient strength to create an estoppel. Later, in the case of Boland v. All Persons, 160 Cal. 488, 490, 117 P. 547, 548, the court used the following language: "In applications for relief under this clause of the section there is no presumption of neglect, as in cases where there has been personal service. The party is not required, in the first instance, to do more than show that he has not been personally served and that he has a good defense to the action on the merits which he could have presented had he been informed of its pendency. Gray v. Lawlor, 151 Cal. 354, 90 P. 691 [12 Ann. Cas. 990]. But his opponent may show, in opposition to the application, that the applicant had actual notice of the action in time to have entered an appearance and present the defense, and that the failure to do so was owing to his neglect or to his consent to the judgment. In that event a case arises for the exercise of the discretion of the court, and it must determine whether or not the laches is of a character that should preclude the relief. Bogart v. Kiene, 85 Minn. 262, 88 N. W. 748; Mueller v. McCulloch, 59 Minn. 409, 61 N. W. 455; Keenan v. Daniells, 18 S. D. 102, 99 N. W. 853; Blyth v. Swenson, 15 Utah, 352, 49 P. 1027; Jordan v. Hutchinson, 39 Wash. 373, 81 P. 867." This doctrine was reaffirmed in the case of Palmer v. Lantz, 215 Cal. 320, 324, 9 P.(2d) 821, and also approved in the case of Application of Mercereau (Cal. App.) 14 P.(2d) 1019.

[3, 4] The case of Randall v. Randall, 203 Cal. 462, 264 P. 751, also apparently recognizes the exception in the assertion that there was in that case no presumption against the defendant of knowledge of the proceedings or of inexcusable delay on his part. We are therefore led to the conclusion that there was in the instant case a sufficient showing to sustain the action of the court below in that enough appeared from the facts to justify the conclusion that, having received knowledge of the existence of the proceeding in the courts of California, the defendant was guilty of inexcusable delay and neglect in not earlier presenting her defense. In making this holding we are not unmindful of the fact that this court has in Reh fuss v. Reh fuss, 169 Cal. 86, 145 P. 1020, and on various other occasions, shown its solicitude for the ordinance of marriage and to that end has held that the showing to set aside a default in a divorce action may rest upon slight evidence. But here the question in the first instance was one within the discretion of the court below and we are unable to say as a matter of law that such discretion was not properly exercised.

The order is affirmed.

HALL v. BARBER DOOR CO. et al.
L. A. 12166.

Supreme Court of California.

June 28, 1933.

Rehearing Denied July 27, 1933.

1. Appeal and error ⇨110.

Order denying new trial is nonappealable.

2. Appeal and error ⇨927(3).

On plaintiff's appeal following nonsuit, all reasonable inferences and presumptions in plaintiff's favor must be considered proved, and evidence must be viewed most favorably to plaintiff.

3. Negligence ⇨136(22).

Negligence of subcontractor in installing door in building without countersinking set screws and without warning occupant of resulting danger held for jury in occupant's action for injuries.

The evidence disclosed that, after hanging the door, workmen who had installed it in presence of occupant worked it up and down several times and then left it open. During this time occupant was in possession of stall in the building and had moved merchandise therein and was doing business. It appeared, however, that the door was left by the workman without having countersunk set screws into shaft. Defendant subcontractor admitted that, though he knew the door had been hung and set screws had not been countersunk, he did not give instructions to his men to warn occupants of stalls or others rightfully on the premises of danger.

4. Negligence ⇨2.

No liability in tort for negligence can be imposed unless defendant owed duty of care.

5. Negligence ⇨32(2).

One taking possession of stall in newly completed produce building occupied status of tenant, though rent payments had not started, and subcontractor constructing doors owed such occupant duty of due care.

The evidence disclosed that the occupant went into possession of stall in building with owner's knowledge and consent, and the fact that payments were not to start until later date was due to the fact that the parties, when they entered into contract, did not know when the building would be ready for occupancy.

6. Negligence ⇨55.

Independent contractor who negligently creates dangerous conditions during work, is liable for resulting injury to one rightfully on premises.

7. Negligence ⇨136(27).

Occupant of stall in newly constructed produce building held not guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law in using door not yet completely installed, where workmen had worked it up and down and left it.

8. Negligence ⇨69.

Forgetfulness of known danger is not of itself contributory negligence as matter of law.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ruben H. Schmidt, Judge.

Action by John W. Hall against the Barber Door Company and others. From a judgment for defendants and an order denying motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals.

Appeal from order denying new trial dismissed, and judgment reversed.

Prior opinion, 14 P.(2d) 549.

Hoye & Boehler and Walter W. Hoye, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher and Tanner, Odell & Taft, all of Los Angeles (Philip C. Sterry, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondents.

WASTE, Chief Justice.

[1] Plaintiff appeals from a judgment entered upon the granting of a motion for nonsuit made by defendant at the close of plaintiff's case. Plaintiff also appeals from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The latter order is nonappealable, and, for that reason, the appeal therefrom is dismissed.

The facts upon which plaintiff bases his action are as follows: In the latter part of the year 1927 the Central Manufacturing District, as owner, entered into a contract with William P. Neil Company, whereby the latter, as general contractor, agreed to construct a building to be known as the Produce Terminal Building, in Vernon, Cal. The defendant corporation, the Barber Door Company, was one of the subcontractors, under contract to install the doors in the building. The plaintiff, in October of 1927, entered into a contract with the owner of the property for the use of one of the stalls in the building. This contract was entered into before the building was completed and obviously before either the owner or the plaintiff knew when the building would be completed. The agreement, pleaded as an exhibit to the answer, was not explicit as to the date when the tenancy was to start. It provided for a fixed payment, payable monthly, starting January 1, 1928, and continuing until January 1, 1948. The "Schedule of Terms" attached to the agreement and made a part thereof provided in part as follows:

"1. In the event that the premises above described are available for occupancy by Purchaser prior to the first day of January, 1928, the Purchaser may take possession of said premises at such time and without the payment of any additional money other than that specified in this agreement.

"2. The Purchaser agrees that its entry into occupancy of said premises shall constitute an acknowledgment that the same are suitable for its business and that the building and improvements thereon have been received by the Purchaser in good and first class condition. * * *

It appears from the evidence that on December 1, 1927, plaintiff and his partner went into possession of the stall. It further appears that on that date the building was not entirely completed, but that plaintiff and his partner moved in with the permission and consent and, in fact, at the request, of the superintendent of the owner. Shortly after the plaintiff took possession, the defendant corporation installed the heavy door leading to the stall. On December 6th the door was hung, but on that date the installation was not entirely complete. Between December 6th and December 8th nothing further was done on the door. On December 8th, plaintiff, in attempting to leave the premises, raised the door, and, while stepping through the doorway, the door fell, seriously injuring his back. It is for the injuries so received that plaintiff brought this action against defendants. It was stipulated that defendant corporation was an independent contractor. At the close of plaintiff's case defendants moved for a nonsuit on the following grounds: (1) That there was no evidence tending to show any duty owed by defendant to plaintiff. (2) That there was no evidence tending to show negligence on the part of defendant. (3) That there was no evidence tending to show that defendant's negligence, if any, was the proximate cause of the accident. (4) That the evidence showed that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.

The trial court granted the nonsuit; hence this appeal.

[2, 3] The rules applicable to such an appeal are so well settled and have been enunciated so frequently by this court that no useful purpose would be served in elaborating on them in this opinion. Suffice it to say that on such an appeal every favorable inference fairly deducible from the evidence, and every favorable presumption arising from the evidence, must be considered as facts proved by the plaintiff. If evidence is fairly susceptible to two constructions, or if one of several inferences may reasonably be made, the court must take the view most favorable to the plaintiffs. If contradictory evidence has been given, it must be disregarded. The evidence must be taken most strongly against the defendant. Berger v. Lane, 190 Cal. 443, 213 P. 45; In re Estate of Flood (Cal. Sup.) 21 P.(2d) 579. When the evidence in the instant case is tested by these standards, we have no hesitancy in holding that from such evidence the jury could have inferred that defendant was negligent in installing the door, that defendant left the door in such a condition as to constitute an implied invitation to use it, and that defendant was negligent in failing to warn the plaintiff and others lawfully on the premises of the hidden danger of which defendant had knowledge or, by the use of ordinary care, should have had knowledge. The evidence from which we believe the jury could have inferred negligence in the foregoing respects on the part of defendant is as follows:

The door in question was about 17 feet wide and about 14 feet high, in two sections; its total weight being approximately 300 pounds. At each end of the door was attached a cable which passed over a drum or pulley fitted near the end of a shaft located near the ceiling. These drums or pulleys were held on to the shaft by two set screws on opposite sides of the drum. Connected to the other end of each cable were heavy weights acting as counterbalances, weighing almost as much as the door. When the door was closed, these weights would be up, and, when the door was open, they would be down near the floor. At the time of the accident on December 8th, the door was, as alleged in the complaint, not entirely installed. The installation of the door began on December 3d, and the door was hung on December 6th. After hanging the door, the workmen who had installed it, in the presence of plaintiff, worked it up and down several times, and then left it suspended; that is, open. All during the period the workmen were installing the door, plaintiff and his partner were in possession of the stall and had moved in merchandise consisting of crates of fruits and vegetables, and were doing business. When the door was hung on December 6th, and the cables and weights attached, the set screws holding the drums or pulleys on the shaft were not countersunk into the shaft, but were simply screwed down against the shaft. Certain safety catches which would have held the door up even in the absence of counterweights had not yet been installed. Between December 6th and 8th the plaintiff opened and shut the door several times. At the time of trial it was stipulated "that at the time the door fell the setscrews holding the drum to which was attached the cable that supported the counter-balance weight had slipped; that the counterweight drum was held in position above the door by the two setscrews running through the collar of the drum, and pressing against the surface of the shaft; that said setscrews had not been countersunk into the shaft at the time of the accident." Attorney for the defendant qualified the above stipulation by the reservation that the stipulation did not include an agreement that the slipping of the set screws caused the door to fall. However, the inference that such was the fact is readily deducible from the record. The evidence shows that the purpose of countersinking the set screws into the shaft is to increase the safety factor. Defendant Barber testified that he knew that the door had been installed as it was and that the set screws had not been countersunk. The shaft, after the accident, was deeply grooved under the set screws, indicating where they had slipped around the shaft. The pulley or drum had turned on the shaft. An expert for plaintiff testified that on such a door the greatest strain or stress comes at the point of contact of the set screws with the shaft.

Defendant Barber also testified that the door was installed by his men, and therefore the jury could have inferred that such men knew plaintiff and his partner were occupying the stall in question, and had moved their merchandise therein and were open for business. Defendant also admitted that, although he knew the door had been hung and that the set screws had not been countersunk, he did not give instructions to his men to warn the occupants of the stalls, or to others rightfully on the premises, not to use the doors, or that it was dangerous to use them, nor did he cause any warning to be posted to that effect. Plaintiff testified, as already pointed out, that, after the men hung the door on December 6th, they worked it up and down in his presence. They at no time told him not to use it or that it was dangerous to use it. We think, from the above evidence, that the jury could have inferred that the door fell because the set screws were not countersunk and that defendant was negligent in not countersinking them. We think it is also a justifiable inference from the above facts that defendant left the door in such a condition as to constitute an implied invitation to any one rightfully on the premises to use it. The jury could also have inferred that under the circumstances it was negligence on the part of the defendant not to warn the plaintiff and others rightfully on the premises of the hidden danger which it had created and of which it had knowledge.

From this résumé of the evidence it is apparent that there was sufficient evidence in the record to go to the jury on the question of negligence, if, in fact, defendant owed any duty of due care to plaintiff. Defendant strenuously contends that it owed no duty of care to plaintiff, with whom it had no contractual relation.

[4] It is elementary, of course, that no tortious liability can be imposed on a defendant, even though he was negligent, unless defendant owed a duty of care to plaintiff. Dahms v. General Elevator Co., 214 Cal. 733, 7 P.(2d) 1013; Buckley v. Gray, 110 Cal. 339, 42 P. 900, 31 L. R. A. 862, 52 Am. St. Rep. 88. We turn now to a discussion of that question.

[5] Both parties to this appeal discuss at some length the question as to the status of the plaintiff in taking possession of the premises before January 1, 1928, as far as the owner, the Central Manufacturing District, was concerned. We have no hesitancy in holding that, when plaintiff went into possession on December 1, 1927, at the request, knowledge, and consent of the owner, he went in under the lease as a tenant and therefore as an invitee of the owner. Although it is true that, under the contract, payments were not to start until January 1, 1928, it is also true that, when the contract was entered into, the parties did not know when the building, then in the course of construction, would be ready for occupancy. They therefore provided that payments should start January 1, 1928, evidently a date they were sure the building would be completed, but also provided in effect that the tenancy should start at an earlier date if the building was ready for occupancy before that time. As between the landlord and tenant, they agreed it was ready for occupancy on December 1, 1927. On that date, plaintiff went into possession under the contract and became a tenant of the landlord. As such tenant, it is our opinion the defendant independent contractor owed to him a duty of due care.

[6] It cannot be doubted that an independent contractor is responsible to an occupant of a building rightfully on the premises at the request or consent of the owner for any wrongful acts that may be committed by himself or his employees while the stipulated work is in progress and resulting in injuries to such occupant. The ground upon which this liability is based is the implied duty which the law casts upon the independent contractor, as the person in charge and control of the work, to see that the rights of other persons, rightfully on the premises, are not injuriously affected by the performance of the work. Charlock v. Freel, 125 N. Y. 357, 26 N. E. 262. See, also, Pettyjohn & Sons v. Basham, 126 Va. 72, 100 S. E. 813, 38 A. L. R. 403, where the cases are exhaustively collected and commented upon. Upon both principle and authority, it is clear that an independent contractor, who by his own negligence creates dangerous conditions during the progress of the work, should be held responsible for an injury occasioned by those conditions to one rightfully on the premises, and should be held liable for damage directly attributable to the failure to perform this duty. Oregon-Washington Ry. & Nav. Co. v. Branham (C. C. A.) 259 F. 555; Cummings v. C. W. Noble Co., 143 Wis. 175, 126 N. W. 664; Gardner v. Smith, 7 Mich. 410, 74 Am. Dec. 722.

In enforcing this liability, the decisions in this state and in other states have affirmed the existence of such a duty owed by an independent contractor to an occupant of a building upon which the contractor was working. In Donnelly v. Hufschmidt, 79 Cal. 74, 21 P. 546, a tenant in a lodging house was injured by stumbling over materials left on a pathway by a contractor employed to make repairs. It was held that such tenant could recover from the contractor. In Davis v. Pacific Power Co., 107 Cal. 563, 40 P. 950, 952, 48 Am. St. Rep. 156, the person injured was the son and employee of tenant. The defendant had negligently installed a shaft in the leased premises, resulting in the injuries. The court held that "the plaintiff having a right to be where he was, the defendant [independent contractor] owed him the duty of protection." See, also, Carey v. Baxter, 201 Mass. 522, 87 N. E. 901; Charles G. Robin v. Winslow (Sup.) 171 N. Y. S. 55; Crane Elevator Co. v. Lippert (C. C. A.) 63 F. 942; Kimber v. Gaslight & Coke Co., [1918] 1 K. B. 439. It has also been held that an independent contractor owes a duty of due care to an employee of another independent contractor rightfully on the premises, a situation closely analogous to the situation here involved. The leading case is Thrussel v. Handyside, L. R. 20 Q. B. Div. 359. See, also, cases collected 38 A. L. R. 471.

We think the principle of the above cases applies to the facts of the present case. We are of the opinion that plaintiff was an invitee of the owner rightfully on the premises and that the defendant, under the doctrine of the above cases, owed to him a duty of due care.

Defendant independent contractor contends that, as to it, plaintiff was a mere licensee. For reasons already stated, we do not think this is so, but, even if it were, the judgment of nonsuit would have to be reversed. As already pointed out, defendant installed the door and knew that the set screws had not been countersunk. Under such circumstances, the jury could have found that defendant knew, or should have known, that persons rightfully on the premises were likely to use that door; that defendant knew or should have known that it would be dangerous to use the door under those circumstances. We think the jury could have inferred that, as left by defendant, there was an implied invitation to use the door. The jury could also have found that, as left by defendant, the door was a dangerous instrumentality within the meaning of that doctrine as recently enunciated by this court in Dahms v. General Elevator Co., supra, and that, as constructed and left by defendant, it was in legal effect a trap of the existence of which it was defendant's duty to warn even licensees.

[7, 8] Defendants likewise contend the evidence conclusively showed plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law in using the door, knowing it was not completely installed. This contention is without merit. Plaintiff had observed the men who installed the door work it up and down. Even forgetfulness of a known danger is not sufficient of itself to constitute contributory negligence as a matter of law. Meindersee v. Meyers, 188 Cal. 493, 205 P. 1078. We think that, under the facts of this case, the question of contributory negligence should have been left to the jury. Davis v. Pacific Power Co., supra.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

BALDWIN et al. v. STEWART.

L. A. 13817.

Supreme Court of California.

June 21, 1933.

As Modified on Denial of Rehearing July 20,
1933.1. Executors and administrators ⇨383.

Order confirming administrator's sale, which had become final, held conclusive against purchasers duly notified of proceeding and having opportunity to present objections (Probate Code, §§ 785, 788, 1200, 1240).

2. Executors and administrators ⇨383.

Question whether property was free and clear of incumbrances could not be concluded by order confirming administrator's sale (Probate Code, §§ 785, 788, 1200, 1240).

3. Executors and administrators ⇨380(3).

In action by purchasers at administrator's sale to recover deposit made, evidence warranted finding that property was free and clear of incumbrances.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; G. R. Freeman, Judge.

Action by E. M. Baldwin and others against W. G. Stewart, administrator of the estate of Ferdinand Clement, deceased, in which defendant filed a cross-complaint. From the judgment, plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

Gerald Bridges, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

A. Heber Winder, of Riverside, for respondent.

IRA F. THOMPSON, Justice.

The respondent herein is the administrator of the estate of Ferdinand Clement, deceased, and as such gave notice on May 26, 1930, of a proposed sale of real and personal property, to wit: 160 acres of land in Riverside county (specifically described) and approximately 40 stands of bees and miscellaneous household furniture, equipment, and tools located on the real property. The date of the proposed sale was set for June 16, and the terms announced as 10 per cent. upon submission of bid and balance upon confirmation. On May 29, appellants herein submitted a bid of $6,000 for the property, which bid was dated

May 21, and permitted $600 theretofore deposited to apply on the bid. According to the findings, appellants' was the best bid received, and on June 16, the date set for the sale, it was accepted by respondent. Thereafter, and on June 26, the respondent made return of the sale and petitioned the court for an order of confirmation, which petition was set down for July 7. Respondent notified appellants of the filing of the petition and the date of the hearing, saying to them that the sale would undoubtedly be confirmed on that date. On June 25 a fire occurred in the brush on the hillside near the property. Two days later the appellants again inspected it, and on the following day, June 28, appellant E. M. Baldwin wrote H. M. Harford, the real estate agent, a letter as follows:

"I am enclosing a withdrawal of our offer on the Clement place.

"After carefully considering the situation as it now stands on the Clements place, and the danger of a re-occurrence of the recent fire which so nearly got the place, and the almost impossibility of preventing the repetition of the same, my sisters are absolutely off the deal, and say they would not live there now.

"I think you will understand the situation, they would always have a fear of what might happen.

"I want to thank you for your courtesy to us and hope you will be able to close with one of the other parties who liked the place."

This letter is set forth herein to show the real reason for appellants' efforts to withdraw from the bargain. The findings disclose that appellants attempted to withdraw their offer and demanded the return of the $600. It is also in evidence that the fire did no damage to the property here involved. On July 7, 1930, the court confirmed the sale, and respondent immediately prepared and executed a bill of sale and deed conveying the property to appellants, and delivered them to the title company to be delivered to appellants, together with a certificate of title upon payment of the balance of the purchase price. On December 6, 1930, the probate court denied the motion of appellants to vacate and set aside the order confirming the sale. Subsequently the appellants filed this action to recover the deposit of $600, and respondent countered with a cross-complaint in which he sought on behalf of the estate to recover the balance of the purchase price and compel appellants to perform their contract. Judgment was entered in favor of respondent administrator on February 19, 1932. A motion for a new trial was denied April 6, and at the same time the court amended the judgment, the amendment consisting of an adjudication that defendant execute and deliver to plaintiffs the instruments necessary to convey title and furnish a certificate of title to the real property. This appeal is from the judgment as amended.

In addition to claiming that certain portions of the findings are unsupported by the evidence, and that the court erred in admitting a particular bit of testimony, which assignments of error we will consider hereafter, it is contended by appellants: (1) That their offer "was not accepted by" respondent "before its withdrawal"; and (2) "a purchaser is entitled to receive such title as his contract calls for." It is an all-sufficient answer to these contentions to point out that the findings of the court are express upon the proposition that respondent accepted the offer for a title free and clear except for certain taxes and that respondent could deliver such a title. Therefore, unless the findings are unsupported, there is no merit in the argument.

[1] However, before proceeding to examine the sufficiency of the evidence in the questioned instances, we ought to determine whether an argument advanced by respondent to the effect that an order confirming sale cannot be collaterally attacked as appellants have attempted to do in the present action is sound. First, we observe, according to the provisions of section 1240 of the Probate Code, that an order "confirming the sale of property" is appealable. Next we may point out in the language of this court in Estate of Davis, 151 Cal. 318, 323, 86 P. 183, 184, 90 P. 711, 121 Am. St. Rep. 105: "The procedure of this state contemplates, in the administration of the estates of deceased persons, a series of different proceedings, each of which is, as to the matters embraced within its purview, separate. And an adjudication as to each step in this series is intended to be final in its nature, and not subject to review in a subsequent stage of the administration of the estate. Thus, an order appointing an administrator may be appealed from (Code Civ. Proc. § 963), or may be revoked on petition in certain instances (Code Civ. Proc. § 1383). But it cannot be said that an attack on an order appointing an administrator should, after the lapse of the time for appeal, be termed direct merely because made in some proceeding connected with the administration of the same estate, for example, on the settlement of an account, or an application for confirmation of a sale of real estate. So with other proceedings in the course of the administration of an estate, where the order or judgment made is appealable, such as orders admitting wills to probate, orders settling accounts of administrators or executors, or the like. Each can be attacked directly by appeal, or by some motion authorized by law for the purpose, or, perhaps, by bill in equity, but an attack made in a different proceeding in the same estate would clearly be collateral. Thus, in Estate of Devincenzi, 119 Cal. 498, 51 P. 845, it was held that an objection to a confirmation of sale of real estate, on the ground that the administrator's petition for the order of sale was defective, was a collateral attack upon the order of sale." We also direct attention to the fact that by section 785 of the Probate Code it is made the duty of the court to examine witnesses in relation to the sale and to determine that the sale "was legally made and fairly conducted" and, under all the conditions there named, to make its order "confirming the sale and directing conveyances to be executed." By section 788 of the same Code it is provided that, if the purchaser refuses to comply with the terms of the sale, the court may on motion of the administrator vacate the order, and direct a resale of the property, in which event, if the sum bid does not "cover the bid and the expenses of the previous sale, such purchaser is liable to the estate for the deficiency." By requiring the court to inquire into the regularity and fairness of the sale, by making specific provision for the liability of the purchaser for a deficiency in the event of his default and a possible resale, and by giving the right of appeal from an order confirming sale, the Legislature has evidenced a clear intent to make conclusive an order confirming sale which has become final. And we can see no good reason why parties who have been duly notified of the proceeding and extended every opportunity to present their objections, if any they have, should not be concluded thereby. In this connection it is to be borne in mind that by section 1200 of the Probate Code it is provided that notice of the time set for hearing of the petition for confirmation shall be given to all interested persons requiring them "to appear at the time and place mentioned in the notice and show cause, if any they have, why the order should not be made." In addition to the notice thus required, it is in evidence in the instant cause that appellants were officially notified of the time and place of the hearing and subsequently moved to vacate the order.

However, appellants rely upon an expression found in the case of Jerrue v. Superior Court, 7 Cal. App. 717, 720, 95 P. 996, to the effect that an order confirming sale is not an adjudication against the purchaser. An examination of that case discloses that it was an application for the writ of certiorari to review an order confirming a sale to petitioners, and the writ was properly deniable on the ground that there existed a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy by appeal. We cannot accept the language of the opinion relied upon as authoritative, especially in view of the manifest intent of the legislative enactments and the fact that the announced principle of Estate of Davis, supra, has been recognized and approved by this court in a long line of authorities, including Lane v. Starkey, 59 Cal. App. 140, 210 P. 277; Fletcher v. Superior Court, 79 Cal. App. 468, 476, 250 P. 195; Es- tate of Parsons, 196 Cal. 294, 237 P. 744; Estate of Barton, 196 Cal. 508, 238 P. 681; Luckey v. Superior Court, 209 Cal. 360, 287 P. 450.

The conclusion upon this branch of the case disposes of appellants' contentions that the evidence was insufficient to support those findings to the effect that theirs was the best bid for the property, that it was accepted, and that it was not withdrawn.

[2, 3] However, several others are attacked, all of which go to the proposition that the property was free and clear of incumbrances; it being the contention of appellants in this particular that the proffered certificate of title excepted "an easement in favor of the public for any public roads now existing on said property," although there was a finding specifically negating the idea that such an easement existed, as well as certain others which are to the same general effect. Such a question would not, of course, be concluded by the order confirming sale. The response to this argument of appellants is that there is no testimony of the existence of such a road. An officer of the title company testified that his company had made a preliminary report of the condition of the title and found it to be free and clear of all incumbrances except the taxes for the year 1930 to 1931 (which appellants had agreed to assume), and except for any possible roads. Under a stipulation of counsel that it might be introduced as though the witness were testifying, there was filed an affidavit by this same officer that the records of the county of Riverside and the county of San Diego did not disclose any easement for road purposes over the property, and that the title to the property disclosed no such easement, and subsequently the same affiant made, and there was filed, another affidavit to the effect that the company had issued its guaranty of title and delivered it to respondent's counsel, which guaranty did not contain an exception for any easement existing in favor of the public for road purposes. The findings were therefore proper.

Furthermore, if such a road existed, and were open and visible, the presumption would be, under the authority of McCarty v. Wilson, 184 Cal. 194, 193 P. 578, that appellants had contracted to accept the land subject to the incumbrance.

[4] Finally, complaint is made by appellants of the reception of the affidavits to which we have referred. They cannot complain, however. The record discloses that, at the close of the argument of the case, counsel for defendant and cross-complainant said: "A question of fact—a matter of fact has just come to my attention with reference to the so-called easement or restriction referred to, and it is stipulated between counsel that defendant may file the affidavit of V. T. Lawson with reference to such easement being referred to in the preliminary report, and that said affidavit shall have the same force and effect as if the facts therein stated were testified to by Mr. Lawson at the trial."

Plaintiffs' counsel replied: "I do not want to be foreclosed from answering it with a counter-affidavit." And the court responded to both, "Very well."

It is clear that the first affidavit, as well as the second, bore directly upon the reference to the easement in the preliminary report, and under the stipulation the court properly took cognizance of them.

Supreme Court of California.

June 26, 1933.

1. Gas ☞20(2).

In action against gas company for damages to building from gas explosion when match was thrown near defendant's capped riser few inches from plaintiffs' building, res ipsa loquitur held applicable.

Facts disclosed that the thing which caused the injury was under the management of the defendant, and that the accident was such as in the ordinary course of things would not have happened if those who had the management used proper care, so that, in the absence of explanation by defendant, it might properly be inferred that the accident arose from defendant's want of care.

2. Gas ☞17.

Gas company must use great care in management and control of gas.

3. Gas ☞20(4).

In action against gas company for damages from gas explosion, evidence of defendant's negligence held for jury under res ipsa loquitur doctrine.

Facts that no complaint had ever been made relative to gas company's service pipe or riser near plaintiffs' building destroyed in the explosion, that the average length of service of gas pipes was much greater than the age of the pipe in controversy, that such pipe after explosion was generally still in good serviceable condition, and that defendant employed a watchman in every district to look after leaks, had no tendency to prove that defendant gas company was not negligent.

PER CURIAM.

After further consideration of this appeal, we are of the opinion that the District Court of Appeal arrived at the correct conclusion in its decision of the case. At the time the petition for a transfer was before us, we were somewhat impressed by the statement of petitioner that the service pipe and riser were on the land of the plaintiffs and, therefore, the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur might not apply. There is some conflict in the evidence as to the correct location of said pipe line and riser. But conceding that they were located on plaintiffs' land, still they belonged to and were the property of the gas company, and the gas company had complete charge and control of them. Not only would the gas company be liable for any damage proximately arising out of the negligent manner in which they were left after they were disconnected with plaintiffs' building, but the company having the exclusive ownership and control of the service pipe and riser was in duty bound to explain the cause of any explosion that might be caused from gas escaping from said service pipe.

The opinion of the District Court of Appeal is, therefore, adopted by us as the opinion of this court. It was written by Mr. Justice Houser, concurred in by the other members of said court, and is as follows:

The plaintiffs were the owners of a frame building, one side of which was adjacent to the property line of the lot upon which the building was located. Several years preceding the date when the plaintiffs became the owners of said property, at the instance and request of the then owner thereof, the defendant Southern California Gas Company (hereinafter designated the defendant), which was engaged in the business of furnishing gas to the public generally, installed a service gas pipe from its gas main in the public street to the premises of such owner, and thereupon and thereafter by such means furnished gas to said owner for his use. At a later date, which also preceded the acquisition of the property by the plaintiffs, the gas service of the then owner was discontinued, and, with the exception of the service pipe which had been installed and was owned by the defendant, all gas pipes were removed from the premises. The service pipe "was located one foot east of the property line," which placed it just outside of the plaintiffs' building and property and within a few inches thereof. In discontinuing the service of the gas, the defendant caused to be capped the riser which extended perpendicularly from the service pipe above the surface of the soil for about four inches. The building was constructed "about six inches * * * above the ground surface." At no time did the plaintiffs have knowledge either of the location or of the existence of either the service pipe or the capped riser. Between the side of the building that was adjacent to the property line and the curb line of the street was a space of ten or twelve feet upon which a night watchman employed by the plaintiffs sometimes parked his automobile. Early in the evening of a certain day, which was several months subsequent to the date on which the plaintiffs became the owners of the premises, a boy with whom the watchman was conversing at the time, threw a burning match upon the ground near the place where the capped riser was located, and thereupon an explosion of accumulated gas occurred underneath the building, which was followed by a fire that resulted in a damage to the building, stipulated by the parties hereto to amount to the sum of $1,500. Thereafter, in an action brought by the plaintiffs against the defendant, the trial court denied to the plaintiffs any right of recovery against the defendant, but rendered judgment in favor of the latter. It is from such judgment that the instant appeal is prosecuted.

trayed by the facts herein, since which time the rule therein announced has been generally recognized and followed by the courts of this state. See 19 Cal. Jur. 704 et seq.; Willard v. Valley Gas & Fuel Co., 171 Cal. 9, 151 P. 286; Id., 180 Cal. 561, 182 P. 32; Phoenix Assurance Co. v. Texas Holding Co., 81 Cal. App. 61, 252 P. 1082, and especially Smith v. Southern Counties Gas Co., 89 Cal. App. 81, 264 P. 532.

In the instant case it appears that, since "the thing which caused the injury" was shown to have been under the management of the defendant, and that the accident was such "as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if those who have the management use proper care," in the absence of explanation by the defendant, it may properly be inferred that the accident arose from its want of care. In other words, in the situation as hereinbefore has been set forth, without further evidence on the part of the defendant, a prima facie case of negligence on the part of the defendant was established; and the plaintiffs were entitled to a judgment in their favor, unless it further appeared that, by substantial evidence introduced in behalf of the defendant, the trial court was authorized to conclude that the defendant was not negligent in the premises. See authorities cited, supra.

In substance, all the facts in evidence which in any manner even tended to warrant a surmise that the defendant had not been negligent, or that the accident was directly attributable to the negligence of either of the plaintiffs, or of some other person, were the location of the riser on the service pipe, which was shown to have been outside the property of the plaintiffs and a few inches from their building; that after the explosion and the fire the connecting threads between the riser and the service pipe were found to have been cracked; the possibility that on some indefinite and uncertain date the watchman may have driven his automobile upon or over said service pipe; that no complaints of leaks in the service pipe had ever been registered with the defendant; that the average life of gas pipes in the locality in which the one in question was located far exceeded the length of time that the particular service pipe and riser had been in use; and that, although no evidence was introduced to the effect that said service pipe and riser at any time had ever been inspected by any person, it did appear that the defendant had employed a man in "every district * * * looking for these leaks."

[2, 3] It is clear that, because of the nature and the dangerous qualities of gas, the defendant was required to use great care in its management and control. Considering the fact that the defendant simply capped the riser, rather than adopted a safer measure for its protection against liability for injuries or damages which might arise from "these leaks," especially in view of the fact that neither the service pipe nor the riser was located on the property of the plaintiffs, and that the latter neither had nor assumed to have any management or control of either the service pipe or the riser, in the absence of any substantial evidence in its defense, the responsibility of the defendant in the premises approaches a certainty. The mere possibility that the watchman may have driven his automobile over or upon or against the riser, and thus have caused the leakage of the gas, amounts to nothing more than a conjecture. For aught that appears, the breaking of the connecting threads between the service pipe and the riser may have resulted from any one or more of many different conditions which may have been present. If complaints had been made and no attention had been paid to them, such a fact might constitute additional evidence of the negligence of the defendant; but the fact that no complaints had ever been made relative to the situation would have no tendency to prove affirmatively that care had been exercised on the part of the defendant. And the same principle would apply with reference to the average length of the life of the gas pipe. If its age limit had expired, that fact might well be an item tending to show lack of care; but, because the pipe was generally still in good serviceable condition has no tendency to prove that in the circumstances present herein the defendant was not guilty of negligence. As to the inspection of the service pipe and the riser in question, the evidence merely shows that the defendant employed a man in "every district" whose business was "to look after these leaks." No evidence was presented to the effect that he had ever inspected this particular service pipe and riser. But even if it might be surmised that he had done so, the evidence contains no information as to the date when such inspection occurred—whether within a day, a week, a month, or even a year preceding the explosion and the fire. In determining the possible legal effect of such evidence as it was intended to bear upon the ultimate fact of either the care of the defendant or the lack thereof by some other person in the premises, this court is impressed with the suggestions made by the appellants in their brief herein with reference thereto, to wit: "We assert that such evidence falls far short of being substantial, and, in fact, is barely pertinent under the issue. True, we can speculate, or guess, that the watchman ran into the pipe, causing the damage. We can guess that, because of its break in the thread, something may have run over it. We might possibly hazard a guess that some time after installation, the gas company district man may have inspected for leaks. We can guess, because the average life of the gas pipe is from ten to fifteen years, that at all times this pipe was in perfect condition. But such speculative indulgences do not present substantial evidence so as to create a conflict justifying the finding of the trial court. * * *

In the opinion of this court, the inference of negligence of the defendant, which arose from the application of the rule of "res ipsa loquitur," was not met by any substantial evidence which was introduced in behalf of the defendant.

The judgment is reversed.

Philbrick McCoy, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WASTE, Chief Justice.

[1, 2] Petitioner, a practicing solicitor in England, desires to come to the United States in the British quota, establish his residence in this state, file a declaration of intention to become a citizen, and practice law here. The board of bar examiners of the State Bar, in response to petitioner's inquiry, have duly notified him that under section 24 of the State Bar Act, as amended (St. 1931, p. 1761), he cannot be admitted to practice here unless and until he is a citizen. He was further informed that by the time he becomes a citizen, a transposition consuming approximately five years, he will not be in a position to show continuous practice of the law for a period of four years of the six years immediately preceding the filing of his application, as required by rule VI governing admissions to practice and relating more particularly to admissions on motion.

In this review proceeding petitioner challenges the constitutionality of the citizenship requirement, contending that it is discriminatory and therefore violative of the Fourteenth Amendment of the federal Constitution. We find no merit in the contention. The power of the Legislature to impose reasonable restrictions upon the practice of the law, including the manner, terms, and conditions of admission to practice, has long been recognized in this state. Brydonjack v. State Bar, 208 Cal. 439, 443, 281 P. 1018, 66 A. L. R. 1507. We entertain no doubt as to the propriety or reasonableness of the citizenship requirement found in section 24 of the State Bar Act. In our opinion it constitutes a proper exercise of the police power. The reason underlying such a requirement is obvious. In Ex parte Thompson, 10 N. C. 355, 363, it is couched in the following language: "There is no profession relative to which the public good more imperiously requires that its members should duly appreciate, and honestly maintain, the freedom, the purity, and the genuine spirit of our political institutions. These are so blended and interwoven with the civil rights of the citizen, they present themselves in such an infinity of relations, as additional abutments to the several charters of property and personal security, that it is difficult to conceive how a professional advocate, owing foreign allegiance and cherishing alien prejudices, can usefully vindicate principles in the abhorrence of which he may have been nurtured; how, on many important occasions, the most brilliant forensic talents can be successfully exerted, unless they are sustained and inspired by an ardent patriotism. The excellence of every human system of laws consists as much in their administration and practice, as in the theory itself." In this connection see, also, In re Admission to the Bar, 61 Neb. 58, 84 N. W. 611, 612.

In 2 Ruling Case Law, 943, it is stated that "it seems to be an invariable requirement in the various states relative to the admission of attorneys, that the applicant * * * shall be a citizen of the United States, or eligible to naturalization." Prior to the 1931 amendment of section 24, supra, it was sufficient if the applicant for admission to practice had declared, bona fide, his intention to become a citizen. (Code Civ. Proc. § 275). Howden v. State Bar, 208 Cal. 604, 283 P.

820. However, under the amendment, nothing short of citizenship will suffice.

The cases on this general subject are collected in 39 A. L. R. 346, 349, wherein the following appears: "That discrimination against aliens in legislation relating to the granting of a license to practice law is not contrary to the Federal or state Constitutions, although this precise question has apparently never been directly passed upon, finds support in the following cases: Re Hong Yen Chang (1890) 84 Cal. 163, 24 P. 156; Templar v. State Examiners (1902) 131 Mich. 254, 100 Am. St. Rep. 610, 90 N. W. 1058; Wright v. May (1914) 127 Minn. 150, L. R. A. 1915B, 151, 149 N. W. 9; Re Admission to Bar (1900) 61 Neb. 58, 84 N. W. 611; Re O'Neill (1882) 90 N. Y. 584, affirming (1882) 27 Hun, 599; Ex parte Thompson (1824) 10 N. C. (3 Hawks) 355; Re Yamashita (1902) 30 Wash. 234, 59 L. R. A. 671, 94 Am. St. Rep. 860, 70 P. 482. The right to exclude aliens from the practice of law was based in these cases, not only upon the ground that the right to practice law is a privilege, but also upon the fact that an applicant, upon his admission to the bar, becomes an officer of the court, who should be a citizen of the state."

Other cases that lend approval to the citizenship requirement, here assailed, are Bosque v. U. S., 209 U. S. 91, 28 S. Ct. 501, 52 L. Ed. 698, and In re Robinson, 82 Neb. 172, 117 N. W. 352, 17 Ann. Cas. 878.

In conclusion it might be added that the only effect of our statute is to require petitioner, upon becoming a citizen, to pass the bar examination. This would not appear to be an unreasonable requirement.

The petition is denied, and the action of the State Bar approved.

We concur: SEAWELL, J.; THOMPSON, J.; PRESTON, J.; LANGDON, J.; SHENK, J.

DAVIS v. EDMONDS.
L. A. 14060.

Supreme Court of California.
June 21, 1933.

I. Appeal and error ⇨1099(7).

Decision on former appeal reversing judgment for defendant held binding on competency of account offered by plaintiff at both trials, concerning which objections were either not made or not preserved at first trial.

Judgment for reversal on the first appeal conclusively determined that evidence was admissible at subsequent trial in spite of absence of decision on the merits of the objections, since the decision was, in effect, though not expressly stated, that the objections were waived by not having been made or not having been urged.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1099(7).

Decision on former appeal establishes character and competency of evidence offered.

PER CURIAM.

Appeal from a judgment in the plaintiff's favor in an action on a book account for services rendered as an attorney.

The original complaint was filed on May 21, 1926. It was based on a rejected claim of $10,000 filed in the matter of the estate of John W. Mitchell, deceased, for the reasonable value of legal services rendered by the plaintiff to the decedent in the latter's lifetime during the period from October, 1921, to February, 1922. Subsequently the plaintiff, by leave of court, filed an amendment to his complaint setting up two additional causes of action, one for the same sum based on a book account for services performed; and the other involving the same claim based on a balance due upon a mutual, open and current account. Judgment in the sum of $10,000 was sought against the defendant. In addition to general and specific denials, the defendant invoked the statute of limitations as to all three counts.

The issues were twice tried. On the first trial the plaintiff conceded the outlawed character of the claim based upon quantum meruit, and he abandoned the third count when it became apparent that there was no evidence of a mutual, open, and current account. It was conceded upon that trial that, if the plaintiff could recover at all, it must be on the cause of action based on the book account; and the bar of the statute of limitations has not since been urged as to this count.

On both trials there was offered and received in evidence, over certain objections of the defendant, the journal and ledger sheets of the plaintiff as constituting the book account. The items of charges for legal services rendered to the decedent consisted of an entry of a charge of $1,000 as a retainer, a credit of $250, and an additional entry of a charge of $1,500 for legal services.

Objection on the first trial was made to the plaintiff's testifying on his own behalf concerning transactions had with the decedent, on the ground that the plaintiff was not a competent witness pursuant to the provisions of section 1880 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The objection was sustained on that ground and on the further ground that the bar of that section had not been removed during the cross-examination conducted by the attorneys for the defendant. The absence of testimony of the plaintiff concerning transactions covered by the items in the book account was made the basis of the judgment for the defendant on the first trial. On appeal, the judgment was reversed. Davis v. Mitchell, 108 Cal. App. 43, 290 P. 887. The ground of reversal was that during the cross-examination conducted by the attorneys for the defendant the plaintiff was interrogated concerning transactions had with the decedent directly relating to the services rendered by him to the decedent and his compensation therefor, and that the court erroneously concluded that the bar of section 1880 of the Code of Civil Procedure had not been waived or removed. It was there determined that prejudicial error had been committed in excluding the plaintiff's testimony concerning the items set forth in his book account.

The decision on that appeal shows that the only contention made by the defendant in support of the judgment, in addition to opposing the grounds urged for a reversal, was that the plaintiff was not entitled to sue on a book account, inasmuch as his claim filed in the estate was based on quantum meruit, and that there was a fatal variance between the cause of action alleged in the original complaint and the cause of action attempted to be set up by the amended complaint. It was determined, however, that, inasmuch as the items set forth in the book account were the same as those alleged in the claim filed, there was no sufficient variance between the cause of action alleging a book account and the claim based upon the reasonable value of the services rendered. Davis v. Mitchell, supra, 108 Cal. App. 47, 290 P. 887.

On the second trial of the case the plaintiff recovered judgment in the sum of $2,354, based on the charges and credits comprising the book account, less $500 thereof which the court found was a charge made for services rendered subsequent to the period included in the plaintiff's rejected claim. On the present appeal from that judgment the grounds urged for a reversal are, first, that the court erred in overruling the defendant's objections to the introduction of the plaintiff's account made on the grounds that the items were not original entries because not shown to have been made contemporaneously with the transactions or services they purport to cover and that the items of charge are not the proper subject of a book account; and, second, that the court erred in overruling the defendant's objection that the plaintiff was not a competent witness, notwithstanding his incompetency had been waived on the former trial. The contention was urged by the plaintiff on the second trial and is urged on this appeal that by reason of the decision on the former appeal the stated grounds are not available to the defendant.

[1, 2] Various arguments are advanced by the defendant to sustain the grounds urged for a reversal, and in particular the grounds relating to the competency of the book account as evidence. Whatever merit there may be in the defendant's arguments in that behalf, it must be said that the objections come too late. The failure timely to make or urge the objections constitutes a waiver which is binding on the defendant on the record now presented. Argue v. Monte Regio Corp., 115 Cal. App. 575, 2 P.(2d) 54; J. & J. H. Peck & Co. v. Soragan, 27 Vt. 92; Bliss v. Allard, 49 Vt. 350; Perry v. Simpson Waterproof Mfg. Co., 40 Conn. 313; Town of Alton v. Town of Gilmanton, 2 N. H. 520; Jones on Evidence (3d Ed.) §§ 257, 259; 1 C. J. 672, § 218. Obviously, the objections either not having been made on the former trial or not having been urged as a ground or grounds for upholding the judgment, the merits thereof were not expressly decided by the decision on the former appeal. Nevertheless that decision necessarily is, just as effectually as though expressly so stated, that, inasmuch as the objections were waived by not having been made or not having been urged, the items constitute the proper subject of a book account. It may very well have been expressly so stated, and in such a case no question of its binding effect could have been entertained. In fact, without that decision having been made, it must be assumed that the judgment would not have been reversed. It was a necessary element in the final determination. The evidence involved is the same on this as on the former appeal. The decision on the former appeal, having established the character and competency of the evidence as the proper subject of a book account, is binding on the parties hereto on this appeal. See 2 Cal. Jur. p. 954 et seq., and cases cited. Upon the final determination of the appeal from the judgment rendered on the first trial, the only function of the court on a retrial was to receive the plaintiff's testimony concerning the items of the account (Dracon v. Bryans, 212 Cal. 87, 298 P. 30), and proof of their correctness (22 C. J., p. 867), which was, in fact, the course followed. The record shows that in its rulings the trial court considered and interpreted the decision on the former appeal. No error in overruling the objections now urged is perceived. It may be said that all of the contentions and arguments of the defendant are concluded by the determination on the former appeal and need not be further specifically noticed.

The judgment is affirmed.

GALBRAITH v. STATE BAR OF CALIFORNIA.

L. A. 14002.

Supreme Court of California.

June 19, 1933.

1. Attorney and client ⇨44(1).

Where attorney represented admittedly guilty offenders in certain criminal proceedings, attorney's institution of civil damage actions against such former clients on behalf of persons injured in transactions involved in the criminal proceedings held in violation of professional ethics (Rules of Professional Conduct of State Bar of California, rule 5; Code Civ. Proc. § 282, subd. 5).

Rule 5 of Rules of Professional Conduct of the State Bar of California provides that a member of the state bar shall not accept employment adverse to a client or former client relating to a matter in reference to which he has obtained confidential information by reason of or in the course of his employment by such client or former client. Code Civ. Proc. § 282, subd. 5, declares it to be duty of an attorney to maintain inviolate the confidence and, at every peril to himself, to preserve secrets of his client.

2. Attorney and client ⇨44(1).

Professional conduct rule held construable as forbidding subsequent representation of another against former client in every case when, by reason of such subsequent employment, attorney may be called upon to use confidential information obtained in course of former employment (Rules of Professional Conduct of State Bar of California, rule 5; Code Civ. Proc. § 282, subd. 5).

3. Attorney and client ⇨44(1).

Attorney's conduct in advising and procuring execution of fictitious chattel mortgage by client to attorney for alleged purpose of precluding client's wife from levying upon mortgaged chattel held within inhibition of statute prescribing attorney's duties (Code Civ. Proc. § 282, subd. 4).

Code Civ. Proc. § 282, subd. 4, declares it to be duty of an attorney to employ, for purpose of maintaining causes confided to him, such means only as are consistent with truth.

4. Attorney and client ⇨53(2), 58.

Attorney's conduct in appearing as counsel in damage suits against former clients, arising out of same circumstances which led to criminal proceedings in which attorney formerly represented such clients, and attorney's taking of client's fictitious chattel mortgage to mislead adversary held to sustain finding of professional misconduct, warranting three months' suspension (Rules of Professional Conduct of State Bar of California, rule 5; Code Civ. Proc. § 282, subds. 4, 5).

Proceeding on the petition of W. J. Galbraith to review an order of the Board of Governors of the State Bar of California recommending that petitioner be suspended from the practice of law for a period of three months.

Petitioner suspended from the practice of law in accordance with the recommendation of the Board of Governors.

W. J. Galbraith, of Santa Barbara, for petitioner.

Philbrick McCoy, of Los Angeles, and A. B. Bianchi, of San Francisco, for respondent.

WASTE, Chief Justice.

Proceeding to review an order of the Board of Governors of the State Bar of California recommending that petitioner be suspended from the practice of the law in this state for a period of three months.

This recommendation is based on a finding, made by a local administrative committee and approved by the Board of Governors, that petitioner "is guilty of professional misconduct by reason of the facts alleged in the first, second and fourth counts of [the] notice to show cause and admitted in the verified answer of [petitioner] on file. * * *" Examination of the first count discloses that petitioner was retained by a person admittedly guilty of driving an automobile while intoxicated, a felony, to procure a reduction of the charge to that of reckless driving, a misdemeanor, to which the offender was to plead guilty, and be released with as small a fine as possible. This was done, and petitioner was paid a fee for his services in procuring the offender's release. During the course of the employment, the offender admitted his guilt to petitioner and admitted that he was intoxicated at the time of the accident. Thereafter, and without his client's knowledge or consent, petitioner instituted an action for damages against said client on behalf of a person injured by said client in the accident out of which arose the penal charge. It does not appear that petitioner disclosed to the injured person his prior professional relations with the offending driver. Upon objection being made to petitioner appearing as counsel for the plaintiff in the damage suit, and under direction of the trial court before whom the cause was pending, petitioner withdrew as counsel of record.

The second count involves the same type of misconduct. After being retained to obtain probation for an offender admittedly guilty of assault with intent to commit robbery, and after severing his connection with the offender, petitioner commenced an action for damages on behalf of the victim of the assault against his former client. This was done without the former client's knowledge or consent and apparently without disclosing to the injured person petitioner's prior professional relations with the offender. Again petitioner withdrew from the case only after objection had been made and sustained by the court before whom the damage suit was pending.

In substance, the fourth count charges that petitioner advised and procured a client to execute to him a promissory note and chattel mortgage for the purpose of precluding the client's wife from obtaining or levying upon the mortgaged chattel. The transaction was purely fictitious, for at the time of its consummation the client was not indebted to petitioner. Despite this fact petitioner and his client, in an affidavit attached to the mortgage, averred that it was "made in good faith and without any design to hinder, delay or defraud any creditor or creditors."

[1, 2] Petitioner in his answer filed with the local administrative committee admitted the material portions of the foregoing charges, but sought to explain his conduct as being singularly free of any willful intent to do wrong. As to the two charges first above mentioned, he urges that he was retained by two admittedly guilty offenders for a specific purpose, viz. to procure their release as quickly and as easily as was consistent with orderly procedure. Having accomplished his objective in each instance, he states that he felt no compunction in subsequently appearing as counsel against said admitted offenders in damage suits arising out of the identical circumstances leading to the penal charges. By his conduct petitioner, a practitioner of many years' standing, displayed a complete lack of appreciation of the ordinary and accepted canons of professional ethics. Rule 5 of the Rules of Professional Conduct (213 Cal. cxiv) reads as follows: "A member of The State Bar shall not accept employment adverse to a client or former client, relating to a matter in reference to which he has obtained confidential information by reason of or in the course of his employment by such client or former client." Canon 37 of the Canons of Professional Ethics of the American Bar Association (Amer. Bar. Assn. Rep. 1931, vol. 56, p. 803) is to the same effect.

A reasonable construction of this rule suggests that the subsequent representation of another against a former client is forbidden not merely when the attorney will be called upon to use confidential information obtained in the course of the former employment, but in every case when, by reason of such subsequent employment, he may be called upon to use such confidential information. In subdivision 5 of section 282 of the Code of Civil Procedure it is declared to be the duty of an attorney "to maintain inviolate the confidence, and at every peril to himself, to preserve the secrets of his client." See, also, Anderson v. Eaton, 211 Cal. 113, 293 P. 788. In Wutchumna Water Co. v. Bailey, 216 Cal. 564, 15 P.(2d) 505, 509, it is declared that "an attorney is forbidden to do either of two things after severing his relationship with a former client. He may not do anything which will injuriously affect his former client in any matter in which he formerly represented him, nor may he at any time use against his former client knowledge or information acquired by virtue of the previous relationship." The circumstances giving rise to the first two charges of misconduct were such as might suggest or require that petitioner in the prosecution of the damage suits make use of information acquired by him while representing the respective defendants in the prior penal proceedings.

[3] Petitioner's conduct in advising and procuring the execution of a fictitious chattel mortgage, as charged in count 4, for the purpose of misleading or, as petitioner puts it, "bluffing," and adversary, would seem to fall within the inhibition found in subdivision 4 of section 282 of the Code of Civil Procedure, where it is declared to be the duty of an attorney "to employ, for the purpose of maintaining the causes confided to him, such means only as are consistent with truth. * * *

[4] We are satisfied that the material allegations in counts 1, 2, and 4 of the order to show cause, as admitted by petitioner in his answer, are ample to sustain the findings of the Board of Governors, and we are satisfied with its recommendation. It is therefore ordered that the petitioner herein, W. J. Galbraith, be and he is hereby suspended from the practice of law in this state for the period of three months beginning on the 10th day from and after the filing of this order.

Executors and administrators ⇨523.

In absence of ancillary administration, California courts will recognize, as matter of comity, title vested by decree of distribution of state of deceased mortgagee's domicile to mortgage covering California land, where rights of local creditors are not involved.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Action by Cornelia Fishback and others against the J. C. Forkner Fig Gardens, Incorporated, and others. From an adverse decree, defendant named and others appeal.

Affirmed.

James T. Barstow, of Fresno, for appellant J. C. Forkner Fig Gardens, Inc.

Louis C. Levy, of Fresno, for E. O. Thompson.

C. V. Caldwell, of Los Angeles, and G. L. Aynsworth, of Fresno, for respondents.

IRA F. THOMPSON, Justice.

This appeal is from a decree of foreclosure of a mortgage and sale of the mortgaged premises and for a deficiency judgment and is taken on the judgment roll alone. The note, secured by a mortgage on land in California, was the property of one Horace Fishback, now deceased, who was at the time of his death a resident of South Dakota. Administration was had in South Dakota in a court of general probate jurisdiction, and the note and mortgage were distributed to the plaintiffs as the heirs at law of the decedent.

Appellants contend that the complaint in the foreclosure suit did not contain facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in that it did not allege any administration of the estate in California; that, the situs of the property being in California, in order to maintain the action the heirs must have acquired title to the note and mortgage through administration in a California court.

Appellants rely almost entirely on the case of Murphy v. Crouse, 135 Cal. 14, 66 P. 971, 87 Am. St. Rep. 90, which holds that stock in a California corporation has its situs in this state for the purposes of administration where ancillary letters had previously been issued in this state. That case involved a controversy between the local ancillary administrator and the purchaser from the domiciliary executor. In the case at bar, it does not appear that any ancillary administration was ever commenced, nor are we here concerned with the rights of California creditors. In the absence of ancillary administration, the California courts will recognize, as a matter of comity, the title vested in the plaintiffs by the decree of distribution rendered by the South Dakota probate court.

The case of Murphy v. Crouse, supra, is not in point for a further reason. That case represents, with regard to intangibles, the sole exception from the rule of mobilia sequuntur personam, which is recognized in this jurisdiction; that is, certificates of stock in a domestic corporation. Chambers v. Mumford, 187 Cal. 228, 201 P. 588, 42 A. L. R. 342. With respect to other choses in action, the California courts have repeatedly held that the situs of the debt is that of its owner and that it is not property in the state of the debtor. Chambers v. Mumford, supra, and cases therein cited. See, also, Estate of Layton (Cal. Sup.) 19 P.(2d) 793.

The judgment is affirmed.

Failure of interveners seeking relief against insurer to allege that automobile indemnity policy involved was issued or delivered within state, or return of execution against insured unsatisfied, held immaterial, where doing of business within state was not denied, and there was express stipulation that policy was executed and delivered within state (St. 1919, p. 776).

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by the Belt Casualty Company against William Furman, wherein Gertie Miller and Sadie Narins intervened and filed separate complaints against the Belt Casualty Company. From judgments for defendant and interveners, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Lasher B. Gallagher, of Los Angeles, and Edward D. Keil, of San Francisco, for appellant.

James F. Brennan, of San Francisco, for respondent Narins.

George F. Buck, Jr., of San Francisco, and Gumpert & Mazzera, of Stockton, for respondent Miller.

SHENK, Justice.

This is an appeal by the plaintiff from judgments in favor of the defendant, William Furman and the interveners in an action to rescind a policy of automobile indemnity insurance.

The policy was issued by the plaintiff to the defendant Furman in February, 1930. Under the contract, the plaintiff agreed to indemnify the defendant against liability for bodily injuries resulting from the defendant's operation of a certain De Soto automobile. In July, 1930, the defendant, while driving the automobile in San Francisco, collided with a street car. As a result of the collision, two passengers in his automobile, Sadie Narins and Gertie Miller, suffered bodily injuries. They filed suits against Furman, and on November 29, 1930, recovered judgments in the sums of $5,000 and $2,842.50, respectively. Those judgments have become final. On December 22, 1930, the present action was commenced by the insurance company against its assured, Furman, to rescind and cancel the contract of insurance by reason of the alleged breach by the defendant of a clause in the policy providing that the assured, when requested by the company, shall render all co-operation and assistance in his power in respect to any claim made or suit brought on account of bodily injuries resulting to persons by reason of the operation of said automobile.

On February 7, 1931, by leave of court, Sadie Narins and Gertie Miller filed complaints in intervention based on the judgments recovered by them and for affirmative relief against the plaintiff for the amounts thereof, with interest. Judgment was entered against the plaintiff Belt Casualty Company, on its complaint for rescission. Judgments were also rendered in favor of the interveners and against the company for the amounts of the judgments recovered by the former in their actions against the defendant Furman.

On its appeal from those judgments, the Belt Casualty Company makes two major contentions.

[1] The plaintiff does not contend that the interveners have not sufficient interest in the action or in the success of the defendant therein to give them the right to intervene. But, if we understand it correctly, its claim is that the interveners may not be permitted to join in an action in equity for rescission on the claims asserted by them, inasmuch as their complaints set up distinct causes of action which sound in contract and which seek affirmative relief that could be recovered in actions at law; that thereby the scope of the equitable action is enlarged contrary to the meaning and intent of section 387 of the Code of Civil Procedure. If such a general statement be declared as a correct proposition of law, the result would appear to be a denial of the benefit of said section to those directly interested in the subject-matter of the action, but who, though they be permitted to intervene in the action by virtue of their direct interest, nevertheless would be compelled to file separate suits to recover the affirmative relief to which they immediately would become entitled in the event the contentions with which they are aligned in the main action are finally sustained. The interveners here have an interest which is adverse or hostile to both parties, in the sense that each intervener has a cause of action against the defendant Furman, as to whom she has already established herself as a creditor, and a cause of action growing out of the same transaction against the insurance company on its contract of insurance, depending on the outcome of the present action. The fact that the established pecuniary interests of the interveners against both parties to the action are so directly affected by the result is the basis upon which the interveners were permitted to join in the action. The granting of affirmative relief to the interveners is but incidental to the main purpose of the section of the Code of Civil Procedure, which is to obviate delay and multiplicity of actions by creating an opportunity to those directly interested in the subject matter to join in an action already instituted. It has been stated that an intervener may be accorded affirmative relief which he could properly seek by way of cross-complaint were he one of the original parties to the action. Boskowitz v. Thompson, 144 Cal. 724, 729, 78 P. 290. See, also, 20 Cal. Jur. p. 526.

We are not referred to any theory of law or equity which would deny to the interveners the particular relief sought. Nor has the plaintiff shown that the issues of the complaints in intervention were not conveniently tried in the present action. The right to affirmative relief is not interfered with merely by reason of the fact that a separate action may have been maintained. Bogue v. Roeth, 98 Cal. App. 257, 263, 276 P. 1071; Tubbs v. Deillo, 19 Cal. App. 612, 620, 127 P. 514. As illustrated especially by the latter case, no good reason is shown here why the claims of the interveners against the plaintiffs, based on the judgments which have established them as creditors of the defendant, should not be presented through the agency of a complaint in intervention in an action by the plaintiff against the defendant wherein the very existence of the interveners' rights against the plaintiff is at stake. The fact that the action brought by the plaintiff sounds in equity and that the interveners seek a money judgment does not form a foundation upon which to base the contention that thereby the scope or function of the action has necessarily been enlarged. See 1 Pomeroy, Equity Jur. § 242. The case chiefly relied upon by the plaintiff (McNeil v. Morgan, 157 Cal. 373, 108 P. 69), was given credit in Wright v. Jordan, 192 Cal. 704, 714, 221 P. 915, for the broad proposition that, while interveners were permitted to join in the action for the purpose of sustaining or opposing the respective contentions of the parties, they would not be permitted to enlarge the scope or function of the special proceeding. In the McNeil Case the plaintiff brought an action to quiet title. All that was decided in that case bearing on the general proposition commented upon in Wright v. Jordan was that it was questionable whether an intervener may be permitted to interject issues in an action to quiet title wherein both parties had waived a jury and by which the parties would have a jury trial forced upon them; but, inasmuch as it appeared that the intervener was not entitled to a jury as a matter of right, the question was expressly not decided. McNeil v. Morgan, supra, at page 377 of 157 Cal., 108 P. 69. No similar question is raised in the present case. The question in each of the other cases relied upon by the plaintiff turned on the interest of the proposed interveners, and the order denying them the right to join in the action was upheld on the ground that their interest was not sufficient. Such cases are not in point on the question presented here.

[2] The plaintiff's second contention has no merit, in view of the state of the pleadings, stipulations on the trial, and the findings of the trial court. The contention is that the interveners are not entitled to base their causes of action on Statutes of 1919, p. 776, providing in effect for an action directly against the insurance company without the necessity of first showing that an execution against the insured was returned unsatisfied (Malmgren v. Southwestern A. Ins. Co., 201 Cal. 29, 255 P. 512), unless it is shown by their complaints that the policy of insurance sued on was issued or delivered to the insured in this state. The allegation of the plaintiff's complaint that it was doing an insurance business in the state of California was not denied. It was expressly stipulated by counsel for the insurance company on the trial that the policy of insurance was executed and delivered to the defendant in this state; and the court found that the policy was issued and delivered to the defendant in San Francisco. No further notice, therefore, need be given to this contention.

The judgment is affirmed.

KIMBALL v. GENERAL ELECTRIC CO. *
Civ. 4673.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

June 16, 1933.

Rehearing Denied July 15, 1933.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Aug. 15, 1933.

1. Master and servant ⇨354.

Relation of trust and confidence exists between employee and employer requiring employer to make full disclosure of circumstances surrounding injury suffered by employee to show who was liable.

2. Limitation of actions ⇨100(1).

Statute postponing accrual of cause of action until discovery of facts constituting fraud held applicable to tort actions (Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 4).

Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 4, providing, in substance, that cause of action for relief on ground of fraud is not deemed to have accrued until discovery, by aggrieved party, of the facts constituting the fraud, is applicable to tort actions, whether fraud consists in initial act or in concealment of cause of action.

3. Limitation of actions ⇨179(2).

In action for injuries sustained by employee, based on negligence of another employee loaned to defendant, allegations of complaint held to disclose fraudulent concealment of defendant's liability to plaintiff, tolling one-year limitation for commencement of action (Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 4; § 340, subd. 3; Civ. Code, § 1572, subd. 3).

Facts alleged in complaint in action for personal injuries sustained by employee disclosed, in substance, that plaintiff was injured through negligence of coemployee loaned to third party; that plaintiff had no knowledge of liability of third party for coemployee's negligence; that plaintiff was so incapacitated, as the result of the injuries sustained, that he was unable to carry on duties of his occupation or ascertain and investigate circumstances connected with his injuries and the party or parties responsible therefor; that employer and third party entered into an agreement whereby third party was to pay one-half of any amount which employer was required to pay to injured employee; and that employer and third party disclosed no facts showing latter's liability.

4. Limitation of actions ☞95(1).

Mere ignorance of injury, or of facts constituting injury, or of identity of person liable therefor, will not toll running of statute of limitation (Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 4; § 340, subd. 3).

5. Limitation of actions ☞100(1).

In cases of fraud, limitation is tolled until discovery of fraud (Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 4).

In cases of fraud, statute of limitation is tolled until discovery of fraud, whether fraud be in act itself or in concealment of facts until discovery of fraud or until discovery should have been made by exercise of reasonable diligence.

6. Corporations ☞425(5).

Where agents of corporation fail to speak, notwithstanding duty to speak, corporation is liable.

7. Limitation of actions ☞104(1).

Right of action for personal injuries is not lost by plaintiff's failure to commence action within time limited, if accrual was tolled by fraudulent concealment of facts (Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 4; § 340, subd. 3).

Failure to commence action for personal injuries within time limited by Code Civ. Proc. § 340, subd. 3, did not defeat right of action where accrual thereof was tolled under section 338, subd. 4, by fraudulent concealment of facts, since right of action arises under the common law and is not conferred by statute.

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; W. E. Herzinger, Judge.

Action by Clarence B. Kimball against the General Electric Company and others. From a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, the defendant named appeals.

Judgment affirmed.

Charles A. Christin, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Jesse W. Carter and Glenn D. Newton, both of Redding, for respondent.

Mr. Justice PLUMMER delivered the opinion of the court.

Other parties were made defendants in this action in the trial court, but do not appear upon this appeal, and our consideration is limited to the parties named.

The proceeding before us is an appeal by the General Electric Company, a corporation, from a judgment awarding damages to the plaintiff resulting from injuries received by the plaintiff on account of the negligent act of Dean Wilson, an employee of the General Electric Company. The injuries were received by the plaintiff on the 6th day of March, 1928, in the county of Shasta. The complaint in this action was filed on the 10th day of July, 1930. The appellant interposed the defense of the statute of limitations. The respondent relies upon fraudulent acts of concealment for the purpose of tolling the statute. No question is raised as to excessive damages awarded, nor as to the rulings of the court in instructing the jury.

Upon this appeal the following questions are presented: First, that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; second, that the testimony does not support the verdict; and, third, that subdivision 4 of section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure cannot be applied in actions founded upon tort. Other minor objections are urged, but the determination of the three issues above stated are decisive upon this appeal. The three issues above stated are so interrelated that in many instances what we have to say as to one is more or less an answer to the others.

The amended complaint, among other things, alleges that on the 6th day of March, 1928, the plaintiff was in the employ of the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, a corporation, as an electrician and general power house workman, at what is known as "pit 3 power plant" on Pit river in the county of Shasta, said power plant being then and there operated and controlled by the Pacific Gas & Electric Company. That on the same day the defendant, General Electric Company, a corporation, was engaged in repairing one of the generators in said pit 3 power plant, and had in its employ in making such repairs one Dean Wilson, who was then and there engaged in the discharge of his duties as an employee of the General Electric Company in repairing the generator just referred to. That on or about 4:40 p. m. of said day, while the plaintiff was at work in tightening a bolt on a by-pass pipe, the said Dean Wilson negligently and carelessly caused and permitted a large stay bolt, being a bolt about one-quarter inch in diameter, 54 inches in length, and weighing about 20 pounds, to drop a number of feet and strike the plaintiff a severe blow on the top of his head. That, as a result of being struck on the top of his head by said bolt, plaintiff received a compound fracture of his skull, which rendered him totally unconscious for a period of seventeen days, and in a semiconscious condition for several months thereafter. Plaintiff was required to undergo two surgical operations for the treatment of the fracture in his skull. In one of the surgical operations it was necessary to cut and remove a portion of the bone from his left shin and graft it into his skull. The result of the injury to the plaintiff caused the development of a form of pneumonia, from which he suffered for several weeks, and also a disease known as "phlebitis" of the right saphenous vein, all of which required medical and surgical treatment.

The complaint further shows that the plaintiff was under medical and surgical treatment from the date of the injury until the date of the commencement of the action. Other serious results following the injury are set forth in the complaint which we need not detail, but which appear with sufficient particularity to indicate that the plaintiff was, from the time of the injury until a short time before the commencement of this action, both mentally and physically incapacitated from attending either to the duties of his ordinary occupation or to any transactions relating or pertaining to the ascertainment of the facts or an investigation into the facts connected with his injuries, the party or parties responsible therefor, or to institute or prosecute an investigation which would lead to a disclosure of the parties responsible for his injuries, and the steps necessary to be taken by him.

The record does show that for a few months prior to the institution of this action the plaintiff acted as a watchman in the employ of the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, but, so far as disclosed, the record would indicate that at no time up to the beginning of the action was the plaintiff either physically or mentally able to perform the duties incumbent upon his former employment. So far as we read the record it does not appear that the injuries suffered by the plaintiff are seriously questioned.

The complaint further sets forth that, at the time the plaintiff received the injuries herein referred to, the plaintiff did not know, and had no means of knowing, that Dean Wilson was in the employ of the General Electric Company, a corporation; likewise, that the plaintiff did not know, and had no means of knowing, that the General Electric Company was repairing the generator upon which Dean Wilson was employed, and had no means of knowing or ascertaining that the injury which the plaintiff received was the result of the negligence of the defendant, General Electric Company. That the plaintiff received no information, and had no knowledge whatever, that the injuries which he received were caused by an employee of the General Electric Company, until on or about the 5th day of June, 1930, when there came into his possession a copy of a letter written by one J. D. McCarthy, claims adjuster for the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, to D. G. Martin, auditor for said company, which letter was found by plaintiff in the clubhouse at Volta power house, near Manton, in the county of Shasta, on or about the 5th day of June, 1930. This letter is in the following words and figures:

"Pacific Gas & Electric Company

"June 5, 1929

"Mr. D. G. Martin, Auditor

"Dear Sir: Herewith find check No. 12562 for $951.17 drawn on the Wells Fargo Bank and Union Trust Company by the General Electric Company in favor of the Pacific Gas and Electric Company.

"This check was issued to reimburse this company for one-half of the expense so far incurred for medical attention and compensation in the case of Clarence B. Kimball, an electrician and combination man who sustained a bad fracture of the skull on March 6, 1928, at Pit No. 1 Power House.

"At the time the accident occurred the General Electric Company had one of their electrical mechanics, L. A. Fitts, at Pit No. 1 supervising certain corrections and adjustments on one of the generators. To accommodate the General Electric Company and avoid the necessity of bringing extra help to the plant to assist Mr. Fitts with the work in hand, arrangements were made by which employees of the Shasta Division who were on this Company's payroll and employed at Pit No. 1, were loaned to the General Electric Company to help Mr. Fitts. It was also arranged whereby this Company would later bill the General Electric Company for the time of the employees so assigned. One of these men, Dean Wilson, accidentally permitted a large stay bolt, 4 feet 7 inches by 1½ inches, to roll off the top of the generator and in falling it struck Kimball a glancing blow on the crown of his head, lacerating his scalp and badly fracturing his skull. Kimball's life was despaired of for several days and it became necessary to remove a section of the skull that was pressing on his brain. This operation evidently saved his life and he gradually recovered. To repair the large hole in his skull, however, it was found advisable to bring Kimball to San Francisco where a section of bone taken from his shin was grafted to his skull, thereby closing the hole which previously was only protected by thin scalp tissue. This latter operation was also a successful one and Kimball returned to work on October 10th, 1928. While he made a remarkable recovery he will be under the observation of Drs. Naffziger and Fleming for a long time to come.

"Although Kimball has sufficiently recovered to return to work he will never entirely regain his normal condition. Dizzy spells can be anticipated which will preclude him from doing his regular work of lineman and electrician. Injuries of this kind always leave some permanent disability and a disability rating will no doubt be requested at a later time and granted by the Commission when applied for.

"In addition to sharing the expense so far incurred the General Electric Company has verbally agreed to share all future expense and any permanent disability rating that may be made.

"Very truly yours,

"J. D. McCarthy, Claims Adjuster."

The complaint further shows that the plaintiff was taken to San Francisco, placed in a hospital, kept there for several months, and finally returned to his home in Shasta county; and further alleges that from the time of receipt of his injuries, to wit, on the 6th day of March, 1928, up to and including the 16th day of March, 1930, the plaintiff was neither physically nor mentally able to make any investigation as to the cause of the accident, or as to who was responsible therefor; that notwithstanding his physical and mental condition the plaintiff did make inquiries of the employees of the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, to wit, of W. A. Dunwoody, G. R. Milford, and J. D. McCarthy, relative to the manner in which he received the injury, care, treatment, and compensation to which he was entitled; that during all of said time Dunwoody was foreman of pit No. 3 power house; G. R. Milford was division manager of the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, and J. D. McCarthy was the claims adjuster for said company; that during all of said time plaintiff was informed and believed that Dean Wilson was an employee of the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, and plaintiff did not know, and had no means of knowing, that Dean Wilson was, at the time of the injury to plaintiff, an employee of, and was under the control, direction, and supervision of, the General Electric Company; that from 6th day of March, 1928, up to the 16th day of March, 1930, plaintiff caused inquiry to be made of Dean Wilson, W. A. Dunwoody, G. R. Milford, and J. D. McCarthy, for information relative to the cause of the accident which resulted in the injury to plaintiff, and also who was responsible for the injury, and plaintiff was at all times advised and believed that, at the time he received said injury, Dean Wilson was an employee of the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, and that said company was responsible to plaintiff under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 831, as amended), and at no time was plaintiff advised by any one from whom he made inquiry that defendant, General Electric Company, had any connection with the injury which the plaintiff had received, or was in any wise liable to the plaintiff therefor.

The complaint then alleges that the General Electric Company, well knowing its responsibility, and for the purpose of defrauding plaintiff out of his cause of action, fraudulently and deceitfully agreed with Pacific Gas & Electric Company to the effect that, if the facts in relation to plaintiff's said cause of action against said General Electric Company were concealed from plaintiff, etc., the General Electric Company would pay the Pacific Gas & Electric Company one-half of any amount which said Pacific Gas & Electric Company was required to pay to and on behalf of the plaintiff, for medical, surgical, hospital expenses, and compensation to which the plaintiff was entitled as an employee of the Pacific Gas & Electric Company under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act. That the plaintiff had no knowledge of the agreement or understanding between the Pacific Gas & Electric Company and the General Electric Company, and no means of ascertaining the facts in relation thereto.

The answer of the appellant, while setting forth that Dean Wilson was in the general employ of the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, admits that Dean Wilson was, at the time the injury was inflicted upon the plaintiff, in the special employ of the General Electric Company.

The record shows that on the 10th day of March, 1928, Lester A. Fitts, the person in charge of the repairing of the generator referred to, an employee of the General Electric Company, reported to the appellant the circumstances which led to the injury of the plaintiff, and also stating the serious nature of the injuries. Thereafter, on March 23, 1928, at the request of the General Electric Company, Mr. Fitts went to San Francisco and made a personal report of the injury to officers of the appellant. Likewise, Mr. McCarthy, the claims adjuster for the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, advised the General Electric Company of the injury, and of the fact that Dean Wilson was assisting the engineer of the General Electric Company on the work being done at pit No. 3. This report was made to Mr. Mahoney and to Mr. Alvord, Alvord being the local manager of the appellant, Mr. Mahoney being the local auditor of the western branch maintained by the appellant.

A number of letters appear in the record as passing between the claims adjuster of the Pacific Gas & Electric Company and the auditor of the General Electric Company, relative to the amount of money expended by the Pacific Gas & Electric Company for medical and surgical attention given the plaintiff, and the settlement made by the Pacific Gas & Electric Company with the plaintiff, showing that the General Electric Company paid to the Pacific Gas & Electric Company one-half of the expenses just referred to, and also one-half of the amount of the settlement made by the Pacific Gas & Electric Company with the plaintiff, with the consent of the Industrial Accident Commission. Nowhere in the record does it appear that the Industrial Accident Commission was advised of the liability of the General Electric Company, nor of the fact that the General Electric Company was paying one-half of the expenses incurred by the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, nor of any part of the amount agreed upon in the settlement entered into between the plaintiff and the Pacific Gas & Electric Company. The agreement of settlement submitted to the Industrial Accident Commission, approved by the General Electric Company in the letters to which we have referred, is entirely silent as to the liability of the General Electric Company, or its responsibility to the plaintiff on account of the injuries sustained by him. We quote from the agreement the following: "The undersigned, Clarence B. Kimball, employee, and Annie B. Kimball, his wife, and Pacific Gas and Electric Company, employer, desiring to compromise and settle all liability which may exist against said employer in favor of said employee, and to obtain the approval of the Industrial Accident Commission thereto, hereby submit to said Commission the following agreed statement of facts: 1st. That said employee claims an industrial injury on the 6th day of March, 1928, while in the service of said employer, consisting of a fractured skull; 2nd. That at such time said employee received a wage of $135.00 per month; 3rd. That said disability is partial and permanent; 4th. That compensation has been paid to said employee up to the date of this agreement in the total sum of $593.72; 5th. That the parties hereto are desirous of compromising the liability for the following reason: A question exists as to the nature and the extent of disability caused by the injury, and whether the present disability is due to said injury." The agreement then proceeds to fix the amount of the settlement at the sum of $3,500.

The record shows that following the execution of this agreement the Pacific Gas & Electric Company acknowledged receipt of a check from the General Electric Company in the sum of $1,826.50, covering one-half of the settlement, and other small items of expense incurred by the Pacific Gas & Electric Company. The record shows that plaintiff in this action had no knowledge of the negotiations being carried on between the appellant and the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, nor did he have any means of ascertaining the contents of the letters passing between the Pacific Gas & Electric Company and the General Electric Company until he accidentally discovered the copy of the letter to which we have hereinbefore referred. All of these letters and the negotiations carried on between the two companies being of a private and secret nature, it is evident that the plaintiff could not have, by the exercise of ordinary diligence, discovered any facts in relation thereto. As we have stated, the mental and physical condition of the plaintiff and the serious nature of his injuries must be taken into consideration in determining whether he did or did not, under the circumstances, exercise due diligence in endeavoring to discover the facts relative to his injury and the company responsible therefor.

The record shows that when Dean Wilson, employee of the appellant, was requested, by the wife of appellant, for a statement of the injury, he mentioned only the fact of the injury being caused by the falling of a bolt, and did not disclose for whom he was working at the time of the injury.

[1] In arriving at the true facts as to whether there was privity of action between the Pacific Gas & Electric Company and the General Electric Company, and the inferences that might properly be drawn by the jury therefrom that the two companies were acting in concert, and that a tacit understanding existed between them that the liability of the General Electric Company should be kept concealed, and therefore the amount of damages that should be awarded to the plaintiff held down to the minimum, consideration may properly be given to section 26 of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Laws. By the terms of that section, under the circumstances disclosed in the record before us, the Pacific Gas & Electric Company was, during all the times mentioned herein, entitled to have and recover from the General Electric Company every dollar of expense incurred by it under the provisions of the act referred to, in caring for and making payment to the plaintiff in this action. No such action was begun. If any such action had been begun, it would have fully disclosed the liability of the appellant to the plaintiff in this action, and also the liability of the appellant to pay in full whatever should be allowed to the plaintiff under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Laws. Being an employee of the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, a relation of trust and confidence existed between that company and the plaintiff. It is unnecessary to cite authorities to the effect that, wherever a relation of trust and confidence exists, a full disclosure of all the facts and circumstances necessary to show who was liable for the injury suffered by the plaintiff should have been made by the Pacific Gas & Electric Company. This disclosure was not made to the plaintiff, nor does the record show it was made to the Industrial Accident Commission. The record shows, through the negotiations therein set forth, that the General Electric Company was advised of what was being done by the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, and by reason of the privity shown to have existed between them, and the payment of one-half of the expenses, that the General Electric Company ratified and approved what was being done by the Pacific Gas & Electric Company. These are inferences which, from the circumstances disclosed by the record, the jury was fully warranted in drawing.

The text found in 12 R. C. L., page 310, § 71, applies not only to the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, but also to Dean Wilson as the employee of the General Electric Company, to wit: "Subject—'Half Truths': Even though one is under no obligation to speak as to a matter, if he undertakes to do so, either voluntarily or in response to inquiries, he is bound not only to state truly what he tells, but also not to suppress or conceal any facts within his knowledge which will materially qualify those stated. If he speaks at all he must make a full and fair disclosure. To tell a half truth has been declared to be equivalent to a concealment of the other half. A partial and fragmentary disclosure, accompanied by the wilful concealment of material and qualifying facts, is not a true statement, and is as much a fraud as an actual misrepresentation, which in effect it is."

[2, 3] We conclude, in view of the authorities hereinafter cited, that the complaint states a cause of action, and the testimony is sufficient to support the verdict that subdivision 4 of section 338, of the Code of Civil Procedure, is applicable to actions based upon tort, whether the fraud consists in the initial act or in the concealment of the cause of action.

In Kane v. Cook, 8 Cal. 449, the facts upon which the court held the plea of the statute insufficient were as follows: The plaintiffs, residents of New York, consigned certain goods to the defendant, a resident of this state. The goods were received by the defendant at San Francisco on June 20, 1853, and were sold by him on the same day. No account of sale was ever rendered to the plaintiffs. In 1856, a demand was made upon the defendant at San Francisco, and, upon his refusal to pay over the proceeds, this suit was commenced. The defendant pleaded the statute of limitations. The court in overruling the plea of the defendant stated the law as follows: "It does not necessarily follow that the Statute of Limitations runs against the plaintiffs, from the day the proceeds of the consignment came into the defendant's hands. It appears from the evidence, and it is stated as a fact in the opinion of the Court below, that the defendant never rendered any account of sales to the plaintiffs, and there is nothing in the record which shows that they ever had any knowledge of the sales until shortly previous to the commencement of this suit. * * * It was the duty of the defendant not only to inform the plaintiffs of the sales, but to remit the proceeds. His neglect not only deprived them of their funds, but kept them in ignorance of their rights. To hold that the Statute of Limitations ran against them under such circumstances, would be to permit the defendant to take advantage of his own wrong; and to sustain a defence which, in conscience, he ought not to be permitted to avail himself of." The opinion further, in speaking of the diversity of the opinion of different courts, ruled as follows: "In this diversity of opinion on the question, we are free to adopt that rule which will best tend to advance justice, and prevent the perpetration of fraud; and we therefore hold that in all cases a fraudulent concealment of the fact, upon the existence of which the cause of action accrues, is a good answer to the plea of the Statute of Limitations."

In Lightner Mining Co. v. Lane, 161 Cal. 689, 120 P. 771, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 1093, the Supreme Court had before it the question as to whether, in an action for damages resulting from negligence, the statute begins to run from the fact and date of the act or from the discovery of the negligence, or of the negligent person. It was there held, in the absence of fraud in the act, or of fraudulent concealment, the statute begins to run from the date of act and fact of negligence. A long list of cases are cited to the effect that, notwithstanding fraudulent concealment, the limitation runs from the commission of the injury. However, on page 697, as the case is reported in vol. 161 Cal., 120 P. 774, a large number of cases are cited showing that fraudulent concealment delays the running of the statute until the injured parties discover, or with reasonable diligence might have discovered, the facts constituting the injury and cause of action.

On the question of fraudulent concealment the court quotes from the opinion of Bailey v. Glover, 21 Wall. (88 U. S.) 342, 349, 22 L. Ed. 636, as follows: "We are of opinion * * * that the weight of judicial authority, both in this country and in England, is in favor of the application of the rule to suits at law as well as in equity. And we are also of opinion that this is founded in a sound and philosophical view of the principles of the statutes of limitation. They were enacted to prevent frauds; to prevent parties from asserting rights after the lapse of time had destroyed or impaired the evidence which would show that such rights never existed, or had been satisfied, transferred, or extinguished, if they ever did exist. To hold that by concealing a fraud or by committing a fraud in a manner that it concealed itself until such time as the party committing the fraud could plead the statute of limitations to protect it, is to make the law which was designed to prevent fraud the means by which it is made successful and secure. And we see no reason why this principle should not be as applicable to suits tried on the common-law side of the court's calendar as to those on the equity side. * * * We hold that when there has been no negligence or laches on the part of a plaintiff in coming to the knowledge of the fraud which is the foundation of the suit, and when the fraud has been concealed, or is of such character as to conceal itself, the statute does not begin to run until the fraud is discovered by, or becomes known to the party suing, or those in privity with him."

The decision in Kane v. Cook, supra, is cited and approved.

[4, 5] Without further analyzing or referring to the opinion in the case of Lightner Mining Co. v. Lane, supra, it is sufficient to state that that case and the authorities there cited establish the law in this state that mere ignorance of the existence of the injury, or of the facts constituting the injury, or of the identity of the person liable therefor, will not toll the running of the statute, but, in cases of fraud, the statute is tolled until the discovery of the fraud, whether it be in the act itself or in the concealment of the facts until the discovery of the fraud or until discovery should have been made by the exercise of reasonable diligence.

A number of cases are cited by the appellant to the effect that the statute begins to run from the date and fact of the injury. An examination of these cases, however, discloses that they are all malpractice cases in which the plaintiff knew at all times the party committing the act and the injury committed, and we find nothing in any of the California malpractice cases cited holding that the statute of limitations cannot be tolled by fraudulent concealment in actions, based upon tort or negligence. The facts involved in the malpractice cases are such as to render them readily distinguishable from the case at bar, and also clearly indicate that, while the rulings in the respective cases set forth the law as generally followed, when applied to similar facts, the rule announced therein is neither controlling nor applicable here.

The case of Becker v. Porter, 119 Kan. 626, 240 P. 584, decided by the Supreme Court of Kansas, does hold that the statutory provision awarding relief on the grounds of fraud by tolling the statute until discovery of the fraud is had does not apply to tort actions for negligent personal injuries. The weight of authority, however, is clearly against the holding had by the Kansas court. A reading of the opinion in the case of Becker v. Porter, supra, leads to the conclusion that the holding of the court would have been the same upon the pleadings presented to it, irrespective of what is said therein as to the tolling of the statute in tort actions. Being directly contrary to the rule followed in this state, the case of Becker v. Porter, supra, cannot be considered as authority.

In 12 Cal. Jur., page 777, the text on jurisdiction in actions involving fraud, supported by numerous citations, reads as follows: "Where, in cases involving fraud, the only relief which can be granted is equitable, the jurisdiction of equity is, of course, exclusive. In other cases, both law and equity have concurrent jurisdiction. It is clear that where adequate relief cannot be granted in a court of law the case is a proper one for equitable relief. Conversely, where an action at law will afford adequate relief, equity may refuse to act." To the same effect is the text in 37 C. J., page 974, to wit: "Fraudulent concealment of a cause of action does not toll the statute where the latter creates the right and makes the cause of action conditional upon suit being brought within a specified time. In many jurisdictions the exception is incorporated in the statute itself, whereby in various although similar terms the operation of the statute is postponed, where the cause of action is fraudulently concealed by defendant, until the discovery of the cause of action, or for a time fixed after such discovery. The statute applies both at law and in equity, and indeed it has been declared that the statute was enacted for the purpose of enabling parties to set up the fraud of defendant in a court of law as well as in a court of equity." In the same volume of C. J. on page 972, we find the following: "But in actions at law, where the question whether a fraudulent concealment of the fact upon the existence of which the cause of action accrues would avoid the statute of limitations has also frequently arisen, there has been considerable conflict of opinion. In the absence of a statutory exception it is held in some jurisdictions that such concealment does not postpone the operation of the statute of limitations. The weight of authority, however, supports the contrary view and follows the rule which obtains in equity, under which such a concealment is a good reply to a plea of the statute of limitations." On page 978 of the same volume, it is said: "Fraudulent concealment may consist in fraud connected with or constituting a cause of action, or it may consist of subsequent acts designed to conceal the cause of action originating without fraud. The concealment of a cause of action as contemplated by the rule suspending for that reason the operation of the statute of limitations is considered as distinct from the fraud in the cause of action itself, fraud as the ground of relief, from the discovery of which the statute begins to run." A fraudulent concealment, of course, must refer to acts or conduct after the commission of the act resulting in the injury. It is further said: "Although a fraud may give the right to an action it will not for that reason, in the absence of a trust relation, or some subsequent active concealment, constitute a fraudulent concealment of that cause of action."

In Wagh v. Guthrie Gas, Light, Fuel & Improvement Co., 37 Okl. 239, 131 P. 174, L. R. A. 1917B, 1253, a well-considered case and one in which innumerable authorities are cited, it is held in an action for damages based upon personal injuries that "fraudulent concealment constitutes an implied exception to the statute of limitations, and a party who wrongfully conceals material facts, and thereby prevents a discovery of his wrong, or the fact that a cause of action has accrued against him, is not allowed to take advantage of his own wrong by pleading the statute, the purpose of which is to prevent wrong and fraud." It is further held therein that "the mere failure to disclose that a cause of action exists is not sufficient to prevent the running of the statute. There must be something more; some actual artifice to prevent knowledge of the fact; some affirmative act of concealment, or some misrepresentation to exclude suspicion and prevent inquiry."

From the facts set forth in the record we think the jury had a sufficient basis to find that there is something more in the instant case than the mere failure to disclose the fact that Dean Wilson was an employee of the appellant at the time of the injury. In the first place there was a trust relation between the Pacific Gas & Electric Company and its employee, the plaintiff in this action, which imposed upon the Pacific Gas & Electric Company the duty of making a full disclosure. To all the inquiries made by the plaintiff, no information was vouchsafed, other than as to the liability of the Pacific Gas & Electric Company under the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Laws. To all of these acts the jury had a right, from the facts disclosed, to draw the inference that the appellant was, not only a silent, but an active, participant therein, paying half the expense, through negotiations had with the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, in such manner that the plaintiff could not, by reasonable diligence, ascertain the true facts. The plaintiff had no means, and no right to inquire into the private correspondence or negotiations taking place between the two companies, until the institution of the action which brought to light what the record herein discloses.

[6] Dean Wilson, also, as an employee of the appellant, concealed the true facts when inquiry was made of him. Corporations only act through their agents, and, where agents fail to speak where it is their duty to speak, a corporation is liable. Subdivision 3 of section 1572, of the Civil Code reads: "The suppression of that which is true, by one having knowledge or belief of the fact" constitutes actual fraud. Being privy to all the acts of the Pacific Gas & Electric Company and of its agents, in suppressing the true facts as well as the suppression of the true facts by its employee, the appellant is shown to have actively participated in the concealment alleged in plaintiff's complaint.

In Brookshire v. Burkhart, 141 Okl. 1, 283 P. 571, 67 A. L. R. 1059, it is held that fraudulent concealment constitutes an implied exception to the statute of limitations, and a party who wrongfully conceals material facts, and thereby prevents a discovery of his wrong, or the fact that a cause of action has accrued against him, is not allowed to take advantage of his own wrong by pleading the statute. Also, if the fraud itself be secret in its nature and such that its existence cannot readily be ascertained, or if there be a fiduciary relation between the parties, there need be no evidence of fraudulent concealment other than that implied from the transaction itself—citing 17 R. C. L. 861, 862.

The opinion in the case of Brookshire v. Burkhart, supra, expressly overrules the case of Kerley v. Hoehman, 183 P. 980, in so far as it is held that concealment does not toll the statute of limitations.

In support of its contention that the complaint does not set forth sufficient facts to toll the statute, our attention is particularly called to the case of Lady Washington Consolidated Co. v. Wood, 113 Cal. 482, 45 P. 809, which, upon the question of sufficiency of the pleadings, appears to have been followed in all the subsequent California cases. It is held in that case that it is not enough that the plaintiff merely avers that he was ignorant of the facts at the time of their occurrence, and had not been informed of them until within three years. He must show that the acts of fraud were committed under such circumstances that he would not be presumed to have any knowledge of them, and that they were done in secret, or were kept concealed; and he must also show the times and the circumstances under which the facts constituting the fraud were brought to his knowledge, so that the court may determine whether the discovery of these facts was within the time alleged, and as the means of knowledge are equivalent to knowledge if it appears that the plaintiff had notice or information of circumstances which would put him on an inquiry which if followed would lead to knowledge, or that the facts were presumptively within his knowledge, he will be deemed to have had actual knowledge of these facts. The Supreme Court, in Lightner v. Lane, supra, approved this holding, and in the recent case of Consolidated Reservoir & Power Co., a corporation, v. Scarborough et al., 216 Cal. 698, 16 P.(2d) 268, the holding in the Lady Washington Case is approved, and practically all the other California cases so holding are cited. The record in this case, as we have set it forth, completely answers these objections. The plaintiff did make inquiry of the parties having knowledge of the actual facts, but the facts were not disclosed to him. He made inquiry of his employer, or of the agents of his employer, where we have shown a trust relation existed, and the true facts were suppressed. The manner in which the plaintiff discovered the true facts, or was given a lead which led to the disclosure of the true facts, is set forth in the complaint. The privacy of the transaction which concealed the true facts, and the privity existing between the two companies, is fully disclosed.

The appellant's contention that the right of action is given to the plaintiff in this case by the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 340 of the Code of Civil Procedure is without merit, the contention being that the right is conferred in that subdivision of the section of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that it is conditioned upon the beginning of an action within one year, and that, where a right is conferred, coupled with a condition, the condition becomes a part of the right, and, unless enforcement is sought within the time limited in the condition, the right is barred or ceases to exist. In support of this contention, the case of Western Fuel Co. v. Garcia, 257 U. S. 233, 42 S. Ct. 89, 66 L. Ed. 210, is relied upon, and likewise the cases therein cited, which hold that an action for the death of a person caused by the negligence of another is a right given by statute which must be brought within one year, and that the right and the condition must be raised together.

A large number of cases are cited in the annotations following the case of Brookshire v. Burkhart, 67 A. L. R., beginning on page 1070, holding that, where a right is conferred by statute, coupled with a condition as to the time when the right may be exercised, the right of action ceases at the end of the year or of the time specified. That the time specified is a condition and not a limitation. In the same annotations are found a number of cases announcing a different rule and holding that the time specified is a limitation and not a condition. The case of Brookshire v. Burkhart, supra, is one of the leading cases holding that the time specified in the statute is a limitation and not a condition.

[7] Irrespective of the cases which hold that a right of action for the death of one caused by the negligence of another, given to heirs, is conditioned upon the action being begun within a certain length of time, the argument of appellant is unsound, based upon any of the cases involving the death of the injured person, for the simple reason that the right of action for personal injuries inherent in the individual himself who is injured is a common-law right of action, and is not given by the statutes.

The only authority which we need to cite in support of the foregoing statement is volume 2, page 119, Cooley's Blackstone (4th Ed.), where the right of action for personal injuries is shown to have existed long before the enactment of any statutes relating thereto, or of any statute giving a right of action based upon the death of any one caused by the negligence of another.

The minor objections urged by the appellant, while considered, are not such as to call for the further lengthening of this opinion.

The judgment is affirmed.

WANN et ux. v. MOUNT DIABLO FINANCE CORPORATION.
Civ. 4871.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

June 16, 1933.

1. Banks and banking ⇨312½.

Buyer of loan company's stock under representation that loan would be made to qualify insurance company, whose directors were loan company's directors, as legal reserve company, could rescind for voluntary abandonment of plan to make loan.

Although buyer consented to abandonment of plan to make loan to insurance company, he did so on assurance that he was to be director and officer in new corporation to be organized, and on failure of proper parties to make him such officer his original consent to abandonment was without consideration and could be revoked and buyer restored to his original status.

2. Corporations ⇨83.

In action to rescind stock purchase for failure of consideration, fraud is not essential element.

3. Corporations ⇨83.

In action to rescind stock purchase, evidence warranted finding of nonperformance of promise to elect buyer director.

4. Appeal and error ⇨1010(1).

On appeal challenging sufficiency of evidence, appellate court need only examine record to determine if sufficient evidence exists justifying finding.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; M. G. Woodward, Judge.

Action by Raymond O. Wann and wife against the Mount Diablo Finance Corporation. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

C. M. Gill and D. P. Eicke, both of Stockton, for appellant.

McNoble, Parkinson & Coblenz, of Stockton, for respondents.

Mr. Presiding Justice PULLEN delivered the opinion of the court.

Plaintiffs, husband and wife, brought this action to rescind the purchase of stock in defendant corporation on two separate grounds: First, failure of consideration in that the stock in question was purchased upon an express agreement and representation by certain officers of defendant that the funds of the corporation to the extent of $25,000 were to be held and used exclusively as a deposit with the state of California, to qualify the Mount Diablo Mutual Benefit and Life Association as a legal reserve insurance company, which plan was abandoned; and, secondly, on the ground of fraud in that it was promised to R. C. Wann that he would, upon the purchase of stock in defendant corporation, be elected a director and vice president therein, which promise was not performed.

Judgment was rendered for plaintiffs, from which judgment defendant prosecutes this appeal.

The testimony discloses that at the time plaintiffs became interested in defendant corporation it was operated exclusively as a personal loan company. The directors of the defendant corporation were also directors of Mount Diablo Mutual Benefit & Life Association, and it was represented to plaintiffs at the time of their subscription of the stock, that the money they would pay into the defendant corporation, together with other funds, would be accumulated to loan solely to the life association in order that it might be deposited with the state as a legal guarantee required by law, thus permitting the life insurance company to qualify as the legal reserve insurance company, to the profit and advantage of defendant corporation.

[1] The evidence shows that the fund instead of being built up as agreed, was loaned to individuals, repayable in ten-month periods. Also a new corporation was formed under the laws of Nevada, which omitted plaintiff R. C. Wann from the management thereof and which changed the general purposes of the Mount Diablo Finance Company and abrogated the plan of the defendant corporation to accumulate a fund of $25,000 for the purposes above mentioned. Plaintiff consented to this reorganization upon the assurance that he was to be a director and officer in the Nevada Holding Company, the new company, but this was not done, and upon the discovery that he was neither an incorporator, director nor officer of the Nevada company, he promptly rescinded. The fact that the fund of $25,000 was not built up does not of itself give plaintiff cause for complaint, for many reasons might arise whereby the accumulation of that amount might be legally impossible, but he may properly protest against the voluntary abandonment of the project without his consent, and on that ground rescind. It is true he consented to the abandonment of the first plan, but conditionally, and upon the failure of the proper parties to perform the promised conditions, his original consent to the abandonment was without consideration and could be revoked and he restored to his original status.

[2] Upon the ground of failure of consideration, fraud is not an essential element. The promises by the officers of defendant to plaintiff may have been in good faith and with intent to perform, but if they failed of completion in a material aspect, plaintiff has a right to rescind for such failure. We believe the facts here show such a change in the status between the plaintiffs and the defendant, that should justify a rescission.

[3] In order to induce plaintiff to purchase stock in the corporation, the president of the corporation and the salesman who dealt with plaintiff promised him he would be elected a director and vice president and that he would continue in such office so long as his investment continued. Plaintiff, relying upon these promises, and believing that he had been duly elected a director, attended the various meetings of the board of directors and took part in their deliberations.

Certain minutes were introduced in evidence by the defendant which purported to show Wann had been elected a director and second vice president of the corporation. These minutes, however, were discredited, and the trial court found upon ample evidence to support the finding, that R. C. Wann had never been elected a director of defendant corporation.

Examination of the records of the corporation shows that there was no vacancy on the board of directors at the time the meeting set forth in the minutes referred to. At the same meeting and evidenced by the same minutes, it was attempted to be shown that plaintiff Wann was elected second vice president of the corporation, but an examination of the by-laws discloses that there was no such office as second vice president provided for in the organization and that there was no vacancy in the office of vice president at that time.

Therefore the court found, and we believe justly, that the said Raymond C. Wann had never been elected a director of the defendant corporation and had never been elected a vice president thereof, all of which facts were well known to the officers of defendant corporation, and by them fraudulently concealed from plaintiffs, and it was further found that except for such promises and representations respondents would not have purchased the stock in question.

[4] Appellant's ground for appeal being solely on the insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict, we need only examine the record to determine if there exists therein sufficient evidence to justify the finding of the trial court. We believe that we have set forth enough to clearly indicate that such evidence is to be found and it will serve no useful purpose to prolong this opinion by long quotations from the evidence. It is sufficient to state that the findings are amply supported and the judgment should be affirmed.

It is so ordered.

We concur: THOMPSON, J.; PLUMMER, J.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

This is a motion by respondent to dismiss the appeal on the ground that the appellant has failed to conform to the requirements of subdivision 7 of rule II of the rules established by the judicial council for the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal, in that an application stating in general terms the grounds of the appeal and the points upon which the appellant relies, and designating what portion of the phonographic reporter's notes it will be necessary to have transcribed to fairly present the points relied upon, was not made within five days of giving notice of appeal or at all.

It appears that the appellant was convicted by a jury of the crime of robbery, and judgment was pronounced on March 31, 1933. On April 3, 1933, the appellant filed a written notice of appeal, and on the same day filed a request for a transcription of the phonographic reporter's notes. The record before us fails to disclose any application or statement containing the grounds of the appeal and the points upon which the appellant relies, or any designation of the portion of the phonographic reporter's notes necessary to be transcribed in order to fairly present the points relied upon.

The appellant relies upon the case of People v. Bryant, 207 Cal. 450, 278 P. 1025. That case related to an appeal taken after section 1247 of the Penal Code had been repealed and before the judicial council had promulgated the rules of procedure which, in effect, replaced that section. The opinion in that case pointed out that section 1246 of the Penal Code continued the provisions of section 1247 in effect until such time as such rules were adopted by the judicial council, and stated that the form of the then recent legislation was such as might easily mislead an appellant.

Prior to the decision of the case referred to, appeals had frequently been dismissed for failure to comply with those provisions of section 1247 of the Penal Code which were similar in effect to the provisions of the rule here under consideration. After the promulgation of the rules of the judicial council containing the rule here in question, a compliance with the same has in many cases, only a few of which need here be cited, been held essential. People v. Davis, 103 Cal. App. 318, 284 P. 516; People v. Riga, 104 Cal. App. 477, 285 P. 1069; People v. Martin (Cal. App.) 15 P.(2d) 202. No particular difficulties are involved in complying with this rule now long established, and no reason appears why the rule should now be changed or modified by judicial decision.

The appeal is dismissed.

UNITED STATES FIDELITY & GUARANTY CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al.et al.
Civ. 8846.District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.

June 19, 1933.

1. Stipulations ⇨14(4).

Under stipulation, Industrial Accident Commission could consider letter from its physician on question of percentage of compensation claimant's disability, where copy of letter was sent to insurance carrier's attorney, though through inadvertence he was not informed of its arrival.

Stipulation recited that in event "referee should so desire a report may be obtained from Medical Department of this Commission and/or from an Expert Medical Examiner to be appointed by the Medical Department of this Commission with full authority to take such supplemental means of observation as may be necessary" to determine claimant's present condition, and that in event such report should be obtained copy thereof should be served on parties, who should have five days thereafter in which to request further proceedings otherwise submitted, and that defendant should have five days in which to produce further medical reports from attending physicians.

2. Master and servant ⇨416.

Opinion expressed in letter to Industrial Accident Commission by physician employed by commission respecting probable outcome of operative treatment of compensation claimant held not to raise conflict in evidence or constitute new evidence; hence commission was not authorized to change order finding percentage of claimant's total permanent disability.

3. Stipulations ⇨14(1).

Stipulation purporting to substitute for Industrial Accident Commission, as such, commission as board of arbitration for purpose of determining claimant's percentage of disability and necessity of treatment, having been acted on by parties as mere waiver of statutory time limitation, will be treated as such by court (Code Civ. Proc. § 1280 et seq.; St. 1917, p. 850, § 20(d).

Certiorari to Industrial Accident Commission.

Certiorari proceeding by United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company against the Industrial Accident Commission of California, to review an order of the Commission awarding compensation for injuries to Paul A. Shrader, employee.

Order annulled, with instructions.

Mills, Hunter & Dunn and John W. Holler, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Arthur I. Townsend, of San Francisco, for defendants.

STEPHENS, Justice.

Petitioner herein is the industrial accident insurance carrier.

A petition was before the Industrial Accident Commission for an industrial award, and the hearing developed that the percentage of disability of the applicant might be affected after certain treatment had been administered. A great part of the period of 245 weeks of continuing jurisdiction of the commission, section 20 (d), Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 850), had elapsed, and it was thought by all concerned that the remaining part of this jurisdictional period would be insufficient to demonstrate the effect of the proposed treatment. Accordingly the following stipulation was agreed upon: "It is stipulated by and between the parties hereto that the Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California shall assume continuing jurisdiction over the herein matter as a Board of Arbitration for a period of two years from and after the date hereof with full power and authority to alter, rescind and/or amend the Finding and Award herein upon the request of any party in interest, and to provide for a permanent disability rating resulting from the herein injury as in similar cases provided under Section 20 (d) of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act of 1917. The parties hereto expressly waive all limitations of time and jurisdiction herein as above set forth and will retain such rights and liabilities in respect to the herein claim as would exist if the 245 week period had not elapsed. The parties hereto request said Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California to act as a Board of Arbitration in the herein matter for the purpose hereinabove set forth."

This stipulation was subsequently amended by extending it sixty days and thereafter by substituting "a reasonable time" for and instead of the two-year limitation contained therein. On May 14, 1930, the commission made its award and formally found that medical treatment was needed and reasonable, as not being dangerous to life or limb. On June 6, 1930, applicant moved for a rehearing, and on July 1, 1930, this petition was denied. Petitioner repeatedly offered the additional medical and surgical treatment contemplated by the order of May 14, 1930, but applicant at all times refused the same.

[1, 2] Accordingly, after waiting nearly two years applicant petitioned that his percentage of permanent disability be fixed, asserting that his disability had become permanent, and a hearing was had. On June 14, 1932, the commission entered its "Order Amending Findings and Award," which included the fixing of permanent disability of 69 per cent. on maximum earnings and that any greater percentage of disability was the result of the declination of the applicant to submit to treatments. The applicant petitioned for a rehearing, and on September 2, 1932, the rehearing was granted and coincidentally and without any additional hearing the commission found the percentage of permanent disability to be 89 and that the refusal of applicant to submit to further treatment was not unreasonable. Subsequent to the commission's finding of June 14, 1932, the commission caused the medical report of the case by Dr. Harbaugh, a physician in its employ, to be filed and took such report into consideration in arriving at its order of September 2, 1932. Indeed, this report, being the only additional matter before the commission, would seem to have been the determining factor, as the latter order is just the opposite from the former one in the matter of the proposed treatment and very different in its effect on the percentage of disability. The commission claims that a copy of this physician's report was sent to counsel for petitioner, who denied that he had ever received it. Petitioner herein, the insurance carrier, claims that the commission had no right to receive this letter in evidence because it had never seen a copy thereof and because it had no opportunity to object to its introduction, to cross-examine the author of the letter or to rebut the contents of the letter. We think the evidence establishes the fact that the copy was sent to the attorney for the insurance carrier and that through some inadvertence he was not informed of its arrival. In these circumstances the insurance carrier cannot be heard to complain, for it stipulated under date of November 6, 1929, as follows: "It is stipulated and therefore ordered in the event the Referee should so desire, a report may be obtained from the Medical Department of this Commission, and/or from an Expert Medical Examiner to be appointed by the Medical Department of this Commission, with full authority to take such supplemental means of observation as may be necessary to determine the present condition of the applicant, all at the expense of the defendants herein. In the event such reports be obtained, copy shall be served on the parties hereto, who shall have five days thereafter in which to request further proceedings; otherwise submitted. It is further ordered that the defendant shall have five days in which to produce further medical reports from the attending physicians." We think this stipulation continued in full force so long as any phase of the case remained legally unsubmitted. But the content of the letter did not constitute any new evidence. It was merely another opinion of a physician who looked over the proceeding and the applicant more than two years after the commission had found the basic facts upon which the award was made and long after a rehearing had been denied thereon. In fact, the letter does not negative the commission's finding of more than two years before it was written that operative treatment was indicated and was not unreasonable and that such treatment might affect the percentage of disability. The doctor merely expresses his opinion that the outcome of operative treatment now would be doubtful. Under the doctrine pronounced in Winthrop v. Industrial Accident Commission, 213 Cal. 351, 2 P.(2d) 142, 144, such evidence, if evidence it is at all, "does not present a true conflict of evidence." Neilsen v. Industrial Accident Commission, (Cal. App.) 21 P.(2d) 445.

It should also be borne in mind that this petition for a rehearing which was granted was for a rehearing of the order of June 14, 1932, which did not purport to cover the basic facts disposed of in the order of May 14, 1930. In the hearing which led to the June 14, 1932, order, the commission sustained objections to questions pertinent to the original hearing and confined the evidence to the issue reserved as above indicated.

We think in the instant case the "continuing jurisdiction" extended as it was by stipulation for a reasonable time on all issues presented by the pleadings gave applicant the right to make his motion for a rehearing and after a rehearing had been granted, of course, any proper evidence should have been received. Since the Harbaugh letter, as we have seen, was no evidence at all upon the fundamental change in the commission's order, and since substantially all of the evidence in the case is the other way, it follows that the order of September 2, 1932, is wholly unsupported by the evidence.

[3] We have been somewhat puzzled with the matter of substituting the commission as such by the commission as a board of arbitration. If, as counsel for the commission says in his brief, it is strictly an arbitration under the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure (section 1280 et seq.), it is quite evident that there is much lacking to connect the final order of the commission with the arbitration. As arbitrators they could not appoint a referee for the taking of and determining the purport of evidence which they did do. However, both parties and the commission have acted upon the stipulation as being simply a waiver of time limitation on the commission. As such we have treated it herein and therefore hold that the commission was within its jurisdiction in entertaining applicant's last petition for rehearing.

The order of the commission under date of September 2, 1932, is annulled. The commission is instructed to consider the rehearing and to make its findings and award.

SPITZER et al. v. PATHE EXCHANGE, Inc.
Civ. 8995.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.
June 16, 1933.

1. Principal and agent ⇨44.

In action for breach of contract, whereby defendant agreed to distribute motion pictures made by plaintiff, evidence warranted court's finding that picture made was of quality called for by contract.

2. Principal and agent ⇨44.

In action for breach of contract whereby defendant agreed to distribute motion pictures made by plaintiff, evidence supported finding that defendant consented to assignment by plaintiff to finance corporation which advanced money to plaintiff.

3. Principal and agent ⇨44.

In action for breach of contract whereby defendant agreed to distribute motion pictures made by plaintiff, and which provided that compensation of actors should be subject to defendant's approval, evidence showed defendant gave its approval of compensation paid to actors.

4. Principal and agent ⇨44.

Where by contract plaintiff for fixed term employed defendant as agent to distribute motion pictures produced by plaintiff and to finance undertaking, and before end of term defendant wrongfully abandoned contract, it became liable in damages.

5. Principal and agent ⇨44.

Natural damages for breach by agent of contract of agency were cost and expenses of getting another agent to render service specified in contract.

6. Principal and agent ⇨44.

In action for breach by agent of contract of agency, burden was on plaintiff to plead and prove impossibility of obtaining another sales agency.

7. Appeal and error ⇨172(1).

Plaintiff could not contend on appeal that parties, when making contract, knew if contract was broken by defendant plaintiffs would lose cost of making picture, which was known approximately, without having pleaded and proved such facts and bringing up finding thereon.

8. Principal and agent ⇨44.

In action for breach of agency contract, record, not showing what parties knew respecting plaintiffs' possible loss if defendant breached contract, authorized recovery of damages naturally resulting from act complained of.

9. Damages ⇨124(3).

Where breach consists in preventing performance of contract, without fault of the other party, who is willing to perform, latter's loss consists of what he has already expended towards performance and profits he would realize by performing whole contract.

10. Principal and agent ⇨44.

In action for breach of contract whereby defendant agreed to distribute motion pictures made by plaintiffs and to pay certain sum on acceptance of each picture, defendant's liability was not limited to damages that would be awarded against one breaking contract to loan money.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by N. H. Spitzer and another against the Pathe Exchange, Inc. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals.

Reversed and remanded.

Bauer, MacDonald, Schultheis & Pettit and Fred E. Pettit, Jr., all of Los Angeles, and Coudert Brothers, of New York City (Lewis A. R. McInnerarity, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellants.

J. F. T. O'Connor and C. J. Mulvane, both of Los Angeles (Lord, Day & Lord, of New York City, of counsel), for respondents.

STURTEVANT, Justice.

The plaintiffs commenced an action against the defendant to obtain relief for the nonperformance of a contract. The defendant answered, and the trial was had before the trial court sitting without a jury. The court made findings in favor of the plaintiffs, and, from the judgment based thereon, the defendant has appealed.

In the early part of the year 1925, N. H. Spitzer, one of the plaintiffs, entered into a contract with the defendant under the terms of which the plaintiffs agreed to make several motion pictures. The defendant agreed to pay on the acceptance of each picture a certain sum of money and thereafter to distribute the picture through its sales channels and out of the proceeds to pay certain additional sums to the plaintiff N. H. Spitzer. The main office of the defendant was located in New York. The studio and laboratories of the plaintiff N. H. Spitzer were located in Los Angeles county. Soon after the contract was executed, the plaintiff Spitzer came from New York to Los Angeles and entered upon the performance of the contract. The first picture he undertook was one entitled "Heirlooms." To create a picture, the plaintiff N. H. Spitzer was compelled to employ many prominent actors, numerous persons as assistants, and to make large expenditures. To enable him to meet his expenses, it became necessary for him to obtain financial assistance. He applied to the plaintiff Cinema Finance Corporation, which undertook to make the advances under the terms of a certain assignment which will hereinafter be more specifically discussed. About the middle of August, 1925, the first picture, hereinafter called the first version, had been finished, and the plaintiff N. H. Spitzer took it to New York and tendered it to the defendant. In an Eastern theater before a committee selected by the defendant the picture was exhibited. Basing its action on the report of its committee, the defendant declined to accept the picture. After some oral discussion between the plaintiff N. H. Spitzer and Mr. Elmer Pearson, the manager of the defendant, it was agreed that certain alterations and changes should be made in the picture. Thereupon the films were shipped back to Los Angeles and the plaintiffs undertook to make the changes which Mr. Pearson had asked to be made. The changes consisted of certain deletions and some additions. After the changes had been made, the picture, as changed, and hereinafter called the second version, was again delivered to the defendant. The second version was then exhibited to a committee selected by the defendant. The report of the committee was adverse. On December 16, 1926, Mr. Pearson telegraphed Mr. Spitzer, "Our rejection of Heirlooms on ground that it is not of quality called for by contract is definite and final." After that date and before the date of the trial some other changes were, by consent, made in one copy of the picture, and there resulted what will hereinafter be termed the third version. That copy was made to fill an order from abroad. After the telegram just mentioned, the films were never returned to the plaintiffs. While the trial was being held, acting on the request of the defendant and with the consent of the plaintiffs, one version of the picture was exhibited at Culver City before an audience including the judge of the trial court, the officers of the court, and the parties and their counsel. As we understand the record, the fact does not clearly appear whether the picture so exhibited was the first, second, or third version. No additional pictures were taken and added to the first version. It is therefore apparent that the picture so exhibited was at least a part of if not the first version.

[1] The defendant contends that there is no evidence whatever in the record supporting the allegations of the complaint that the picture Heirlooms, as referred to in said complaint, was of a quality called for by the contract. One of the covenants contained in the contract was, "Each of said pictures shall be of the highest quality as regards acting, action, directing, photography, and consistency of story." As we understand the defendant, it asserts that the evidence did not show that the picture as tendered complied with any one of the calls of the contract which we have just quoted. The plaintiffs reply that the trial court made findings which, among other things, found as follows: "That the picture Heirlooms was and is a feature comedy as contemplated by said contract, and was and is of the highest quality as regards acting, action, direction, photography and consistency of story. * * *" Continuing, they quote the telegram sent by Mr. Pearson as supporting the finding. They go further, and they quote the testimony of Mr. Pearson given on the trial, which was to the effect that his objection was based solely on the ground of quality. Furthermore, they quote the evidence of Mr. Pearson to the effect that he had no objection to the picture by reason of the direction, acting, or photography. Moreover, they quote the testimony of other witnesses who testified in language highly commendatory of the picture. In another place the plaintiffs stress the fact that the trial court saw the picture exhibited, and after seeing the picture exhibited the court made findings in favor of the plaintiffs. Thereupon the plaintiffs contend that at the very least it must be conceded that there was evidence supporting the court's findings, and, if there was any conflict in the evidence, a court of review will not undertake to disturb the finding. We think these replies are abundantly sustained by the record.

In this connection the defendant vigorously contends that the plaintiffs should be confined to the tender and offer made in December, 1925. The point is untenable. There is no evidence in the record that the picture as produced was rejected prior to December 16, 1925. Furthermore, there was evidence that the first version fulfilled every call of the contract and that all changes subsequently made were made on the request of the defendant.

[2] In the next place, the defendant contends there is no evidence supporting the findings that the conveyance given by the plaintiff Spitzer to the Cinema Finance Corporation, including copyright, was ever consented to by the defendant. It is perfectly clear that in paragraph 25 of the contract there are certain provisions against assignment. Furthermore, during the trial much time was devoted to the introduction of evidence showing or tending to show the nature of the assignment made by the plaintiff Spitzer to the Cinema Finance Corporation and the consent, if any, given by the defendant to that transaction. Several of the findings made by the trial court deal with that conveyance and its effect on the rights of the parties. In substance, the findings of the trial court were that the conveyance was in its nature temporary and as a mere matter of security for the advances made by the Cinema Finance Corporation, in other words, a lien. The defendant in writing executed a document expressly consenting to a lien. The defendant does not in its brief show that the transaction was not as stated in the findings of the trial court or that it was otherwise than a mere lien and consented to by the defendant. We think that the finding is supported by the evidence.

[3] The next contention of the defendant is that there was no evidence that the defendant ever gave its approval of the compensation paid to the actors other than Wallace McDonald and Stuart Holmes. The contract contained a covenant that "the leading artists and the principal members of the cast for each of the same and their compensation shall be subject to Pathe's approval." After Mr. Spitzer commenced his work, a formal written contract showing the compensation was executed by each actor. Those formal contracts as so executed were at once sent to the defendant. No objection was made to any one of them except as to two actors. Later those objections were withdrawn and an approval was expressly given. In this same connection there was at least some evidence showing that a written approval was expressly given as to each and every one of the actors. However, the evidence regarding the consents lastly mentioned was unsatisfactory, as it is not altogether clear whether the documents were lost or destroyed. Nevertheless, some of them were not produced at the trial. Although there was a vast amount of correspondence introduced in evidence, there was not a particle of evidence to the effect that the defendant did not receive copies of the contracts with the actors, nor was there any evidence that it disapproved the compensation or the employment of any actor except as we have mentioned.

During the trial and when the foregoing matters were being discussed, the trial court called attention to the telegram dated December 16, 1925, in which the defendant rejected the production tendered by the plaintiffs. Thereupon the court remarked: "I have always assumed that where an offer of performance was refused, and a statement of refusal was made that there was a certain specified ground for that refusal, then the party making that refusal could not be heard, in case of litigation over the transaction, to say that it was refused on some other and different ground." In no place did the trial court decline to receive evidence of other grounds. In no place did the defendant undertake to introduce any evidence limiting the force and effect of the language contained in the telegram. As hereinabove stated, the findings were to the effect that the plaintiffs did and performed those things which the contract called upon them to do and perform. In view of all these circumstances, we are not inclined to hold that the point last discussed finds support in the record.

[4-8] In the next place the defendant asserts that the amount of the damages awarded to the plaintiffs is materially in excess of the amount warranted by the pleadings and the facts in the case. In computing damages the trial court computed the expenditures of the plaintiffs. It found they amounted to $111,695.25. It then found that the plaintiffs, by consent of the defendant, had sold certain foreign rights and had received $9,196.50, which the trial court deducted from the amount of the expenditures and, for the balance, $102,498.75, it gave judgment as for damages. The defendant's contention requires a statement as to the nature of the contract. That instrument is very long, and it will serve no purpose to quote extensively. By its terms the plaintiff N. H. Spitzer for a fixed term employed the defendant as his agent to exploit and distribute the pictures produced by the plaintiff and to finance the undertaking. The defendant agreed to make certain advances at an agreed rate of interest, and the plaintiff agreed that such advances should be repaid. Loss by fire was at the risk of the plaintiff, and insurance was at his expense. Title to the negatives at all times was to remain in the plaintiff. The defendant was to have title to certain positives only. Incidentally Pathe agreed to loan moneys. Before the end of the term Pathe, according to the findings, wrongfully abandoned the contract. Under all of the authorities it became liable to the plaintiff in damages. III Sedgwick on Damages § 824; 1 Mechem on Agency § 641; 2 C. J. 542; Story on Agency § 478. The natural damages for the breach by an agent of his contract of agency were the cost and expenses of getting another agent to render the service specified in the contract. Cannon Coal Co. v. Taggart, 1 Colo. App. 60, 27 P. 238, 240; John Hetherington & Sons v. William Firth Co., 210 Mass. 8, 95 N. E. 961, 966; F. E. Attedux & Co. v. Meehling Bros. Mfg. Co., 245 Mass. 483, 140 N. E. 271, 278; 2 C. J. 542. In so far as anything is contained in the briefs or has been called to our attention, we do not find that any evidence was introduced proving, or tending to prove, the natural damages. If by reason of any peculiar circumstances it was impossible by reason of the nature of the commodity or the nature of the market for the plaintiffs to have obtained another sales agency, the plaintiffs should have pleaded and proved the facts. The burden was on them. F. E. Atteaux & Co. v. Mechling Bros. Mfg. Co., supra. This they made no attempt to do. The plaintiffs cite and rely on the doctrine stated in Hadley v. Baxendale, 156 Eng. Rep. Reprint, 145. In doing so it is their claim that when the parties entered into the contract both knew that the cost of the picture would be approximately as found by the trial court, $111,695.25; that, if the contract was broken by the defendant the plaintiffs would lose said sum. However, before the plaintiffs may be heard to make this contention, it was necessary that they plead and prove the facts and that they bring up a finding thereon. Mitchell v. Clarke, 71 Cal. 163, 169, 11 P. 882, 60 Am. Rep. 529. As to what the parties, or either of them, knew or communicated one to the other of the plaintiffs' possible loss, if any, in obtaining finances or assistance in distribution and exploitation in the event that the defendant should breach its contract, the record is wholly silent. Therefore this record does not present facts allowing the application of any rule except that applicable to the damages which naturally and necessarily resulted from the act complained of. Overstreet v. Merritt, 186 Cal. 494, 200 P. 11, strongly relied on by the plaintiffs, contains nothing at variance with what we have said.

[9] In this same connection the plaintiffs cite Cederberg v. Robison, 100 Cal. 93, 34 P. 625. However, we do not understand them as contending that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover their outlay necessarily incurred in producing the picture because the defendant refused to perform. The doctrine of the case cited rests on United States v. Behan, 110 U. S. 338, 4 S. Ct. 81, 28 L. Ed. 168, which is one of the leading cases on that subject. At page 344 of 110 U. S., 4 S. Ct. 81, 83, Mr. Justice Bradley, speaking for the court, said: "The prima facie measure of damages for the breach of a contract is the amount of the loss which the injured party has sustained thereby. If the breach consists in preventing the performance of the contract, without the fault of the other party, who is willing to perform it, the loss of the latter will consist of two distinct items or grounds of damage, namely,—First, what he has already expended towards performance, (less the value of materials on hand;) secondly, the profits that he would realize by performing the whole contract." In the instant case there was no evidence of profits. There was no evidence that the picture produced by the plaintiffs was of no value; but, as the plaintiffs earnestly contend, it was of great value. It is clear, therefore, that their damage, as the record now stands, may not be said to be the amount of their total expenditures less $9,196.50, the amount received from the sale of certain foreign rights.

[10] The defendant claims that its liability should be limited to the amount of damages that would be awarded against one who breaks a contract agreeing to loan money. Hedden v. Schneblin, 126 Mo. App. 478, 104 S. W. 887. While that element enters into this case and would be a proper subject of inquiry, the contract clearly shows that the liability of the defendant would not be limited to that sum.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with what has been said above on the single issue of damages. As to that issue, both parties should be allowed to make such amendments to their pleadings as they deem necessary.

KAKIMOTO et ux.
Civ. 7816.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.
June 23, 1933.

1. Malicious prosecution ⇨16.

Action for "malicious prosecution" is one to recover damages caused by judicial proceeding instituted from wrongful or improper motives and without probable cause.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Malicious Prosecution," see Words & Phrases.]

2. Malicious prosecution ⇨10.

Gist of action for malicious prosecution is putting of legal process in force, regularly, merely to vex or injure.

3. Malicious prosecution ⇨14.

Legal damage constituting basis of action for malicious prosecution is inconvenience or harm resulting naturally or directly from prosecution.

4. Malicious prosecution ⇨1.

"Action for malicious prosecution" is supported only by showing malicious prosecution of legal proceeding before judicial officer or tribunal; remedy being trespass, not action on case, if proceedings are extrajudicial.

5. Malicious prosecution ⇨47.

Complaint for malicious prosecution must affirmatively show judicial proceeding instituted by defendant.

6. Aliens ⇨44.

In determining whether alien is entitled to admission, immigration authorities act in administrative, not judicial, capacity (Immigration Act 1917, §§ 3, 11, 15, 17 [8 USCA §§ 136, 147, 151, 153]).

7. Aliens ⇨44.

Immigration inquiry board is unauthorized to initiate alien's detention but merely inquires into cases where alien is duly detained for examination (Immigration Act 1917, §§ 3, 11, 15, 17 [8 USCA §§ 136, 147, 151, 153]).

8. Malicious prosecution ⇨1.

Immigration inquiry board receiving defendants' letters and telegram allegedly procuring alien's detention for investigation of right to admission, held to perform only administrative, not judicial, function, precluding alien's recovery against defendants in action for malicious prosecution (Immigration Act 1917, §§ 3, 11, 15, 17 [8 USCA §§ 136, 147, 151, 153]).

ARCHBALD, Justice pro tem.

A demurrer to plaintiff's second amended complaint for damages for alleged malicious prosecution was sustained without leave to amend. From the judgment entered thereafter plaintiff has appealed.

The complaint alleges in substance that defendants, "by sending" letters dated April 1, 1930, and April 27, 1930, and a telegram dated April 28, 1930, to the "Board of Special Inquiry of the United States Department of Labor, Bureau of Immigration," "the contents of each being unknown to plaintiff, instigated and procured the detention of plaintiff by the Board of Special Inquiry of the United States Department of Labor, Bureau of Immigration, on the charge of being an alien who was likely to become a public charge"; that plaintiff was "imprisoned on said charge" from April 28, 1930, to May 26, 1930, in the immigration detention ward at San Pedro, Cal.; that in so doing defendants acted maliciously and without probable cause; that on May 26, 1930, said department of labor, bureau of immigration, dismissed said charge and released plaintiff from custody. The demurrer was both general and special. Among the grounds of the latter were ambiguity and uncertainty in that it could not be ascertained from the complaint with what, if any, judicial body defendants filed any charge; whether there was a hearing before the original body before which said charges were filed and what the outcome of said hearing was, and whether the dismissal alleged was a dismissal on appeal of a decision of the original body or by the original body itself; what action or means were used to obtain the arrest of plaintiff or the nature of such action, whether civil or criminal, or in what judicial tribunal, if any, the charges were filed.

It is apparent that the general demurrer was sustained without leave to amend for the reason that the trial court adopted the contention that the proceeding alleged to have been instigated by defendants was not shown to be a "legal proceeding," and the special board of inquiry referred to was not shown to have been exercising judicial functions.

[1-4] The action for malicious prosecution is a remedy that has come down to us from the common law. It undoubtedly grew out of the malicious use of the courts for the purpose of vexation or injury and not for the bona fide prosecution of a civil or criminal cause. As was said in the case of Wass v. Stephens, 128 N. Y. 123, 28 N. E. 21, 22: "The action for malicious prosecution is very ancient. The law puts no direct restraint upon the institution by one person of a civil action or a criminal prosecution against another. He may put in motion the civil or criminal law, at his pleasure, for the enforcement of an alleged private right, or the punishment of an alleged public wrong; but if he acts from malice, and institutes a groundless prosecution against another, either civil or criminal, the law affords to the injured party a remedy through an action for damages for malicious prosecution." Such action may be defined as one brought for the recovery of damages caused by "a judicial proceeding instituted by one person against another from wrongful or improper motives, and without probable cause to sustain it." Hicks v. Brantley, 102 Ga. 264, 268, 29 S. E. 459, 460. The wrong to be righted must be based on a judicial proceeding. The gist of the action "is the putting of legal process in force, regularly, for the mere purpose of vexation or injury; and the inconvenience or harm resulting naturally or directly from the suit or prosecution is the legal damage upon which it [the action] is founded." Cooper v. Armour (C. C.) 42 F. 215, 216, 8 L. R. A. 47. Such action can only be supported by showing a malicious prosecution of some legal proceeding, before some judicial officer or tribunal, and, if the proceedings complained of are extrajudicial, the remedy is trespass and not an action on the case. Turpin v. Remy, 3 Blackf. (Ind.) 210, 216.

[5] The complaint in such an action must affirmatively show a judicial proceeding instituted by defendant. In the case of Maskell v. Barker, 99 Cal. 642, 34 P. 340, the complaint alleged only that defendant "maliciously and without probable cause sued out a writ of attachment against plaintiff's property, and extorted from him the money sued for, upon a threat made by defendant that if the same was not paid he would cause the writ to be levied on certain real property" of plaintiff which the latter was about to sell, and thus prevent the sale. It was held that the general demurrer was properly sustained because it was incumbent upon plaintiff to "allege and prove that the writ of attachment was executed by attaching his property." In other words, it was necessary to allege that the damage was done in and by the judicial proceeding, and not merely by threat of it.

Section 3 of the act of February 5, 1917 (39 Stat. 875, section 136, 44 Stat. pt. 1, p. 131 [8 USCA § 136]), excludes from admission into the United States certain classes of aliens, among which are persons "likely to become a public charge." Section 15 of such act (39 Stat. 885, section 151, 44 Stat. pt. 1, p. 137 [8 USCA § 151]), makes it the duty of the proper immigration officer at any port of entry, upon the arrival of a vessel bearing aliens, to inspect such aliens, and provides that such immigration officials "may order a temporary removal of such aliens for examination at a designated time and place," such removal not to be considered a landing. Section 11 of the act (39 Stat. 881, section 147, 44 Stat. pt. 1, p. 135 [8 USCA § 147]) provides that for the purpose of determining whether aliens arriving at ports of the United States belong to any of the excluded classes the commissioner general of immigration, with the approval of the secretary of labor, may direct that said aliens shall be detained on board the vessel bringing them, or in a United States immigrant station at the expense of such vessel, a sufficient time to enable the immigration and medical officers to make an examination sufficient to determine whether or not they belong to the excluded classes. Section 17 (39 Stat. 887, section 153, 44 Stat. pt. 1, p. 138 [8 USCA § 153]) provides for the appointment by the commissioner of immigration or inspector in charge at the various ports of arrival of such "boards of special inquiry * * * as may be necessary for the prompt determination of all cases of immigrants detained at such ports under the provisions of the law." (Italics ours.) Each such board is to consist of three members "who shall be selected from such of the immigrant officials in the service as the Commissioner General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of [Commerce and] Labor, shall from time to time designate as qualified to serve on such boards." Such boards "shall have authority to determine whether an alien who has been duly held shall be allowed to land or shall be deported." (Italics ours.) The hearings of the board are private and a record is kept of the proceedings and testimony produced before it. The decision of two members prevails, but either the alien or dissenting member may appeal to the secretary of commerce and labor and such appeal operates to stay any action in regard to the final disposal of the alien in question until the receipt by the commissioner of immigration at the port of arrival of the decision on appeal. The decision of such board is final "unless reversed on appeal to such secretary."

[6] It will be seen from the foregoing that in determining whether an alien is entitled to admission into the United States the immigration authorities are acting in an administrative and not in a judicial capacity, and such is the holding of the federal courts. U. S. ex rel. Mylius v. Uhl (C. C. A.) 210 F. 860, 862. Appellant herein admits that the board of special inquiry is not a court or judicial body, but urges that the test is not whether or not it is such court or body but whether it performs a judicial function.

The case of Cosulich v. Stempel, 81 Cal. App. 278, 253 P. 344, 345, seems to us to be applicable here in principle. In that case the action charged to have been maliciously prosecuted was the act of defendant in filing an affidavit accusing the plaintiff of dishonesty and misconduct, in opposition to plaintiff's application for a license as a real estate broker, which charge, the complaint alleged, was without probable cause and resulted in delaying the issuance of said license. The court there said, the italics being ours: "The general rule is that the action will lie only when a party has instituted or prosecuted with malice and without reasonable or probable cause some judicial proceeding against another," and that the authorities are in accord "that they must be judicial proceedings and brought before some judicial tribunal." It was argued in that case, as here, that because the commissioner was acting quasi judicially with jurisdiction to entertain proceedings of a judicial character, the action was a "judicial proceeding" within the rule applicable to malicious prosecutions. With respect to such contention the court observed that the complaint merely showed that plaintiff had applied to the commissioner for a license, and that though that officer delayed action because of defendant's affidavit until he satisfied himself that the applicant was a suitable person to be awarded a license, there were no proceedings of a judicial nature either instituted or determined. The court necessarily refused to decide whether or not if the proceeding had been one for revocation of a license already issued it would have been a judicial proceeding.

[7, 8] The case as alleged by plaintiff's complaint is that of an alien presenting himself at a port of entry into the United States for admission into the country. The function of the board of inquiry does not appear to be that of initiating detention but to inquire into cases where the alien is detained for examination before such board. Under the law, as we read it, we fail to see how there could have been any detention by the board of special inquiry. The detention is made by the commissioner general of immigration, and the authority of the board is to determine whether an alien "who has been duly held shall be allowed to land or shall be deported." On the face of the complaint, in the light of the law, the statement that defendants, by sending the letters and telegram "instigated and procured the detention of this plaintiff by the Board of Special Inquiry" is an erroneous conclusion, and the complaint on its face, with the law applied to it, shows that a detention and administrative investigation instituted by the department whose duty it was so to do. If the complaint showed that such letters and telegram had been sent to the commissioner general of immigration or the secretary of labor; that the alien was in possession of papers showing that he had formerly entered the United States and had the right to return; that the actions of defendants caused the commissioner general to make such detention; and that the real issue before the board of special inquiry was the right to enter under the papers held by the alien, appellant would be in a better position to urge that the board performed a judicial function in the instant case. On the facts alleged, however, we are of the opinion that the complaint fails to show that the board of special inquiry performed anything more than an administrative function, even assuming that something more than a conclusion is alleged in the statement that by sending letters and a telegram, the contents of which are not shown, the detention was caused and the investigation instigated.

Appellant urges that even though he is mistaken in the theory adopted for the redress of a wrong done him it is the duty of the court to indicate the correct theory if it can be stated with "slight amendment." The difficulty is that appellant made no attempt to amend but insisted in standing on his complaint; and as we are of the opinion that both general and special demurrers were properly sustained, the order of the trial court in that respect must be affirmed on appeal. Haddad v. McDowell, 213 Cal. 690, 3 P.(2d) 550.

This is an action to quiet title, based on adverse possession. During the time adverse possession is claimed to have been running in favor of plaintiff on the tract of 4.85 acres involved defendant was the record owner thereof. It was also owner of 80.65 acres lying in the northwest quarter of section 4, north of Kern river. During said time plaintiff was the record owner of 78 acres lying in said northwest quarter of section 4, south of the Kern river, being all the land in said quarter south of the river, except the said 4.85-acre tract. The Kern river runs through the quarter from its northeast corner to the southwest corner, dividing it into nearly equal parts. The quarter contained 163.50 acres according to government survey. The tax receipts introduced in evidence show the lands of the parties listed for taxation in said section 4, as follows: To defendant, all north of river in section 4, 85 acres; to plaintiff, the northwest quarter, section 4, south of river, 78 acres. In which assessment did the assessor include the 4.85-acre tract?

The law requires each person to make a statement of property owned by him and deliver it to the assessor, from which, with such additional information as he may require the parties to produce, and such investigation as he may make on his own account, he enters in the assessment book the data by and upon which is fixed the value of such property for taxation purposes. The primary concern of the assessor is that all property in the county shall be listed for taxation and that there is no duplication which would result in double taxation. The reason for requiring an estimate of the acreage of lands listed under government surveys to be included in the assessment books is thought to be that as to such lands the value, which is the final goal of an assessor, is commonly determined, as is shown by all the tax receipts in evidence, by applying a price per acre to arrive at the value, and in adjacent areas the same price is commonly used, as is shown in this case by the tax receipts.

Assuming that the parties each made the statement in the form above set forth or that the assessor on special investigation made, or corrected the assessment to its present form, what intent should be inferred therefrom? The assessor was interested to see that 163.50 acres were taxed for that quarter, and not in how it was described or to whom assessed or who paid it.

It is argued that the excess in acreage found in defendant's listing might be accounted for in the fact that it might own other land in section 4 north of the river not in this quarter, but absence of proof in this regard, with sufficient incentive to produce such proof if it existed, and an inspection of the maps put in evidence, seem to make such a claim untenable. It might more reasonably be assumed that the assessor knew or ascertained the fact to be that in that quarter defendant in fact owned 85 acres and plaintiff 78 acres and, as they could be required by law to pay only on what they owned, and each had correctly given in their statements of the acreage they owned, even if under rather loose descriptions, that he fixed the value for taxation purposes upon that understanding and basis.

In both descriptions, the parties simply ignored the 4.85-acre tract rather than go to the trouble of noting it by exception, and for long years—indeed always by these parties—it had been done that way with no misunderstanding or complaint, or reason to change, because each thereby paid the correct amount of tax according to the land owned. The accuracy of the description did not affect the assessor's problem at all, which, as suggested, is to find what property a person owns and its value. Of course, in conveyances of land the description controls where the acreage differs from what would be indicated by it.

Here the only inquiry is what was the basis or reason for fixing the value upon plaintiff's property at an amount produced by multiplying 78 acres by a certain price per acre and the defendant's value at 85 acres by using the same figure. Neither estimate of acreage is justified by the manner of describing the land. The contention that, because the land of plaintiff was described in a form which included the 4.85-acre tract, it was therefore in law assessed to plaintiff, gives no significance to the statement as to the acreage and the use made thereof.

It is obvious that a description indicating 100 acres, and specification of only 10 acres or a description which would include only ten acres with a declaration of 100 acres for taxation, would require the assessor to ascertain the facts as to ownership and intention, and if the investigation disclosed the acreage right as corresponding to ownership, and descriptions wrong, the assessor would be bound to proceed upon that fact and assess upon the acreage, and the description might be disregarded. While this should be corrected, and if not, might invalidate the tax lien, that would have nothing to do with the duty to fix the value for taxation of each owner's land by the method being used, which was by acres.

The plaintiff corporation is attempting to obtain from its adjoining neighbor, the defendant corporation, not by bargain and sale, or for any compensation, but by trespass so long continued that the law of adverse possession permits plaintiff to keep it, this 4.85 acres of sand and brush in the river bottom, mostly incapable of any use, and the use of which, surrounded as it was by plaintiff's other land, might, if it could have been discovered, have been too trifling to suggest a purpose to acquire title thereby.

[1] Plaintiff's original deed was for all the land in this quarter south of the river, which included the 4.85-acre tract, which was thereby ignored, as it seems always to have been. But, as its grantor had no title to the 4.85 acres, plaintiff acquired no title, but simply took title to the 78 acres which the grantor owned. The 4.85-acre tract had belonged to defendant for years before plaintiff's deed. Plaintiff used this deed as color of title at the trial to extend such occupancy as it could show of a minor part of the tract to a claim of use of the whole tract.

[2, 3] In acquiring title by this method the law requires the taxes to be paid. This safeguard is very important as affording a definite kind of notice, particularly to nonresident owners, that some one is paying their taxes and therefore probably trying to obtain their land by bold and persistent trespass. The policy of the law would require strict construction of a statute which permitted title to be acquired as in this case, and resolve matters of doubt against plaintiff's contention. That is, plaintiff must make it clearly appear that it was, during five years, paying defendant's taxes upon this tract.

In the present case the defendant, while possibly not appreciating the technical question involved in description, did know it was paying taxes every year on 85 acres, which would include this small tract, and which was all the land it owned in that section. In the same way it should be reasoned that the plaintiff knew it was paying taxes on 78 acres, which was all the land it owned, and was not paying on the 4.85 acres.

Judgment reversed.

6. Criminal law $\S$ 829(1).

Refusing instruction covered by instruction given held not error.

7. Criminal law $\S$ 793.

In grand theft prosecution, instruction requiring proof that defendants, "and each of them," took or carried away hog, held erroneous as suggesting that each defendant must kill and separately carry away whole hog (Pen. Code, § 487).

Jury might get impression from language of instruction in question that it was necessary for each individual defendant to kill and separately carry away whole hog, or, in other words, that taking and carrying away of less than whole hog by any one defendant, regardless of his participation in original plan to kill and appropriate hog, did not constitute grand theft.

8. Larceny $\S$ 27.

Participating in killing of hog with felonious intent to kill hog and wrongfully deprive owner thereof constitutes grand theft, though defendant obtains no part or only small portion of carcass (Pen. Code, § 487).

Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County;
Percy S. King, Judge.

Arthur Ojeda and another were convicted of grand theft, and they appeal.

Affirmed.

George R. Anderson, of San Francisco, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

Mr. Justice R. L. THOMPSON delivered the opinion of the court.

The appellants, Arthur and Manuel Ojeda, were charged jointly with Elmer Harley with the crime of grand theft committed by killing and appropriating a hog belonging to George Scally. These three defendants and Samuel Maynard participated in the commission of the offense. Maynard shot the hog. The four individuals dressed and divided the pork among themselves. The crime was discovered and they were apprehended. Maynard pleaded guilty to grand theft. Harley and the Ojeda brothers were jointly tried and convicted. In pronouncing judgment against them the court administered fines with the alternative that if the fines were not paid they should be imprisoned in the county jail until the penalty was satisfied at the rate of one day for each $2 of the fine imposed. Harley failed to appeal from the judgment. Arthur and Manuel Ojeda, however, perfected an appeal therefrom.

The appellants contend the verdict and judgment are not supported by the evidence, chiefly because the testimony of Maynard, an accessory to the crime, was not adequately corroborated by other evidence so as to conform to the requirement of section 1111 of the Penal Code. It is also asserted the court erred in refusing to give to the jury certain instructions which were offered by the appellants.

[1, 2] We are satisfied the testimony regarding the details of the crime which were related by Maynard, the accessory, is sufficiently corroborated by other evidence to adequately connect the appellants with the charge of grand theft so as to fulfill the requirements of section 1111 of the Penal Code. It is true that the crime of grand theft under the provisions of section 487 of the Penal Code may be accomplished only by participating in the actual taking and appropriating of a live animal therein mentioned and not by the mere taking of a dead carcass, having a value of $200 or less. People v. Smith, 112 Cal. 333, 339, 44 P. 663. It follows that if the evidence in the present case fails to connect the appellants with the purpose of taking and appropriating the hog while it was still alive, independently of the testimony of the accomplice, then the requirements of section 1111 of the Penal Code have not been fulfilled and the evidence of their guilt is insufficient to warrant their conviction of the crime of grand theft. But corroborating evidence of their presence and association with Maynard, who shot the hog in the nighttime, at the very time and place when and where it was killed, together with their assistance in skinning, dressing, and dividing between themselves the carcass of the animal, is ample evidence to adequately connect them with the original intention formed while the hog was still alive of killing and appropriating it.

Substantial evidence was adduced, in addition to the testimony of their accomplice in the crime, of material circumstances tending to connect the defendants with the original purpose formed while the hog was still alive of killing and appropriating it. This is sufficient to warrant their conviction under the provisions of section 1111 of the Penal Code. People v. Negra, 208 Cal. 64, 280 P. 354; People v. Davis, 210 Cal. 540, 558, 293 P. 32, 40. In the case last cited it is said, quoting from People v. Negra, supra: "The law does not require that the evidence necessary to corroborate the testimony of an accomplice shall tend to establish the precise facts testified to by the accomplice; and strong corroborative testimony is not necessary to support a judgment of conviction founded on the testimony of an accomplice. Even though circumstantial and slight, the evidence is, nevertheless, sufficient if it tends to connect the accused with the commission of the offense."

George Scally testified that he owned a ranch in Wooden Valley, Napa county, upon which he kept a band of sheep and some hogs; that the particular hog which is involved in this criminal proceeding was kept in a corral on the premises; that he was informed of the disappearance of the hog and in company with a deputy sheriff he discovered and identified its hide which, to conceal the crime, had been thrown in the well located on the property occupied by the accomplice Maynard.

Maynard made a complete confession of the entire transaction. He testified at the trial of these appellants that he met them at the Wooden Valley ranch the night of the theft and went with them to the corral accompanied by the defendant Elmer Harley, where they found the hog; that Manuel Ojeda chased the hog about the corral, trying to kill it with a hammer, but failed to accomplish his purpose; that a shotgun was then brought to him by one of the parties, by means of which he shot and killed the hog; that the four men then hauled it to a shed on the premises where they all participated in skinning and dressing the carcass; that they took the meat to the house of Samuel Herrera, where they cooked and ate some pork chops; that they then divided the remainder of the meat among themselves and separated, the appellants taking a portion of the hog with them, and that the hide was then taken home and thrown in a well to conceal the crime. He testified regarding the presence and participation of the appellants in the commission of the offense, as follows:

"Q. Who was with you, if anyone, at the time that hog was shot? A. Mr. Harley and the Ojeda boys, sir. * * * We was talking about the hog in the lot there. * * * When we saw the hog there, and we got to talking about killing it and there wasn't any gun to kill it with there, and a gun was brought there to kill it with. * * *

"Q. Some one of these three defendants handed you that gun? A. Yes sir. * * * In a way it was said (for me) to kill it."

He further testified regarding their participation in the affair:

"Q. And when you killed it, who was there? A. The two Ojeda boys and Harley was there. * * *

"Q. Who was it that helped hang it up (in the shed, for the purpose of skinning and dressing the carcass)? A. Arthur Ojeda and Manuel."

The circumstances above related were substantially corroborated by Elmer Harley. Both appellants denied they were present when the hog was shot. They denied that they helped to plan the killing of the hog or that they participated in the skinning or dressing of the carcass, or in a division of the meat.

Both Rudolph and Helen Maynard, children of the accomplice, Samuel Maynard, testified they saw the hog hauled in an automobile by their father and the two appellants from the corral to the shed and that they watched them skin and dress the animal. They also told of the subsequent cooking and eating of some of the pork by all of the parties implicated in the theft. This furnishes corroboration of the testimony of the accessory ample to support the verdict and judgment.

The jury was fully and properly instructed regarding the necessity of adducing substantial evidence to corroborate the testimony of an accessory so as to satisfactorily connect the defendants with the commission of the crime of grand theft.

[3] It is asserted the necessary intent to steal the hog was not shown because Maynard was in search of a sheep and that he was too drunk to be responsible for his conduct and thought the hog which he proposed to kill was a sheep. It was not contended the appellants were drunk. The question of the sobriety of Maynard was a problem for the jury to determine. Evidently the appellants did not rely upon that defense at the trial, for no instructions were offered by them on the subject of drunkenness. The witness Maynard thought that he fully comprehended everything that transpired during the entire affair. He testified in that regard:

"Q. As a matter of fact you don't know clearly what happened that night? A. I know the things I have told you. I know they happened. * * *

"Q. You were rather under the influence of liquor, weren't you? A. I had a few drinks, yes.

"Q. As a matter of fact, you were drunk weren't you? A. I wouldn't say that I was drunk."

[4, 5] Moreover, it is immaterial whether Maynard was drunk or sober at the time of the commission of the offense, except so far as his intoxication may have impaired his recollection of the facts and therefore affected the weight or credibility of his testimony at the trial. These were also matters for the determination of the jury. There is sufficient corroboration of the testimony that the appellants were present and helped to plan the theft and to kill the hog. If they aided and abetted in the killing of the hog with the intention of appropriating a part of its meat to themselves, then they were guilty of grand theft regardless of Maynard's condition of sobriety.

The appellants assign as reversible error the refusal of the court to give to the jury the following two instructions which were offered by them. These proffered instructions read as follows:

"II. The mere fact that the defendants ate some of the meat or, after having been given some of the meat, took it away with them is not sufficient to convict them of the crime charged. The people must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendants, and each of them, took or carried away a hog, with the criminal intent to do the act, and there must be a joint union or operation of this act and intent. The defendants cannot be found guilty of eating a portion of the hog, or carrying away a portion of the hog."

"III. If, therefore you find that the defendants had no such joint union of act and intent to commit the crime charged, you will find them not guilty."

[6] The jury was informed that the defendants were charged with willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously stealing, taking, and carrying away one sow, the property of George Scally. They were then clearly instructed that before the defendants could be convicted the jury must find that there existed "a union or joint operation of act and intent" of the accused persons in order to commit the crime. The last instruction above quoted which was refused by the court was adequately covered by the charge which was given.

[7, 8] The first instruction complained of may well have been remodeled and given under the theory of the appellants that they were not present when the hog was killed and did not participate in the grand theft, but merely accepted a portion of the meat after the crime was executed by Maynard. But it will be observed this instruction is erroneous and misleading. It charges the jury that the defendants may not be convicted unless it appears that "each of them" took away a (whole) hog. It is apparent the jury might get the impression from this language that it was necessary for each individual defendant to kill and separately carry away a whole hog to justify a conviction of grand theft. Or, in other words, that the taking and carrying away of less than a whole hog by any one defendant, regardless of his participation in the original plan to kill and appropriate the animal, does not constitute grand theft. This is not the law. The participation in the transaction with a felonious intent to kill the hog and wrongfully deprive the owner of the animal constitutes the crime of grand theft, even though the accused shares in only a small portion of the carcass or obtains no part of it at all.

The jury was fully instructed regarding the law governing principals and accessories to a crime, and of the necessity of finding that these appellants committed the act of "grand theft" with which they were charged, possessing the intention then and there to "wilfully, unlawfully and feloniously steal, take and carry away a sow, the property of George Scally." They were further instructed that: "An accomplice is one who is liable to prosecution for the identical offense charged against the defendants on trial in the cause in which the testimony of the accomplice is given."

The jury must have understood that the crime of grand theft of an animal consists of the felonious taking from the owner of a live hog and not the mere eating of a portion thereof, or of the innocent sharing of the meat without any knowledge that it had been stolen by another person. As accomplices to the theft, the jury was told by inference that it was necessary to find that the Ojeda brothers were guilty of all the elements of the crime necessary to warrant a conviction of Maynard of the identical offense.

The record on appeal necessarily convinces the reader that the appellants knowingly participated in the plan to kill and appropriate the hog. The jury must have been satisfied of that fact. There appears to have been no miscarriage of justice in this case. Even though the rejected instruction last mentioned be deemed not to be fatally misleading, still its omission is not reversible error. Under the circumstances of this case the judgment should be sustained under the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

Partnership ¶108.

Partner could maintain action against another partner for advancements to copartnership without first seeking accounting, where both amount and duty to repay were made certain by partnership contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; Percy S. King, Judge.

Action by Harley O. Johnson against Daniel Rosenstein. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Butcher & Haines, of Santa Barbara, for appellant.

Fred A. Shaeffer, of Santa Maria, for respondent.

CRAIG, Justice.

In an action by an ex-partner for advancements alleged to have been made pursuant to an agreement of copartnership, judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, from which the defendant appealed.

The determination of questions presented by appellant depends upon the language of a contract in writing between the parties. The facts are not disputed, but he contends that the action should have been an equitable one for accounting. By the provisions of said contract it was agreed that both parties should deliver to the enterprise all fixtures, office equipment, and merchandise share and share alike, to be used in common to their mutual benefit; that the respondent had invested $500 and would furnish additional sums, but not to exceed $1,500 in all, which should be repaid to him "out of the profits of said business before any division of profits shall be made by the parties hereto." And further: "In the event said partnership business shall not be successful, second party agrees to take over all of the stock and fixtures and repay to first party all the moneys put into said business by first party and return to first party all of said office equipment contributed by said first party as aforesaid."

The project proved unsuccessful, and at the end of six months ceased to function. The appellant concedes that his defense and the grounds of his appeal were "all made upon the general proposition that an accounting and settlement between copartners is a condition precedent to an action by one partner against another upon partnership claims and transactions." By the financial agreement of the parties as recited in their contract, the respondent furnished certain amounts of money which, in the event that said business should not be successful, the appellant would "repay to first party," the respondent. "It is well settled in this state, as elsewhere, that one partner cannot sue another upon a demand arising out of the partnership transactions, in the absence of a settlement of the accounts. But by the terms of this rule it does not apply where the transaction is not a partnership matter. And it seems plain that a loan from one partner to another is not a partnership transaction, notwithstanding the fact that the borrower intends to put the money into the firm and does so. Accordingly it is well settled that the lender in such a case can maintain an action for the recovery of the money, although there has been no settlement of the partnership accounts." Bull v. Coe, 77 Cal. 54, 18 P. 808, 810, 11 Am. St. Rep. 235. The record does not disclose whether or not the appellant was able to finance the business, although he agreed to repay his copartner all amounts advanced by the latter out of profits to the exclusion of the partnership, or, in the event of its termination if not successful, "all moneys put into said business." The object and purpose of advancements cannot in such a case be said to affect positive contractual obligations arising by virtue of the occurrence of an event upon which they were by the parties made contingent. Wilson v. Brown, 96 Cal. App. 140, 273 P. 847; Johnstone v. Morris, 210 Cal. 580, 292 P. 970. Nor can it successfully be asserted that ascertainment of the agreed amount due from the appellant to the respondent in such event could be effected only by an accounting. Both the amount and the duty to repay were made certain by their contract, regardless of the outcome.

The judgment is affirmed.

Civ. 4883.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

June 22, 1933.

1. Appeal and error ⇨994(3), 1012(1).

Appellate court cannot weigh evidence or pass on credibility of witnesses who testified at trial.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⇨37(4).

Statement of value may constitute a fraudulent representation warranting rescission where intended and understood as positive affirmation of fact.

3. Vendor and purchaser ⇨37(4).

Representations of vendor's agent as to value, where false, warranted rescission as representations of fact, where agent stated to purchaser as a fact that property was worth more than vendor was asking for it.

4. Equity ⇨72(1).

Laches is available as defense only when it appears that delay has prejudiced rights of opposing party or others.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Claude F. Purkitt, Judge.

Action by Frances Dewey Reton against the J. D. Millar Realty Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant named appeals.

Affirmed.

L. B. Stanton, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

James E. Fenton and Harold D. Geffen, both of Los Angeles, and Ralph W. Swagler, of Burbank, for respondent.

TUTTLE, Justice pro tem, delivered the opinion of the court.

Appellant appeals from a judgment rescinding a contract for the sale of real property, and providing for the reimbursement of the plaintiff in said action in the sum of $1,874.05.

On May 29, 1926, plaintiff entered into a contract with appellant for the purchase of a lot in the city of Hermosa Beach. The purchase price was fixed at $6,000. $300 was the initial payment, and a similar amount was to be paid on June 6, 1926, and on August 29, 1926. Thereafter $60 per month was to be paid, until the balance of the purchase price was discharged. Interest was fixed at 7 per cent. and the buyer assumed the payment of all taxes and assessments.

Plaintiff paid all of the $300 payments upon the purchase price and in addition made expenditures for taxes and interest. The money judgment allowed her was the total of these items.

The alleged false representations upon which rescission was adjudged were as follows: (1) That the lot was of the market value of $6,000; (2) that immediately appellant would procure a lessee who would lease the lot for a rental sufficient to pay all payments under the contract; (3) that appellant would pay rental for the site of its tract office on the lot as long as it remained there, in an amount sufficient to pay all interest payable on the contract.

The trial court found that the value of the lot never was $6,000, and that it was not worth any amount in excess of $4,000; that appellant did not, at the time the contract was entered into, intend to procure a lessee for said lot, and that said promise was made without the intention of performing the same; that appellant did not, while its tract office was upon said lot, pay any interest upon the contract, and that its promise to pay for the use and occupancy of the lot for the purpose of a tract office was made without any intention of performing the same; that said representations were made fraudulently, for the purpose of inducing plaintiff to enter into said contract.

Respondent, a widow fifty years of age, came to Southern California in July, 1925. She had never had any business transactions prior to coming to California. She was solicited to go to Hermosa Beach and look over the property of appellant. Upon her arrival there she was given a luncheon and attended a "lecture" by a Mr. Lashley, who pictured in the glowing and inimitable phraseology of a resident of the southland, the advantages of purchasing this property. Thereafter she was introduced to a Mr. Nolan, agent of appellant, who made the representations mentioned and secured her name to a preliminary contract with the terms as indicated. Nolan went on to state that "if you can pay one or two or three months, I will get you a lessee who will come in here and lease this property, and he will come in and put up a chicken dinner place here." Respondent replied: "I will have to rely entirely upon your judgment." Nolan's reply was: "You can rely upon my judgment, and it is a fact that this property is worth more than they are asking, and if you want to make some money this is the property for you to make money on by investing in it."

On August 29, 1926, a second and formal contract was entered into with the trustees for appellant, the terms and conditions being identical with those of the preliminary contract of May 29, 1926. It seems to be conceded by all parties that this second contract took the place of the first informal contract, which was more in the nature of a receipt.

[1] The sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings is challenged. We have examined the record and find that there is ample testimony to sustain these findings. The argument of appellant is based upon the theory that we can weigh the evidence here, and pass upon the credibility of the witnesses who appeared before the trial court. Upon the question of the value of the lot, appellant says, for instance, that a deputy assessor who testified for plaintiff "had no knowledge of market prices or sales; he had figures on values for assessment purposes and gave what must be considered as his personal opinion on a fair market value." The testimony of plaintiff's witnesses is characterized as "purely theoretical, conjectural and personal." It requires no citation of authorities when we state that an appellate tribunal is absolutely foreclosed from projecting any inquiry into such matters, which are peculiarly within the exclusive province of the trial court. There is no merit in the attack upon the finding, based upon their lack of evidentiary support.

[2, 3] Appellant contends that the representations as to value were merely matters of opinion, and hence not actionable. It is true that a bare and naked statement as to value is ordinarily deemed the opinion of the party making the representation. Meeker v. Cross, 59 Cal. App. 512, 211 P. 229. On the other hand, such statement may be a positive affirmation of a fact, intended as such by the party making it, and reasonably regarded as such by the party to whom it is made. When it is such, it is like any other representation of fact, and may be a fraudulent representation warranting rescission. Crandall v. Parks, 152 Cal. 772, 93 P. 1018. The representations as to value in the instant case are very similar to those made in the latter case. For instance, Nolan, the agent for appellant, stated to plaintiff: "I can assure you that I know that it is a fact that this property is priced very, very reasonable, and in fact it is worth more than the company is asking for it." Such representations as to value will warrant a rescission.

The other two "representations" are really promises made without any intention of performing them. This constitutes actual fraud under the provisions of section 1572, subdivision 4, of the Civil Code. The essence of the fraud, under such circumstances, is not the breach of the promise, but the fraudulent intent not to perform. The subsequent conduct of appellant is sufficient in this case to show that there was no intention to perform the promises.

[4] The contention that plaintiff was guilty of laches is likewise without merit. The trial court found against appellant upon this issue. While considerable time elapsed between the execution of the contract and the service of the notice of rescission, there were many facts and circumstances which appear in the record and which would tend to excuse the failure of plaintiff to take immediate steps to rescind, and which are sufficient to form the basis for the finding upon this question. Furthermore, laches is only available as a defense when it appears that the delay has prejudiced the rights of the opposing party, or others. Newport v. Hatton, 195 Cal. 132, 231 P. 987. Appellant here has made no showing of prejudice, as a result of the delay of which it complains.

Other points raised by appellant have been considered, but they are devoid of substantial merit and hence no discussion of them is necessary.

No sufficient cause having been shown for disturbing the judgment, it is accordingly affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by Jay J. Boness and wife against Charles W. Helphinstine. From an order granting plaintiffs a new trial, after judgment for defendant, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Butler Van Dyke, Desmond & Harris, of Sacramento, for appellant.

J. Oscar Goldstein, of Chico, for respondents.

Mr. Justice R. L. THOMPSON delivered the opinion of the court.

The defendant has appealed from an order granting a new trial after judgment was rendered in his favor pursuant to the verdict of a jury. The suit was brought to recover damages for personal injuries sustained as the result of an automobile collision at the intersection of streets in Chico. The appellant contends that the court abused its discretion in granting a new trial, and that the evidence conclusively shows that the plaintiff Jay J. Boness was guilty of contributory negligence which bars him from the right to recover judgment.

About 6:30 o'clock in the evening of December 4, 1930, a collision occurred between the automobiles of the plaintiff and defendant at the intersection of Sacramento avenue and the Esplanade in Chico. The plaintiff, accompanied by his wife and child, were driving northerly on Sacramento avenue. He executed a left-hand turn on the Esplanade. As his car reached the intersection of these streets, the defendant's machine, which was running southerly on Sacramento avenue, struck plaintiff's car and drove it into the left-hand gutter. The plaintiff's wife sustained injuries, and his automobile was badly demolished.

Both the plaintiff and his wife testified to substantially the same facts. They said that their machine entered the intersection of the streets traveling on the proper side thereof at about the rate of 15 miles an hour; that when they first entered the intersection they observed the defendant's car coming toward them along Sacramento avenue. He was then about 150 feet away and running at the rate of 35 miles an hour. After diminishing their speed to permit another machine to pass ahead of them, and observing that the defendant was bearing down upon them at a rapid rate of speed, the plaintiff stepped on his accelerator to avoid the collision, but was struck as above related. The plaintiff testified in that regard:

"Q. Who was in the intersection first * * * ? A. I was. * * *

"Q. How fast were you going across that crossing when you made the turn? A. Fifteen miles. * * *

"Q. When you got into the intersection how was he coming at you, fast or slow? A. Fast. * * *

"Q. What can you say as to his speed? A. I would say he was going 35 miles an hour or more. * * *

"Q. Why didn't you stop when you saw him coming at you at that high rate of speed? A. Because I knew he was going to hit me. * * *

"Q. What did you do? A. I stepped on the gas and kept going fast.

"Q. Could you have done anything else? A. No sir."

The chief defense was directed toward the contention that the plaintiff's wife was not seriously injured as a result of the accident. It was also claimed the plaintiff made a left-hand turn on the wrong side of the central intersection of the streets and that his conduct constituted contributory negligence which precludes his right of recovery. There is a conflict of evidence regarding this contention of the defendant. When the evidence of the plaintiff was closed, the defendant made no motion for a nonsuit. By this failure he appears to have recognized the fact that contributory negligence was not shown by the evidence of the plaintiff as a matter of law. The defendant's attorney recognized the fact that he expected a conflict regarding the cause of the accident, by saying to the jury, in his opening statement, after the plaintiff's evidence was closed: "The defendant will produce an eyewitness to that accident and * * * will show you how this accident actually occurred; * * * we will show that Jay J. Boness started to make that turn from a point approximately fifty or fifty-five feet south of that intersection; that at no time did he ever reach the right-hand side of Sacramento avenue; that on the contrary he cut that corner very sharply."

The cause was tried with a jury. A verdict was returned in favor of the defendant. A judgment was entered accordingly. The plaintiff moved for a new trial on the ground among others, that the evidence fails to support the judgment. This motion was granted "because of the insufficiency of the evidence." From this order the defendant has appealed.

[1-3] The record in this case discloses a conflict of evidence on the material issues which are involved. The contributory negligence of the plaintiff is not shown as a matter of law. The granting of a new trial for the insufficiency of the evidence to support the judgment is largely discretionary. Except for an abuse of discretion, an order granting a new trial may not be disturbed on appeal. There is no abuse of discretion shown by the record in the granting of a new trial in the present case. 2 Cal. Jur.

905, § 533; Johnson v. Ostrom (Cal. App.) 16 P.(2d) 794; Peri v. Culley, 119 Cal. App. 117, 6 P.(2d) 86; People v. Driggs, 111 Cal. App. 42, 295 P. 51.

[4, 5] It is immaterial that the judge may have used the following expression in the rendering of his opinion granting a new trial, to wit: "Testimony other than that given by human beings has influenced the jury in this case." The order was in fact granted "because of the insufficiency of the evidence." If the previous statement of the judge should be considered, it apparently indicates that he was satisfied the verdict of the jury was in conflict with the reliable evidence. An appellate court may not consider extraneous remarks of a judge in passing upon a motion for new trial to upset an order which specifically assigns the statutory grounds (Code Civ. Proc. § 657) upon which the new trial is granted. In People v. Driggs, 111 Cal. App. 42, 295 P. 51, 52, it is said in that regard: "When the cause is brought to an appellate court, argument as to what the trial court may have thought, as given utterance by the words used before final action is taken, cannot be considered, unless directly in line with the subsequent orders made. * * * If the opinion contains expressions foreign to the order actually entered, the order entered only is controlling."

The order granting a new trial is affirmed.

Petition by Grace Violet Greenwell and others for a writ of review, opposed by the Industrial Accident Commission and others, to review the Commission's decision denying compensation by way of death benefit in a proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act for the death of Arthur C. Green-well, the named petitioner's husband, following a compensable injury occurring while he was employed by the Santa Barbara Yacht Club.

Petition for writ of review denied.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; THOMPSON, J., dissenting.

Robertson & Crawford, of Santa Barbara, for petitioners.

Arthur I. Townsend, of San Francisco, for respondent Industrial Accident Commission.

PER CURIAM.

Complainants are the widow and minor child of Arthur C. Greenwell, who on April 21, 1931, received a compensable injury while working for the Santa Barbara Yacht Club. His death occurred on September 27, 1931. The award by the commission allowed compensation for 2½ weeks for temporary total disability caused by the injury. But the commission decided that the evidence does not establish that the death of the employee was proximately caused by the injury. For this reason compensation by way of death benefit was denied.

On application made by the insurance carrier the commission, on September 28, 1931, made its order for an autopsy to be performed upon the body of the deceased. This order was served on the widow, Mrs. Greenwell, who refused to permit the autopsy to be made. In the reply filed by the attorneys for petitioners to the answer filed by the commission in this proceeding, they state that it is their conclusion from the evidence of certain witnesses that an autopsy was not refused. But they do not state the evidence of those witnesses on this question, although it appears from other portions of the reply that they had before them the transcript of the testimony taken before the commission. This being an evidentiary matter, it was not necessary for the commission to make a specific finding on this point. The implied finding would be that the autopsy was refused. In that event it became "a disputable presumption that the injury or death was not due to causes entitling the claimants to benefits under this act." Workmen's Compensation Act of 1917, § 19(e) (St. 1917, p. 850).

In our opinion sufficient evidence has been produced by respondents to justify the commission in deciding that the presumption above mentioned was not overcome by the other evidence in the case. That the commission did so decide is necessarily implied in its finding that the evidence does not establish that the death of the employee was proximately caused by the injury.

The petition for writ of review is denied.

Judgment affirmed.

Robert J. Sullivan, of Los Angeles, and J. R. Dorsey, of Bakersfield, for appellants.

Brittan & Mack, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

ANDREWS, Justice pro tem.

The appeal is from the judgment and from an order taxing costs. Appellant contends three points are involved: (a) Are costs pertaining to attachment taxable as necessary disbursements; (b) Was it error to deny motion to strike a new complaint filed after judgment without leave; (c) Will findings based on such complaint support the judgment?

Respondent bases his motion on the ground that the questions presented are not substantial and require no further argument than is involved in the motion.

[1] 1. It seems to be the right to tax and not the amount taxed that appellant regards as proper to present for adjudication. That matter has been settled. The provisions of section 4300b of the Political Code would be enough, but it was determined in Nisbet v. Clio Mining Co., 2 Cal. App. 436, 83 P. 1077, and Unwin v. Barstow-San Antonio Oil Co., 36 Cal. App. 508, 172 P. 622.

[2] 2. The findings and judgment recite that an order was made giving leave to file the new complaint and there being no record brought to this court by that transcript overcoming the recitals it will be presumed in support of the judgment that an order was made to file such pleading to conform to the proof.

[3] A motion was also made before judgment to strike out the pleading, but this was denied. This should be equivalent to leave to file. The validity of the order to file the new pleading does not seem to be one of appellants' claims but if thought to be here involved the right to permit to amend at or after trial to conform to the proofs has long been established in this state.

[4] 3. If the new pleading was allowed, it was the one to which the findings and judgment should relate. These being all the questions presented by this appeal and all now fairly presented and easy of solution, the judgment should be affirmed.

Judgment of the trial court affirmed.

Injunction ⇨223(1).

That friends of insurance brokerage corporation's officer, on visiting office of insurance commissioner and inquiring concerning right of corporation to do business, were truthfully informed that license had been refused by commissioner, that they would do business with corporation on their own responsibility, and that corporation's right to do business was before courts, held not to show disobedience of injunction against interference with brokerage business so as to subject commissioner and his deputy to punishment for contempt (Pol. Code, § 633a7, as added by St. 1931, p. 574).

Certiorari proceeding by E. Forrest Mitchell, as Insurance Commissioner of the State of California, and another, against the Superior Court in and for the City and County of San Francisco and John J. Van Nostrand, Judge thereof, to review an order adjudging petitioners guilty of contempt in violating an injunction.

Order vacated and annulled.

Frank L. Guereña, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Joseph A. Brown, of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, Presiding Justice.

This is a proceeding to review a judgment of the superior court adjudging petitioners guilty of contempt for violating a certain injunction.

Petitioner E. Forrest Mitchell is the qualified and acting insurance commissioner of the state of California, and Bernon F. Mitchell is his qualified analyst or deputy. The petition recited E. J. Carroll Company, Limited, to be a corporation, licensed to act as an insurance broker, and that its license expired on July 1, 1932. Prior to the expiration of the same, the company applied for a renewal thereof, covering the period from the date last mentioned to July 1, 1933. Said application was made under section 633a7 of the Political Code (as added by St. 1931, p. 574). The application was denied for the reason the insurance commissioner determined, after due investigation and hearing, that the company had been guilty of rebating, contrary to the provisions of section 633b of the Political Code, and for the further reason that it had attempted to place business with a company not authorized to do business in this state, an act condemned under the provisions of section 596 of the Political Code (as amended by St. 1929, p. 373).

Thereafter said corporation filed in the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco an action against said insurance commissioner under section 633a22 of the Political Code (as added by St. 1931, p. 579). In its complaint said corporation alleged its qualification to receive a license under section 633a7 of said Code, and prayed that the court order the insurance commissioner to forthwith issue a license to said corporation, the same to be effective until the final determination of the action. Upon the filing of the complaint an order was issued by the court requiring the commissioner to appear and show cause why he should not grant to the company a license as an insurance broker. On the return day the commissioner appeared and filed a demurrer to the complaint, and also an affidavit reciting in detail the reason for the refusal to issue the license for which the company had applied. After a hearing, the court issued a mandatory injunction which commanded the commissioner to forthwith issue to the company a license as an insurance broker, said license to remain in full force and effect until the final determination of the action. In addition thereto it also issued an injunction restraining the commissioner from in any manner interfering with the conduct by the company of its business and enjoining the commissioner from instituting any prosecution against the company for conducting the same. An appeal was taken from these orders to the Supreme Court, and such appeal is still pending.

Subsequently the insurance company filed charges in the superior court against petitioners and certain deputies of the commissioner, alleging disobedience of both injunctions, and prayed that they be punished for contempt for willfully disobeying the same. On the hearing the charges against the deputies other than petitioner Bernon F. Mitchell were dismissed, and the charges based upon disobedience of the mandatory injunction were likewise dismissed, thus confining the contempt charges to the issue as to whether or not petitioners were guilty of willful disobedience of the injunction against interference. At the conclusion of the hearing, petitioner E. Forrest Mitchell was found guilty of contempt of court, and a fine of $25.00 was imposed, and a sentence of twenty-four hours in the county jail in the event of failure to pay such fine. Petitioner Bernon F. Mitchell was also found guilty of contempt, and a fine against him in the sum of $250.00 was imposed, or a sentence of five days in the county jail in the event of his failure to pay such fine.

In support of their petition for review of the order, it is petitioners' contention that the injunction against interference is incidental to the mandatory injunction and the same became inoperative upon the taking of the appeal, the effect of which operated automatically to stay the effect of both injunctions. They further contend that, even assuming it not to be incidental and ancillary, and not therefore stayed by the appeal, there is no evidence at all in the record to support the finding that petitioners interfered with the conduct of the company in its brokerage business contrary to and in violation of the terms of the injunction. There is no escape from this latter contention. Here the injunction as above indicated provided, in substance and effect, that the commissioner should not interfere with the conduct of the company in the transaction of its business, and that he should not institute or prosecute any action to prevent the conducting of such business. Petitioners did neither. The evidence upon which the judgment was based simply shows that friends of E. J. Carroll visited the office of the Commissioner and inquired concerning the right of the company to do business. They were informed that the company had been refused a license by the commissioner, and, if they did business with said company, it would be upon their own responsibility. They were further informed that the right of the company to do business was before the courts, a matter with which they were perfectly familiar. The imparted information was the truth, and the statements were justified and warranted, and they in no manner constituted a disobedience of the terms of the order. This conclusion renders unnecessary a determination as to whether or not the injunction was stayed by the appeal.

The order adjudging petitioners guilty of contempt is vacated and annulled.

GIMINEZ v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.

Civ. 8346.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

June 17, 1933.

Master and servant ⇨385(1).

In case of latent disease of lungs and other internal organs from constantly inhaling chemical dust, and fumes, injury for compensation purposes dates from time when accumulated effects culminate in disability traceable to latent disease as primary cause (St. 1917, p. 841, § 11(b) (1), as amended by St. 1931, p. 2372).

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Leoncio Giminez, claimant, opposed by the National Carbon Company, employer, and the State Compensation Insurance Fund, insurance carrier. To review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission denying compensation, claimant brings certiorari.

Annulled and remanded.

Joseph E. Isaacs and William Sea, Jr., both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

A. I. Townsend, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KNIGHT, Justice.

During the course of his employment as laborer in the manufacturing plant of the National Carbon Company extending over a period of two years or more, petitioner contracted a disease of the lungs and other internal organs from constantly inhaling and absorbing carbon dust, salomoniac acid fumes, graphite, and manganese; and eventually he was incapacitated thereby from performing any kind of work. He applied to the Industrial Accident Commission for compensation, but his claim was rejected upon the ground that it was not filed within six months from "the date of the injury," and consequently was barred by the statute of limitations. Sec. 11 (b) (1), Workmen's Compensation Act (as amended by St. 1931, p. 2372). He then applied to this court for and obtained a writ of certiorari for the purpose of having the decision of said commission reviewed and annulled.

About the time of the issuance of the writ there was brought before this court also three other cases involving the same type of disease, originating under similar circumstances, and presenting the same legal problem as to when the statute starts to run; and on account of the then unsettled state of the law upon the subject in this state, the controversy finally reached and was decided by the Supreme Court. Marsh v. Industrial Accident Commission (Cal. Sup.) 18 P.(2d) 933. As pointed out by the decision therein, the peculiar disease with which some employees working in manufacturing plants of this kind become gradually afflicted is of a latent and progressive type, and its insidious symptoms make it impossible for medical science to detect its presence until the accumulated effects of the exposure to the dust and fume-laden atmosphere develop into definite form, which may take several months or several years; and during its progress the temporary illness from which the employee may occasionally suffer is usually attributed to natural causes foreign to the employment. In view of these unusual and peculiar circumstances attending the development of the disease it was held that in cases of latent and progressive diseases such as pneumoconiosis "the date of the injury" is not necessarily the last day the employee is exposed to the effects of the dust-laden atmosphere, and that consequently the prescriptive period for filing application for compensation does not always begin to run from that date; but that rather "the date of the injury" shall be deemed to be "the time when the accumulated effects culminate in a disability traceable to the latent disease as the primary cause, and by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence it is discoverable and apparent that a compensable injury was sustained in performance of the duties of the employment." From the beginning respondents herein conceded that if in that proceeding such were declared to be the rule by which cases of this kind must be governed, petitioner's claim for compensation was not barred by the statute of limitations, because the evidence showed without dispute that although he was compelled to lay off work on account of sickness at intervals more than six months prior to the filing of his application, he was treated for ailments which his attending physicians believed originated from causes arising outside of his employment, and that the disease itself did not assume definite form and consequently its existence was not known to either petitioner or his physicians until within the six months' period immediately preceding the filing of his application. Under the rule established by the Marsh Case, supra, therefore, and for the reasons set forth in the decision therein, petitioner's claim for compensation was not barred by the statute. The decision of the commission is accordingly annulled and said application is remanded for further proceedings.

Deficiency of foreclosure complaint in failing to allege who was fee owner of mortgaged property at commencement of foreclosure held cured by defendants' admission that they claimed interest in mortgaged property and finding that interest claimed was that of record owner, and authorized court to make binding decree of foreclosure.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Thomas C. Gould, Judge.

Action by John B. Palm and wife against Harold Ashton, Flora L. Ashton, and another, as trustee of the estate of Harold Ashton, a bankrupt, and others. From the judgment, Harold Ashton and Flora L. Ashton appeal.

Mr. Presiding Justice PULLEN delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an action to foreclose a mortgage upon certain real property executed by Ralph Lake Lloyd, who, among others, including appellants herein, were named defendants in the complaint filed by respondents.

The summons and complaint was served upon all of the named defendants, with the exception of Ralph Lake Lloyd, the maker of the note and mortgage here in issue, upon whom service was not effected, and at the trial the action was dismissed as to him, and all of the remaining defendants defaulted, except appellants herein, who appeared by answer.

The complaint and supplemental complaint alleges that plaintiffs loaned to defendant Ralph Lake Lloyd the sum of $3,500, and as evidence thereof he executed a note and mortgage covering certain described real property situated in the county of Los Angeles. The complaint then alleged default in the payments as called for in the note, and asked that the mortgage be foreclosed.

It is further set forth that the other defendants claimed some right, title, lien, or interest in or upon the real property described in the mortgage, but that such claim was inferior, subsequent, and subordinate to the lien of plaintiffs' mortgage. Then followed an allegation of the expenditure of certain moneys to protect the property and prayed that defendants be required to set forth their claims, and for the usual decree of foreclosure. Appellants answered the complaint, and upon information and belief denied all of the allegations of the complaint and supplemental complaint, except as to their marital status, and admitted by failing to deny, the paragraph alleging that they claimed some right or interest in the property subordinate to the lien created by the mortgage.

At the trial appellants orally moved for judgment on the pleading on the ground that the complaint did not state a cause of action, which motion was denied, and, appellants offering no evidence, judgment, without a deficiency, was rendered for plaintiffs, from which judgment appellants prosecute this appeal.

Appellants here urge the following grounds:

(a) That the record is incomplete and insufficient to confer jurisdiction upon a trial court to render a decree of foreclosure in that the record shows that the owner of the estate or the mortgagor was not before the court.

(b) That the complaint fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action or to confer jurisdiction upon the trial court to render a decree of foreclosure thereon.

(c) That the findings of fact are insufficient to support a decree of foreclosure rendered thereon or to confer jurisdiction upon the trial court to render such a decree.

It is true that the complaint fails to allege who was the owner of the fee to the mortgaged property at the time of the commencement of this action, or that Lloyd, the mortgagor, conveyed or otherwise disposed of his interest in the real property covered by the mortgage. There is, however, an allegation in the complaint that defendants claim some right, title, or interest in the property, which, however, is inferior and subordinate to the lien of the mortgage, which allegation was, upon failure to deny, admitted by appellants, and to that extent, if no further, the court would have jurisdiction to proceed. If appellants had no interest in the property, they were not affected by the decree in this action, and would not therefore be affected by any judgment rendered therein, but, if they held some subordinate interest to the mortgage in the property, they were properly before the court.

Appellants rely principally upon the case of Goodenow v. Ewer, 16 Cal. 461, 76 Am. Dec. 540, wherein the court says: "A mortgagor, when he has not disposed of his interest, is a necessary party to a suit for a foreclosure and sale under our law, even though no personal claim be asserted against him. The fact that a mortgage is executed upon the premises does not, of itself, authorize proceedings for their sale without making him a party. He has a right to be heard before his estate can be subjected to sale to satisfy any alleged lien, without reference to any personal claim against himself. If he has parted with the estate, his grantee stands in his shoes, and possesses the same right to contest the lien and to object to the sale. The object of the sale is to subject such estate as the mortgagor held at the time to the satisfaction of the lien which he created, and if that estate has been disposed of, a decree directing its sale without the presence of its owner would be a mere arbitrary act, condemning, without hearing, one man's property to pay another man's debt."

Here we find one before the court who admittedly holds an interest subordinate to the mortgage in question.

In Hutchison v. Barr, 183 Cal. 182, 190 P. 799, 800, a case somewhat similar to the instant case, the complaint alleged ownership in defendant mortgagor, the execution of the mortgage, its breach, that certain other defendants, including defendant Barr, claimed some interest in the premises, the nature of which was to plaintiff unknown, but inferior to the lien of the mortgage.

Defendant Barr answered and admitted she claimed an interest in the mortgaged premises, to wit, as owner thereof, and that she was at the commencement of the action, and was at the time of the trial, the owner in fee of the property described in the complaint. Plaintiff obtained judgment, and a decree of foreclosure without any allowance for a deficiency was entered, from which judgment and decree defendant Barr appealed and urged before the Supreme Court, practically the same points that are here presented. The court there said:

"The answer of the defendant Florence A. Barr admitted she was the owner of the fee of the mortgaged property at the time of the commencement of the action, and therefore cured the defect in the complaint, if any, resulting from the failure to plead that fact. [Citing cases.]

"That the defendant Florence A. Barr was the owner of the fee of the mortgaged premises at the time of the commencement of the action was, as we have seen by the averment of her answer, an admitted fact in the case, and, consequently, neither proof nor finding was necessary upon that phase of the case. [Citing cases.]

"The defendant Florence A. Barr, as a successor in interest of the mortgagor, could have been made defendant in the first instance without joining the mortgagor. [Citing cases.] The purpose of the action to foreclose was 'to subject to sale the title of the mortgagor—that is, such title as he had at the date of his mortgage—and to cut off all the rights of parties subsequently becoming interested therein.' [Citing cases.] The mortgagor, the corporation defendant, was a proper party to the action, and would have been a necessary party thereto, if the plaintiff had insisted upon a personal deficiency judgment as was originally prayed for. Code Civ. Proc. § 726.

"However, inasmuch as the right to a deficiency judgment was ultimately abandoned by plaintiff, and it appearing upon the coming in of the answer of defendant Florence A. Barr that the mortgagor had divested itself of the title to the mortgaged property, and that defendant Florence A. Barr was the owner in fee of the property at the time of the commencement of the action, the mortgagor was no longer a necessary party."

In the case at bar the trial court found that appellant Flora L. Ashton and E. A. Lynch, as trustees of Harold Ashton, a bankrupt, claim an interest in the premises covered by said mortgage, as record owners thereof.

[1] Upon an appeal from a judgment upon the judgment roll alone, all intendments will be made in support of the judgment, and if the record anywhere, whether in the complaint, answer, or findings, reveals the fact that the record owner is a party, it is sufficient. McLennan v. Wilcox, 126 Cal. 51, 58 P. 305.

[2] In view of the admission by appellants of some interest in the property covered by the mortgage and the finding that the interest was that of record owner of the property, we are of the opinion the deficiency in the complaint has been cured, and, appellants being before the court as owners, a binding order and decree could be made.

The judgment and decree are therefore affirmed.

BEHRENS et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR YUBA COUNTY.

Civ. 4960.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

June 22, 1933.

1. Judgment ⇐497(1).

Justices of the peace ⇐129(1).

Complaint for $27 for automobile storage charges held to show justice's court and superior court had jurisdiction of subject-matter of action, rendering judgment on complaint not subject to collateral attack on certiorari, notwithstanding complaint did not state a cause of action.

2. Judgment ⇐18(2).

Complaint showing court had no jurisdiction of subject-matter renders court's judgment void, but not complaint which does not state cause of action merely because of defects in allegations.

Petition for writ of certiorari by A. H. Behrens and others, prayed to be directed to the Superior Court in and for Yuba County, to review a certain judgment entered in the court.

Writ denied, and judgment affirmed.

Fred M. Harter, of Marysville, for petitioners.

W. C. Rucker, of Marysville, for respondent.

Mr. Justice PLUMMER delivered the opinion of the court.

This cause is before us upon a petition for a writ of certiorari to be directed to the above-named Superior Court, for the purpose of reviewing a certain judgment entered in said court wherein one J. E. Pauly was plaintiff and A. H. Behrens, G & H Commercial Service, Inc., and Fred M. Harter and Bruce Goodman were defendants.

It appears from the petition and return that on or about the 12th day of May, 1932, an action was begun in the justice's court of Camptonville township, county of Yuba, by J. E. Pauly against the petitioners herein. Judgment went for the plaintiff, Pauly, against the petitioners in the action just referred to, and, upon appeal to the superior court of the county of Yuba, the judgment of the justice's court was affirmed.

Upon this hearing it is contended that neither the justice's court nor the superior court had jurisdiction of the action by reason of the alleged failure of the complaint to state a cause of action against the petitioners herein. The complaint in the justice's court in the action referred to herein is as follows, to wit:

"In the Justice's Court of Camptonville Township, County of Yuba, State of California.

J. E. Pauly, Plaintiff, vs. A. H. Behrens, G & H Commercial Service, Inc., Fred M. Harter & Bruce Goodman, Defendants.

Complaint.

"The plaintiff in the above-entitled action complains of the defendants above named, and, for cause of action, alleges:

"I. That said plaintiff now is, and that at all times herein mentioned, and previously, the owner of a garage situated on the south side of Main Street, in the town of Camptonville, County of Yuba, State of California, and said garage has been available for automobile storage at any and all times.

"II. That on the 18th day of June, 1931, one of the defendants, A. H. Behrens, Constable of Camptonville Township, upon written request of the G & H Commercial Service, Inc., came to the plaintiff and gave orders to him to keep an old Studebaker Touring car belonging to E. H. Hays, and being a part of a legal action of the G & H Commercial Service against the owner, stored and in safe keeping until released by above-named constable.

"III. That upon completion of arrangements between plaintiff and constable, the plaintiff changed the locks on the door and kept the car in storage for nine months, as ordered by constable and until released by constable on April 8, 1932.

"IV. That during the time the car was being thus stored, it was occupying room that was needed by said plaintiff for other purposes.

"V. That the regular and competitive price prevalent in the town of Camptonville for dead storage on automobiles by the month is five dollars ($5.00). And, that due to the fact that one of the defendants, Bruce Goodman, pleaded with plaintiff, due to the failure to satisfy claim in original suit with E. H. Hays, to reduce the storage charge, wherein said plaintiff made a reduction of from five dollars per month, to three ($3.00) per month.

"Wherefore, plaintiff prays judgment against the defendants for the sum of twenty-seven Dollars ($27.00) storage charge, interest, costs of suit, and for such other relief as may be meet, just and proper.

"J. E. Pauly, Plaintiff."

The record further shows that the petitioners in the action referred to, upon appearing, moved for a change of venue, and likewise demurred to the sufficiency of the complaint. The motion for change of venue was denied, and the demurrer to the complaint was overruled. The appeal from the justice's court presented for consideration the same questions which are set forth in the petition for the writ of review.

[1, 2] The reading of the complaint filed in the justice's court shows that the justice's court had jurisdiction of the parties to the action, and also had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action. The question involved was the amount of money that should be paid for the storage of a certain automobile, the demand being limited to the sum of $27, which, of course, was considerably below the $300 limit of the jurisdiction of the court in which the action was pending.

While it may be admitted that the complaint did not state a cause of action, it did set forth the subject-matter of the action, to wit, the amount of money due for storage of an automobile, and also the demand made by the plaintiff, to wit, that the plaintiff should have judgment against the defendants for the sum of $27. The defendants in the action were thus advised of the cause of action and the demand of the plaintiff. The law makes a distinction between a complaint which does not state a cause of action by reason of defects in the allegations therein contained, where the court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, and cases where the court has no jurisdiction of the subject-matter. If it appears from the complaint that the court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter, the judgment of course is void, but, if the court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter, its rulings upon demurrer as to the sufficiency of the complaint constitutes only errors in procedure in the trial of the action and not any actions wherein lack of jurisdiction is involved.

In the recent case of Associated Oil Company v. Mullin, 110 Cal. App. 385, 294 P. 421, 423, the law in relation to the questions which we are considering is so fully and conclusively set forth that we quote therefrom the following as decisive in this case: "It is essential to jurisdiction that there be some proper application invoking the judicial power of the court in respect to the matters sought to be litigated (Young v. Rosenbaum, 39 Cal. 646; Timm v. United States District Attorney, 148 Cal. 773, 113 Am. St. Rep. 354, 84 P. 152); but if a complaint shows a subject-matter and a demand for relief within the jurisdiction of the court, the mere fact that it fails to state a cause of action does not render the judgment void and subject to collateral attack (Gillespie v. Fender, 180 Cal. 202, 180 P. 332); or, as the rule is stated in Christerson v. French, 180 Cal. 523, 182 P. 27, a judgment is not void if the court has jurisdiction of the parties and subject-matter, irrespective of whether the complaint states a cause of action or not, so long as it apprises the defendant of the nature of plaintiff's demand. This rule applies both to contested cases (Le Mesnager v. Variel, 144 Cal. 463, 103 Am. St. Rep. 91, 77 P. 988), and to default judgments in other respects valid (Crouch v. H. L. Miller & Co., 169 Cal. 341, 146 P. 880; Christerson v. French, supra). It has also been held that a judgment rendered against a person who has voluntarily appeared in the action as a defendant is not void so as to be collaterally assailable, although his name was not inserted in the complaint and no order granting leave to appear and answer is contained in the record. Tyrrell v. Baldwin, 67 Cal. 1, 6 P. 867."

To the same effect is the case of Roemer v. Nunes, 73 Cal. App. 368, 238 P. 820, where it was held that a judgment is not void because the complaint fails to state a cause of action so long as the court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and also of the parties. See, also, the case of De Matei v. Superior Court, 74 Cal. App. 147, 239 P. 853.

Irrespective of what courts have decided in other states upon the questions here involved, the cases which we have cited are conclusive here.

The writ is denied, and the judgment affirmed.

PARKER, Justice pro tem.

Appellant, defendant below, has appealed from an adverse judgment entered upon the verdict of a jury in an action for damages for personal injuries. The sole ground of appeal involves the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict and judgment. In this the contention of appellant is twofold. It is claimed, first, that the evidence fails to disclose any actionable negligence on the part of appellant; second, that the evidence shows without substantial contradiction that respondent was guilty of negligence, without which the accident would not have occurred.

Appellant's brief is an argument upon the evidence, very likely the same argument that failed in the court below. Not a suggestion of complaint goes to any ruling of the trial court, nor is error claimed in the instructions to the jury.

[1-3] There is little conflict in the evidence, save on the one point of warning given plaintiff, and plaintiff's testimony that no notice or warning of any kind was given him was evidently taken as the fact by the jury. Appellant is the owner of a building in the city of Los Angeles in which are maintained and operated three passenger elevators. These elevators are of a type capable of a speed of six hundred feet per minute. We deem it unnecessary to detail the mechanics of the elevators. Each operates in a shaft or well. As a part of the machinery of the elevator is a compensating weight, or counterweight, which moves up and down within the shaft opposite to the direction in which the elevator is moving. For example, when the elevator is at the top floor, the counterweight is at the bottom, and, when the elevator is at the bottom, the counterweight is above. This counterweight slides up and down within a track or slide, with some projection forward. Plaintiff was a carpenter engaged in making side openings in the elevators. As stated, there were three elevators, and for general purposes they may be designated by number, namely, 1, 2, and 3. In order that plaintiff might accomplish his work, it was necessary that he enter the shaft of each elevator. He had completed his work in the shafts of elevators 2 and 3 and was working in shaft No. 1 when the accident occurred. It is important to note here that the construction in shafts 2 and 3 differed from that of shaft 1. The counterweight in shafts 2 and 3 was constructed and operated in and on the back of the shaft, and in a place where no harm or injury could result to one standing or working on the side or front of the shaft. In elevator shaft No. 1, however, the construction, as we have said, was different. In this shaft the counterweight operated on the side of the shaft, but little distant from the front. Respondent in completing his work on elevators 2 and 3 was ready to commence on No. 1. The cage or elevator was raised from the floor level and respondent permitted to enter. In the performance of his work he stood upon a cross beam of steel running from the front to the back and along the side of the cage. All of those in charge of the elevators knew of his entry and of his position in the shaft. The time of day was approximately 4 p. m. There was no artificial light in the shaft, and the general lighting condition therein was such as to present a condition of dusk or semi darkness. The elevator operator was cautioned as to the presence of a man in the shaft. Respondent was shown to have no familiarity with the construction of elevators or elevator shafts. Neither had he knowledge of the location of the counterweight and its operation. It might be here noted that such knowledge cannot, as a matter of law, be imputed or charged to a carpenter doing general work in and about an elevator shaft. He can be charged only with a knowledge of the conditions observable by the use of ordinary inspection, and the question becomes necessarily one for the jury. While respondent was in the shaft, the operator of elevator No. 1 caused his cage to rise to the top floor at a high speed and without warning, and with great force the counterweight came down and struck respondent on the side of the body. From the blow and the subsequent handling of the elevator in trying to effect his release respondent sustained the injuries here complained of. Some attempt is made by appellant to divide the injuries with reference to those sustained from the blow of the counterweight and those sustained in the subsequent operation of the elevator. All are attributable to the same negligence and we decline further analysis.

With this background there seems little merit to the appeal. We have carefully read the transcript, and find ample to uphold the judgment. There is nothing exceptional about the case which would make the question entirely one of law for the court rather than a question of fact for the jury. The jury was fully and correctly instructed, inasmuch as no complaint is made in this connection. For a general presentation of the law applicable, reference may be had to Fidelity & Casualty Co. v. Iron Works, 42 Cal. App. 766, 184 P. 402, and Buckingham v. San Joaquin Cotton Oil Co. (Cal. App.) 16 P.(2d) 807.

1. Divorce $\S$ 178.

Where controversy, in divorce action, involved property which plaintiff alleged to be community property, her acceptance of favorable portion of judgment would have prevented successful appeal from unfavorable portion unless defendant agreed acceptance should not affect right to appeal.

2. Divorce $\S$ 182.

That defendant, in divorce action, offered to plaintiff privilege of accepting $2,000 awarded to her without thereby depriving her of right to prosecute appeal from unfavorable portion of property judgment did not render $2,000 available for carrying on plaintiff's appeal, so as to preclude court from allowing attorney's fees and costs for prosecuting appeal.

3. Divorce $\S$ 182.

Discretion of trial court in rendering order allowing attorney's fees and costs for prosecuting appeal in divorce action relates to financial condition of parties, need of plaintiff, ability of defendant, good faith in taking appeal, and reasonableness thereof.

4. Divorce $\S$ 182.

Where ability of defendant is ample, ordinarily court will not compel plaintiff to resort to capital portion of her separate property to prosecute appeal in divorce action.

ANDREWS, Justice pro tem.

This appeal is from an order allowing plaintiff attorney's fees, costs on appeal, and support pending appeal. Judgment was entered December 6, 1930, granting a divorce to the husband and giving to the plaintiff certain furniture by agreement, and awarding to her the sum of $2,000 found upon the trial to be her separate property. Defendant immediately upon the entry of judgment tendered to plaintiff the $2,000 and the tender being refused, deposited the same in court subject to plaintiff's order. He also tendered the furniture awarded to her by the judgment. Plaintiff appealed from the judgment and from the whole thereof and, thereafter, obtained the order for costs on appeal, from which the present appeal is taken.

Two general contentions are made by defendant: (a) That it was the right and duty of plaintiff to accept the $2,000; (b) that having received the $2,000 she would have available means for prosecuting her appeal without the necessity of obtaining the order here under review.

The plaintiff's position is that to accept the $2,000 would prevent her from appealing from the judgment and also that if she did accept the $2,000 the order would nevertheless be a necessary and proper order.

[1, 2] 1. Whether the plaintiff could safely accept the $2,000 depends upon whether the issues which were presented by the pleadings and tried in the case, and the judgment which was entered upon such issues were so far severable and distinct that appeal could be taken from that portion of the judgment which was unfavorable to plaintiff without involving the provision respecting payment of the $2,000, and whether the appeal was so taken. The controversy involved a large amount of property which plaintiff in her complaint alleged to be community property. She made no claim to any separate property. A reversal of the judgment would involve a retrial of the entire property rights of the parties, with no assurance that there would be awarded to plaintiff on a second trial this sum of $2,000 or any sum whatever. The plaintiff did not undertake to appeal from that part of the judgment which was unfavorable only, but from the judgment as a whole. It is evident that to accept this favorable portion of the judgment would have prevented a successful appeal except for the consent of defendant to such acceptance and waiver by him that such acceptance should not be claimed by him as preventing or affecting the right to appeal as hereinafter stated.

On the hearing of this motion, defendant made an affidavit in which he tendered the $2,000 and offered to plaintiff the privilege of accepting the same without thereby in any way depriving her of any right to prosecute her appeal and have the same passed upon by the upper court as to all other claims of plaintiff, and in language sufficient to accomplish that end, waived any claim which he might have to raise the question of the acceptance of the $2,000 being a bar to the prosecution of the appeal. This kind of an affidavit and waiver was an offer to plaintiff which she could accept or not as there was no contract obligation and no legal duty requiring her to do so. Even the construction and effect of the waiver itself might become involved in the appeal. If she rejected the same in good faith and on advice of her attorney, because of his opinion as to the effect of her acceptance, notwithstanding the affidavit and waiver, it cannot be held that as a matter of law she was bound to accept it to the end that its acceptance might be used to defeat this order. It must, therefore, be held that the $2,000 was not available for carrying on plaintiff's appeal and might properly have been disregarded by the trial court in making the order appealed from.

[3-5] 2. Assuming that she was bound to or had accepted the $2,000, it would not follow that the order here in question might not still have been a valid order. The discretion of the trial court in an order of this character relates to the financial condition of the parties, the need of the plaintiff and the ability of the defendant, and in this particular application would involve also the question of good faith in the taking of the appeal and the reasonableness of the grounds for appeal. Where the ability of the defendant is ample, even when he contends that the property involved is separate property, both because it may finally be held to be community property, and because of his potential earning capacity which in any event is community property, ordinarily the court would not compel the plaintiff to resort to the capital portion of her separate property and it is evident that the income from the $2,000 would not be sufficient to provide funds for this appeal and for her support. While it is true that in making this order the judge who made the order was not the same judge who tried the divorce case and, therefore, he might have been limited to the affidavits which were used on the hearing, supplemented by statements of counsel at the hearing, which would not appear in the record, there was set forth in the affidavit of the plaintiff matters which, if relied upon, as they of course were, afford justification for this order and for the implied finding that the appeal was prosecuted in good faith and upon reasonable grounds. Such finding might be based upon the statement in the affidavit that plaintiff was advised by her attorney, who was the attorney who tried the case, that in his opinion the judgment was wrong and illegal and could be reversed on appeal. The record does not disclose any abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court in making the order from which appeal is taken.

Order affirmed.

This is an action to foreclose a mortgage covering 220 acres of land situated in Kings county and given to secure two notes, each for the principal sum of $4,800. On June 4, 1927, the plaintiff agreed in writing to sell the land in question to J. Y. Peterson and his wife for $12,570; the agreement providing that, when $2,970 of the purchase price was paid, the vendee might demand a deed and give back a mortgage securing the balance of $9,600, to be evidenced by two notes payable at certain named times. The sum of $2,970 was paid by J. Y. Peterson by June, 1928, and during that month he demanded a deed. The plaintiff executed a deed conveying the premises to J. Y. Peterson and his wife, and delivered the same to an abstract company which was handling an escrow in connection with the transaction. A few days later the plaintiff received back this deed, and, at the request of J. Y. Peterson and the abstract company, furnished another deed conveying the property to the Peterson Farms Company, a corporation, with instructions to deliver the same upon obtaining for her a first mortgage upon the property securing two notes for $4,800 each, payable on terms stated. This mortgage was recorded in Kings county by the abstract company on June 29, 1928. The mortgage and notes were signed "The Peterson Farms Company by J. Y. Peterson, Vice President," the mortgage was acknowledged by J. Y. Peterson as vice president of the corporation, and the corporation seal was attached thereto.

[1] About April 30, 1929, the Peterson Farms Company deeded the property in question to N. G. Perkins and A. Yoder. By a deed dated October 22, 1929, this property was conveyed by Perkins and Yoder and their wives to Cora Van Aernam Peters, one of the defendants herein. On May 19, 1930, this action was filed seeking to foreclose the mortgage referred to. The corporation defendant defaulted, and the defendant Cora Van Aernam Peters filed an answer denying that the Peterson Farms Company had executed the mortgage in question, together with a cross-complaint seeking to quiet her own title to the property. Findings of fact and judgment and decree of foreclosure in favor of the plaintiff were entered and filed on December 29, 1930, and from this judgment the defendant Cora Van Aernam Peters is prosecuting this appeal.

The reporter's transcript in this case was never authenticated [see Wood v. Peterson Farms Co. (Cal. App.) 21 P.(2d) 468], and the appeal is therefore before us on the judgment roll alone (Estate of Gamble, 166 Cal. 253, 135 P. 970). The only arguments presented by the appellant are based upon a consideration of the evidence. The court found that the notes and mortgage were executed by the Peterson Farms Company, the corporation defendant, on or about June 20, 1928, that the mortgage was duly acknowledged, and that it was recorded on June 29, 1928. Among other things, the court found that certain payments called for by the notes had not been paid; that the entire amount of principal and interest called for by the notes was due, owing, and unpaid; that any interest or claim of this appellant was subsequent to and subject to the lien of the mortgage; and that all of the allegations in the answer of this appellant, which were inconsistent with or contradictory to any of the facts found by the court, were each and all untrue. The findings support the judgment, and the same must be affirmed.

[2] While not necessary to this decision, we feel disposed to add that we have examined the unauthenticated transcript on file herein and are fully satisfied that, if the same were to be considered, this appeal is without merit. The appellant's entire contentions are based upon the proposition that J. Y. Peterson, who executed this mortgage on behalf of the defendant corporation, was not authorized by the corporation to execute the same, and that the mortgage is therefore void and of no effect as against the appellant. Reliance is placed upon the testimony of the secretary of the corporation to the effect that the records thereof contain no resolution authorizing J. Y. Peterson, as vice president, to execute the mortgage. However, the testimony of the secretary further shows that it had come to his attention that the corporation owned the land in question and that on April 30, 1929, a resolution was adopted and signed by all of the members of the board of directors of the corporation providing that the corporation should sell and convey to N. G. Perkins and A. Yoder the land in question, describing the same, and further providing that "J. Y. Peterson, Vice President of this corporation, be, and he is, hereby authorized and directed to execute and deliver to said Grantee on behalf of said corporation a deed of conveyance of said property particularly describing the same, subject to existing encumbrances." Having accepted title to the land, recognized the indebtedness, sold the land, authorized the sale by resolution, and having defaulted in the present action, the corporation itself is estopped to deny the validity of the mortgage. Blood v. La Serena Land & Water Company, 134 Cal. 361, 66 P. 317. This mortgage was given to secure a portion of the purchase price of the land and was duly recorded, and the appellant took title to the land through a vendee from the mortgagor with both constructive and actual notice. The transcript shows that, when the appellant purchased the property in question, she signed escrow instructions which provided that she was to take the property subject to this mortgage and to the two notes secured thereby. This was a part of her contract, and the amount represented by this mortgage was a part of the consideration she was to pay for the land. She not only had actual notice, but is estopped to question the proper execution of the mortgage. Alvord v. Spring Valley Gold Co., 106 Cal. 547, 40 P. 27. Every consideration of equity is in favor of the judgment, and we are unable to see how in this equitable action this technical objection to the execution of the mortgage could possibly result in taking this land from the respondent, with only a small part of the purchase price paid, and giving the same to the appellant for a correspondingly less amount than that she agreed to pay for the same.

The judgment is affirmed.

HENSHAW v. BELYEA.*

Civ. 7834.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.

June 20, 1933.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Aug. 17, 1933.

1. Automobiles ⇨225.

Evidence did not show imminent peril to human life justifying plaintiff's leaving safe place to block third party's truck and trailer loaded with employer's steam shovel so as to excuse plaintiff's negligence when struck by board placed under truck.

Evidence showed that truck and trailer loaded with steam shovel failed to make grade, and started down hill backwards; that plaintiff standing nearby grabbed a four by four from truck and threw it under drive wheel, because he felt it was his duty to his employer; that children were playing on sidewalk within 100 feet of rear of trailer and on opposite side of street from that over which truck and trailer were traveling; and that a boy had been riding on a bicycle back of trailer.

2. Automobiles ⇨244(6).

Evidence that plaintiff standing in safe place ran to block truck and trailer starting backwards down hill after failing to make grade and was injured by board which he threw beneath wheel, showed that truck owner was not negligent.

3. Automobiles ⇨225.

Where human life was not in imminent peril, plaintiff, who left safe place to block truck and trailer starting backwards down hill and was injured by board which he threw beneath wheel, was contributorily negligent.

4. Trial ⇨143.

To raise a "conflict" justifying submission of issues to jury, evidence must be such as to present a fair and reasonable ground for difference of opinion.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Conflict," see Words & Phrases.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Arthur Keetch, Judge.

Action by William U. Henshaw against B. W. Belyea, doing business under the fictitious firm name and style of the Belyea Truck Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Reversed.

Harry D. Parker and White McGee, Jr., both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Leslie S. Bowden and Gaines Hon, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

ARCHBALD, Justice pro tem.

Action for personal injuries. The jury returned a verdict for $15,349.70, and from the judgment entered thereon defendant appeals.

Appellant was the owner and operator of a truck and trailer, used at the time of the accident in question in hauling a large excavating shovel belonging to the firm of Grunwald & Tudor, who employed respondent to operate the shovel. The shovel was to be delivered at 114th street and Budlong avenue, in Los Angeles, where it was to be unloaded. The truck was operated by an employee of appellant named Norman Kresge, and the aggregate weight of truck, trailer, and shovel was about 81,000 pounds. It "was a heavy duty truck with six wheels; one wheel ahead of the other on the rear and the front wheels up toward the front of the trailer." The drive wheels were the front two of the four rear wheels. The trailer had either six or eight wheels and was connected with the truck by a rigid V-type tongue. There was a mechanical foot brake on the drive wheels and also a hydraulic hand brake.

One Hundred Fourteenth street runs east and west and Budlong comes into it from the north and leaves it to the south from 50 to 90 feet farther west making a break in Budlong to that extent. The truck approached the north intersection of Budlong from the east, on a down grade which ended at about the east boundary of the north extension. From that point there was a level space of approximately 50 feet on 114th street for the width of such thoroughfare, to about the west curb of said extension, and from there a grade of about 10 per cent. extended to the west on 114th quite a distance beyond the south extension of Budlong. There was a pavement on 114th street from 40 to 50 feet wide, with an unpaved strip on each side. Budlong avenue, on both extensions, is apparently a narrow dirt road about 20 feet wide. It was the plan to unload the shovel on the west side of the south extension of Budlong. Plaintiff was standing on the south side of 114th, not far from the south extension of Budlong, talking with a Mr. Coon, who was the contractor on the job on which the shovel was to be used, as the driver of the truck came down the grade from the east and started up the grade to the west from the north extension of Budlong. The vehicle reached the south extension, when it stopped and began to go back down the grade. Seeing this, plaintiff ran into the street and seized a piece of "4x4" about 4 feet long from the bed of the truck and threw it under the left drive wheel in an attempt to stop it. It was the protruding end of such block, evidently set in motion as the drive wheel of the truck passed over it, that caused the injury of which plaintiff complains.

The allegation of plaintiff's complaint is in substance that defendant so carelessly and negligently operated the truck and trailer "as to cause the truck and trailer to collide with plaintiff, striking plaintiff on the right leg with such force and violence" as to injure him. There is no evidence that plaintiff was struck by the truck or trailer, or anything other than the protruding end of the block which he himself had placed under the wheel, in the doing of which he voluntarily left the place where he was standing in safety. The theory of plaintiff is to the effect that defendant was negligent in not providing sufficient braking capacity for so heavy a load; that by reason of such negligence the truck was out of control of the driver on the grade; and that to save human life threatened by truck and trailer as it ran down the grade backwards and out of control, plaintiff threw the block under the wheel in an attempt to stop it.

Appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to show that any person was in imminent peril, or to show any negligence upon his part.

The evidence which respondent urges establishes a case of imminent peril to third persons and prevents him from being held guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law is substantially as follows: Plaintiff testified that the only persons present except himself and the truck driver were "Mr. Glancy and Mr. Coon and some children back down on the sidewalk behind the trailer.

"Q. How far behind the trailer? A. I don't know exactly.

"Q. Well, approximately? A. Within 100 feet of the back end of the trailer.

"Q. Were there any other automobiles on the street at that time? A. There had been. I didn't see any at that particular moment. There were some parked there, but none moving that I saw.

"Q. Parked on which side of the street. Mr. Henshaw? A. There were some parked on the south side of 114th street and some parked farther back east on the north side of 114th street."

William S. Glancy, plaintiff's helper in operating the shovel, asked if he saw any people on the street, testified: "Only the children that was around. One of them on a bicycle had been following along behind the truck for a little ways. I don't know just how far they was back, probably 50 or 60 or 75 feet, something like that.

"Q. You say one of them was on a bicycle?
A. Yes sir.

"Q. How close to the back of the trailer was he? A. I don't know just how close, but you know how kids are, they tag in back of a thing, and he was about 50 or 60 feet back, I should judge.

"Q. And where were the other children?
A. They were back on the curb and playing along there.

"Q. Which curb are you referring to now?
A. The south curb of 114 street, * * * some of them in the edge of the street."

Asked as to whether he was instructed to place the block under the wheel, plaintiff replied: "No sir. I felt it was my duty to my employer."

The evidence fails to show the usual gathering of interested spectators, including children, always present when an accident happens in a street that has any travel over it or in a well-settled neighborhood.

A leading case on the question involved is that of Eckert v. Long Island R. Co., 43 N. Y. 502, 3 Am. Rep. 721. The evidence in that case showed that a child, three or four years of age, was sitting or standing upon the track of defendant's railroad as a train approached. The engine was running backwards, with the cowcatcher next to the cars being pulled, and had nothing in front to remove obstacles from the track. Plaintiff's witnesses heard no warning bell or whistle from the engine. Decedent, seeing the danger to the child, ran to it and threw it clear of the track. He, however, was struck by some part of the locomotive or tender as he continued across the track, receiving fatal injuries. It was the contention of defendant that decedent's negligence contributed to his injury and that no recovery could be had. The court said (page 506 of 43 N. Y.): "The law has so high a regard for human life that it will not impute negligence to an effort to preserve it, unless made under such circumstances as to constitute rashness in the judgment of prudent persons. For a person engaged in his ordinary affairs, or in the mere protection of property, knowingly and voluntarily to place himself in a position where he is liable to receive a serious injury, is negligence, which will preclude a recovery for an injury so received; but when the exposure is for the purpose of saving life, it is not wrongful, and therefore not negligent unless such as to be regarded either rash or reckless." In other words, the peril to human life, as we read the cases in which judgments have been sustained by application of the principle involved here, has been real and imminent, and such seems to be the law. "Some one must be actually in peril before the rescuer is authorized to act. At the broadest, the situation must be such as to clearly convince the rescuer that human life or limb is in peril. * * * It requires more than mere suspicion that accident might follow to justify the invocation of the doctrine of 'imminent peril.'" Eversole v. Wabash R. Co., 249 Mo. 523, 155 S. W. 419, 425. In the case just cited a train was in the pathway of the runaway cars in an attempt to stop which plaintiff was injured. The crew on the train had left in response to a signal, unknown to plaintiff, but he was justified from the appearance of things in believing that he was attempting to save threatened human life. So in the case of a runaway team in "a measurably busy street," of a city, "there was ample opportunity for harm to come to some one, although the danger was not at the moment imminent to a definite person." Hollaran v. City of New York, 168 App. Div. 469, 153 N. Y. S. 447, 449.

[1] The picture presented by the favorable evidence here is entirely different. The truck stopped almost immediately after plaintiff's cry of pain arose, and we fail to find anything in the evidence from which a jury could conclude that there was imminent peril to children playing on the sidewalk within 100 feet of the rear of the trailer, and on the opposite side of the street from that over which the truck and trailer were traveling, or to a boy who had been riding a bicycle back of the truck some indefinite time and place, or to any other human being. Plaintiff himself makes no pretense that his voluntary action was impelled by any imminent peril to human life or limb, nor can such conclusion be drawn from his evidence. He frankly says in explanation that he did it because "I felt it was my duty to my employer," which supports only the conclusion that he felt his employer's shovel was in some danger.

[2, 3] In discussing the first contention of appellant we have assumed that there is evidence to support the conclusion of negligence on the part of defendant which the jury must have reached. In our opinion, however, the evidence on that question does not show such negligence. The evidence does show without question that the injury was occasioned, not by the truck colliding with plaintiff, as alleged in the complaint, but because plaintiff was negligent either in his means of placing the "4x4" under the drive wheel or in standing on the downhill side of the protruding end of such block while reaching for another one, when he knew, according to his own evidence, that the wheel was sliding the block toward his foot. It may be that if under the circumstances negligence is actually shown by the evidence on the part of defendant, and the doctrine of imminent peril were applicable, plaintiff could not be held to the degree of care in placing the block that would be required in the absence of a seeming emergency. The evidence failing to show that the case is one in which such doctrine of imminent peril is applicable, however, such negligence cannot be excused; and even if under the evidence the jury was justified in imputing negligence to defendant, the contributory negligence of plaintiff in acting as he did, as well as in voluntarily leaving a place of safety and exposing himself to danger, would prevent a recovery.

We fail to see, however, any evidence justifying the conclusion that defendant was negligent in the operation of the truck and trailer. The evidence, in part, which plaintiff urges conflicted with the undisputed testimony of the driver of the truck and a bystanding and disinterested witness, viz., the contractor, Mr. Coon, is drawn from the testimony as to the tremendous weight of the truck, trailer, and its load, the fact that there were no brakes on any of the wheels of the trailer, and mechanical and hydraulic hand brakes on but the two drive wheels of the truck, and the fact that it was being operated on a 10 per cent. grade. No expert testimony was introduced to show that such brakes were insufficient. Plaintiff testified that "the truck and trailer gradually slowed down and stopped and started back down the hill, and I saw it was going down the hill, starting back, moving and gaining momentum, and I attempted to block the wheel of the truck with a block that I took off the bed of the truck"; that the drive wheel next to him "was sliding as the truck went down the hill." He further testified that as he placed the block under the wheel "the truck, trailer and all continued to move back down the hill. I reached on the bed of the truck for another block. Just at that instant the block that was already under the truck caught the toe of my shoe and foot, and the block rolled up on my foot and I felt a severe pain, felt the crack of the ankle. It knocked me down and knocked me clear of the truck. The end of the block went over the leg in such a way as to throw me out and away from the truck. Then I was—then I hollered. Q. Now was the truck rolling back at the time you placed the block there or was it sliding? A. The drive wheel was sliding; the other wheels were rolling." Plaintiff's witness and helper, Glancy, testified the same as to the truck starting up the grade and stopping. "It started rolling back. * * * It seemed to me I saw one of the rear wheels slide. * * * I put a block under the rear trailer wheel and it ran over that block.

"Q. Did you observe what Mr. Henshaw was doing? A. I didn't observe what he was doing at that time.

"Q. You say you put a block under the rear trailer wheel? A. I put a block under the rear wheel of the trailer and the rear wheels —both wheels ran over my block, and I grabbed another block and put it under that same wheel, and just then I heard Mr. Henshaw holler.

"Q. What else did you do, if anything? A. Well, his block and my block the second time I put mine under stopped the truck and trailer.

"Q. When you finally got that block under, the truck and trailer came to a full stop? A. Yes."

It is very apparent, in view of the fact that this witness knew nothing about what either the plaintiff or the driver of the truck were doing at the time, that his statement that plaintiff's block and the witness' second block halted the truck was the baldest kind of a conclusion. Respondent in his brief concedes that "it is true, according to the testimony, that the truck stopped almost in its tracks when the accident happened," but apparently concludes that the blocks actually caused the stoppage.

Apparently the first block placed under the wheels by Glancy did not have much effect, as both rear wheels of the trailer rolled over it. It is equally apparent from the testimony of plaintiff that his block stopped sliding down the hill, otherwise it would have pushed his foot down the grade without injuring him; that it turned as the wheel ran over it, first catching his shoe and foot and rolling "up my foot," and that the end of the block went on over his leg, throwing plaintiff out and away from the truck, at which time he "hollered." Plaintiff's evidence does not describe very clearly what happened, but it is plain that the truck wheel must have rolled over the "4x4," if the block was not thrown clear of the wheel in its progress; so it is apparent that Glancy's conclusion that the block, of which he knew nothing, together with his second block, stopped the truck is unwarranted. It is also apparent that if plaintiff's block and Glancy's first had no effect, the latter's second, with the momentum of the truck increasing, as it must have, with every second of time—assuming the truck was out of control—could not have been more effective. Something stopped the truck almost immediately after plaintiff "hollered," and the reason must be found elsewhere than in the very puny efforts of plaintiff and Glancy. The situation as already shown by the evidence favorable to plaintiff does not present a picture of a truck and trailer out of control on a down grade.

The fact standing out above everything from the evidence is that the truck was at all times under control, even considering plaintiff's evidence alone. When we turn to defendant's evidence we find that the driver testified that when he found that he could not make the grade to the point he desired to reach he stopped, shifted into reverse and started down on compression; that "a fellow put a block under the truck"; that the driver told him "to stay away; it is all right," but that as he knew plaintiff had put the block under the wheel he "started to apply the brakes to stop the thing immediately," and that as he started to apply the brakes "the block kicked—hit his leg"; that he then stopped the truck, got out and picked plaintiff up. Mr. Coon, the contractor on the job, testified to hearing the driver warn plaintiff in substance that "he had the truck under control and could handle it." With regard to plaintiff's injury he said that the wheel "rolled directly over the block and flattened the block out on the ground, pinning Mr. Henshaw's foot under the block. * * * It rolled entirely over the block, leaving him free. He wasn't pinned down by the block." It appears that Coon and a young man living near took plaintiff to the hospital. After they had left, the driver backed his load to the north extension of Budlong and unloaded the shovel—a far different climax from that which one might expect from the picture plaintiff seeks to paint from the evidence, but which can only be conjured up by indulging in flights of imagination and conjecture not warranted by the record.

[4] Respondent urges that the questions of negligence and imminent peril presented in the case were matters for the jury, and that the evidence set out creates a conflict that makes the decision of that body unassailable on appeal. We do not agree that there is any conflict, as we have said. In order to raise a conflict the evidence must be such as to present a fair and reasonable ground for a difference of opinion (White v. Greenwood, 52 Cal. App. 737, 740, 199 P. 1095), and we fail to perceive such a condition in the portion of the record referred to.

Judgment reversed.

1. Appeal and error ⇨882(12).

Error in instruction that broker owed duty to tell principal all he knew about purchase of realty, if he knew it was being purchased for principal and another jointly, held not invited by his requested instruction that he was not bound to disclose price or circumstances surrounding purchase, unless advised that property was being purchased for principal or for latter and another as partners.

2. Appeal and error ⇨525(3).

Record, listing appellant's requested instructions, sufficiently showed that erroneous instruction, not listed, was not requested by appellant.

3. Appeal and error ⇨835(2).

Point, first urged on petition for rehearing, that appellant interjected certain question into case by answer, may be ignored as raised too late.

4. Appeal and error ⇨882(12).

Defendant's interjection of question of his fiduciary relationship to plaintiff into action by answer did not preclude him from complaining on appeal of instruction that he owed duty to divulge all he knew about transaction to plaintiff.

5. Appeal and error ⇨1066.

Instruction that defendant broker owed duty to divulge all he knew about purchase of realty to plaintiff held prejudicial error as against claim that it properly applied to charge of conspiracy, in absence of showing as to whether jury found conspiracy or mere breach of duty.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Fleming, Judge.

On rehearing as to one appellant.

Judgment against such appellant reversed and cause remanded for a new trial as to him, with directions.

For original opinion, see 18 P.(2d) 961.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem.

[1] We granted respondent's petition for rehearing as to appellant Toplitzky to give further consideration to respondent's claim that the instruction which we held prejudicially erroneous to Toplitzky was substantially similar to certain instructions requested by Toplitzky and hence the error was invited error of which Toplitzky could not complain. We are satisfied that there is nothing in this point. The instruction, the giving of which we held was prejudicial error, was as follows: "If the defendant Toplitzky, at the time when he acted as broker in these deals, knew that the property was being purchased for Mr. Fink and Mr. Weisman jointly, then he owed the duty to divulge to Mr. Fink all he knew with respect to the transaction, including the purchase price."

The proposed instruction, most strongly relied upon by respondent as substantially similar, read: "The defendant Toplitzky was under no duty or obligation to disclose to the plaintiff the purchase price of said properties, nor to disclose to plaintiff, Fink, any of the circumstances surrounding said purchase, unless at or prior to the purchase thereof the defendant Toplitzky was advised that said properties were being purchased for or in behalf of plaintiff, Fink, or for and in behalf of plaintiff, Fink, and the defendant Weisman, as copartner."

An examination of the instruction given and the instruction proposed will show that they are not substantially similar. The instruction given relates to the case where the jury finds that Toplitzky knew of Fink's interest. The proposed instruction relates to exactly the opposite case, where the jury finds that Toplitzky did not know of Fink's interest. A perfectly correct statement of law is involved in the proposed instruction. Unless Toplitzky knew of Fink's interest he could owe no duty of disclosure to Fink. But that is not the same thing at all as saying, as the court did in the instruction given, that if Toplitzky did know of Fink's interest he owed Fink a duty of disclosure. We have held that Toplitzky would only owe Fink a duty of disclosure: (1) If he knew of Fink's interest; (2) if he was acting for Fink in the transaction; and (3) if he had reason to believe that Weisman, if Weisman had knowledge of the facts, was concealing them from Fink. Toplitzky might have proposed instructions negating each of these conditions separately and advising the jury that in the absence of such condition he owed no duty of disclosure to Fink. That would not justify the court in giving an instruction that given one of such conditions only, without the other two, Toplitzky would owe Fink a duty of disclosure.

A simple example will make this clear. Suppose A is on trial for the murder of B and proposes an instruction that unless B died within a year and a day after receiving the fatal wound A should not be found guilty of murder. That would not justify the court in instructing the jury that if B did die within a year and a day they should find A guilty of murder. The two cases seem to be exactly parallel.

[2] Respondent's further claim that it does not appear from the record that the instruction held erroneous was not given at Toplitzky's request seems frivolous and is only noticed because it was again urged in his petition for rehearing. The record lists the instructions requested by Toplitzky and this instruction does not appear among those so listed. We are satisfied that this is a sufficient showing on this point.

[3, 4] For the first time respondent urged on petition for rehearing that Toplitzky interjected the question whether he had a fiduciary relationship to Fink into the case by his answer. We might ignore this point as raised too late. (2 Cal. Jur., pp. 790-792.) However, the complaint counted on Toplitzky's concealment and as we pointed out in our original opinion Toplitzky would owe no duty of disclosure in the absence of a fiduciary relationship.

[5] Lastly respondent claims in his petition for rehearing that the instruction held erroneous was properly applicable to the fifth count of the complaint which charged a conspiracy. It is a complete answer to this that we cannot know whether the jury found a conspiracy under the fifth count or merely a breach of duty as alleged in the first four counts of the complaint.

We are satisfied with the disposition of Toplitzky's appeal in our opinion filed herein on January 28, 1933, and readopt that opinion in all respects.

The judgment against appellant Toplitzky is reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial as to Toplitzky, with directions to the trial court to allow the amended complaint to be further amended, if plaintiff so desires, to correct the defects therein attacked on this appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Elliot Craig, Judge.

On rehearing.

Judgment reversed in part and affirmed in part.

Prior opinion, 17 P.(2d) 751.

Henry G. Bodkin, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Buron Pitts, Dist. Atty., and John Barnes, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for the People.

PARKER, Justice pro tem.

Defendants were indicted by the grand jury of Los Angeles county and charged with three distinct offenses of embezzling money. McCandless, appellant here, demanded and was granted a separate trial. He was found guilty on all three counts, and presents this appeal from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. It is the contention of appellant that the evidence is not sufficient to support the verdict of the jury on any of the counts, and also that the trial court erred to his prejudice in the admission of certain evidence.

[1] It might be here noted that the case is now before us on rehearing after determination heretofore by this court. In our former opinion, we reversed the judgment as to the first count and affirmed the judgment as to counts 2 and 3. Appellant thereafter filed his petition for a rehearing on counts 2 and 3. The petition was granted in general terms; that is to say, the order was made that a rehearing be granted, without reference to the counts. We do not feel that we would be precluded from again considering count 1, but, inasmuch as we have reached the same conclusion thereon, we will not further discuss this perhaps interesting point of procedure. However, though still of the opinion that there is not sufficient evidence to support the conviction as to count 1, we shall discuss the case in its entirety to the end that a complete disposal thereof may be herein made.

It appears without dispute, and indeed is conceded, that appellant had been a deputy assessor of the county of Los Angeles from 1918 until some time after the occasions charged in the indictment, and that during all of said times defendant Bender had also been a deputy and chief clerk in the assessor's office of said county. We deem it unnecessary to set forth herein the entire scheme of assessment, levy, and collection of taxes as provided in the Political Code. It will suffice to say that that Code does provide for and make a classification of all property for tax purposes. The most general classification, and the only one which will concern us here, is that of real and personal property. All property is assessable as of March 1st of each year. Real estate assessed is listed by the assessor with the valuation thereon placed by that official, and in due course the assessment roll, containing description of said property, goes to the board of equalization of the county, where the values are adjusted, and the next step is through the auditor and then on to the tax collector. Personal property is carried upon a separate roll, excepting in cases where the owner of such personal property is also the owner of real estate, which real estate, in the opinion of the assessor, is of sufficient value to insure the payment of the personal property tax, in which latter case the personal property is carried on the real estate roll; the taxes due thereon being a lien against the real estate of the same owner. Whenever, in the opinion of the assessor, there is not sufficient real property to secure the payment of the tax upon the personal property of the taxpayer, the assessor shall and does collect the tax due on the personal property forthwith after March 1st of each year. The provisions of the Political Code governing are from section 3820 to section 3831, inclusive. It is around these collections of personal property taxes that the present case centers.

[2] At a time before the indictment was returned and after the dates of the offenses charged in the three counts, there was being conducted an investigation into alleged discrepancies regarding the handling of personal property taxes in the office of the assessor. Amongst others engaged in this investigation was the district attorney, including the office staff of that official and his office investigators. During the inquiry appellant was called and questioned. Here we stop to note that the connection of McCandless with the inquiry was such that any and all statements made by him were free from any influence, direct or indirect, that might taint the same to a point of inadmissibility as far as the point might be urged that such statements were not free and voluntary. In the presence of the district attorney and others conducting the investigation, and with full knowledge of the purpose of the inquiry, appellant made statements and admissions showing the following concerning the methods used in the handling of taxes, particular reference being to the personal property taxes: That appellant had charge of the statements in the case of unsecured personal property; that during the years 1930 and 1931 appellant did not have any tax receipt book issued to him; that defendant Bender would collect money due for taxes and hand the same to McCandless, or the check, as the case might be, and that this had been done many times, so frequently that he could not remember; that the working arrangement which appellant had with Bender was with reference to money that was not turned into the assessor, and that in most of these instances he gave Bender half, not being able to recall how many times this happened; that his arrangement with Bender in regard to collection of taxes and splitting the money was that the latter gave him the checks and he (appellant) deposited them and gave Bender half of the money; that those were general checks which Bender took in over his desk, and appellant could not remember the instances, and was himself not familiar with the people; that as a general rule appellant cashed the checks at his bank. Appellant further stated that the arrangement followed an occasion when Bender pulled a statement out of the files and kept it in his desk until the season was over; that Bender would keep such statements, and, when he figured the transaction was closed he would send McCandless down and get payment from the taxpayer; that he (appellant) saw how easy it was and "fell for it" himself during the last few years; that he (appellant) knew Bender had been taking the checks for years, and that appellant fell into the scheme along about 1929, although he did not remember exactly the time; that there was no definite arrangement about how the money should be divided; that during the last year he (appellant) pulled statements from the file himself, and also a couple before that time; and that sometimes he paid Bender by check payable to "cash." After making this statement appellant was not held in custody, at which he expressed surprise, apparently feeling that he would be immediately arrested and held.

One of the reasons why a rehearing was granted herein was the claim of appellant that, regardless of the admissibility of this statement, the trial court had admitted it only with reference to count 3. We have followed through the transcript very closely, and find that there is no merit in this claim. It is true that the statement or admission contained other things with reference to some specific transactions, and it was with reference to these alone that the statement was excluded as to all counts excepting count 3. We are of the opinion that the statement was admissible against appellant on all counts. While no reference was made to the instances covered by the indictment, and while it was conceded that at the time the statement was taken or made the district attorney had no knowledge of the specific instances here involved, yet the statement contained admissions going to show a general scheme or plan looking to and having for its purpose the lottling of the public funds. The statement contained no confession of any particular act done or crime committed other than a general malfeasance. On this statement no charge could be predicated or proved. In its essence and to its utmost it was an admission, as the distinction is made in People v. Fowler, 178 Cal. 657, 664, 666, 174 P. 892. The statement does not come within the principle announced in People v. Canfield, 173 Cal. 309, 159 P. 1046, but rather within the well-accepted rule of People v. Sanders, 114 Cal. 216, 46 P. 153, 157. In the latter case it is said: "The commonest instance of the admission of evidence of another crime is where it becomes pertinent to prove the scienter or guilty knowledge under the particular charge." And, without attempting a treatise upon the subject, it appeals at once to the common sense that, where a public official upon investigation admits his wrongdoing, and admits that he has, pursuant to plan and scheme, frequently taken out money and mishandled checks belonging to the public funds, such statements throw light upon the intent and knowledge of the accused and illustrate the character of the act under scrutiny.

[3] Coming then to the particular acts going to support the separate counts: Preliminarily we note that all three counts are based upon the mishandling and unlawful appropriation of the funds of a single taxpayer. This taxpayer is named Spalding. In the year 1931, about May thereof, Spalding paid into the assessor's office as and for taxes on unsecured personal property the sum of $90.50. An interesting history surrounds this payment. It appears that the agent of Spalding had been directed by Bender to send in this sum and to make the check payable to McCandless. On the day this check was expected in the office, Bender showed noticeable interest and concern. At almost half hour periods he would inquire of the mail clerk if the letter had come, and otherwise manifest an unusual concern. When the letter did arrive, the deputy in charge, instead of advising Bender or appellant, at once took it and the check into the assessor, who upon notice thereof sent for Bender and McCandless. Bender told a story about some mistake, and stated that the check was intended to pay some taxes on real estate, and was sent to him personally, for the reason that the tax had become delinquent in the tax collector's office, and that in some way he could take it to that officer and have it acknowledged as having been received earlier, thus avoiding delinquency penalties. The assessor, however, directed a return of the letter and check. All of this took place in the presence of McCandless, who said nothing but glared at the deputy, who had apparently upset the plan. It is not possible to infer anything but that McCandless knew that Bender was using his name in the transaction. The taxpayer, upon receiving the returned check, sent in another one for the same amount, payable to appellant. This check was indorsed by one Priver, using appellant's name, and was regularly cleared. Upon these facts and other details the charge in count 1 was established to the satisfaction of the jury. The taxpayer, however, had never seen McCandless, and there is not a scintilla of evidence reasonably connecting him with Priver. There is nothing to show, to any degree of satisfaction, that appellant was other than one whose name was used by Bender, without his knowledge, in consummating this steal. We therefore have held, and do again hold, that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the conviction on count 1.

Coming then to count 2: During the year 1930, and on the first Monday in March thereof, Spalding was the owner of considerable personal property, consisting in the main of certain large boats. There was some uncertainty as to whether this property could be secured by certain real estate owned by the same taxpayer, as likewise there was much debate concerning the value of the boats. The transaction in the main was handled through Bender. The boats were first assessed at a large figure, and subsequently this amount was reduced almost to a minimum. Without giving the figure, we might state that the reduction showed that either the boats were originally assessed beyond all proportion to their actual value or that the reduction was to a ridiculously low figure. Regardless of this, the amount of tax claimed on the final valuation of the boat Westward was $82.75. This amount was paid by check made payable to Bender, for which the taxpayer received no receipt. This check was transferred by Bender to appellant and by the latter deposited in his personal bank account, and thereafter the instrument went through clearance and was paid. Another feature of this assessment was that the same boat was carried over into the real estate roll, the tax secured by the real estate, and the entire tax on the latter roll paid. Thus the boat was twice assessed during the same year and the taxes thereon twice paid.

[4, 5] Appellant strenuously attacks the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain this count. He argues that from the peculiar conditions surrounding the valuation it is more probable that the small check was in reality a bribe, rather than a tax payment. The ready answer is that the amount was paid as a tax pursuant to a tax statement. Whether the property was doubly assessed made no difference as far as this payment being public funds is concerned. It is a common occurrence for the taxpayer in every county to pay double taxes, and so often has this occurred that the revenue laws make direct provision for the taxpayer's remedy in such event. Never, however, has it been suggested that, pending adjustment, the money paid is not part of public funds belonging to the county. The chief argument of appellant is that, even if all this be conceded, yet the evidence fails to disclose any knowledge on his part. For aught that appears, it is urged, McCandless may have taken this check in regular course as a holder in good faith and for value. There is no positive evidence of any connection between the taxpayer and McCandless, nor is there positive evidence that the latter knew the sum represented in the check was money paid to the county for taxes. When we say positive evidence, we mean necessarily evidence disclosing physical contact between Bender and McCandless. No one heard Bender tell appellant that the money was tax money. Yet there is evidence sufficient to satisfy, beyond any reasonable doubt, that the money was tax money, paid in regular course to the county by one owing such a sum for taxes, and that the same never reached the county treasury. There is the proven fact that this money did go to the personal account of appellant and was by him appropriated. There is then the admission of McCandless that he had appropriated sums of money in just this way and that Bender would turn over checks to him the proceeds from which they would divide, and that the funds thus manipulated were moneys received from tax sources and belonging to the county of Los Angeles. We think this evidence sufficient to convince any reasonable person beyond all doubt of the guilt of appellant. The law does not require demonstration or that degree of proof which excluding all possibility of error produces absolute certainty, for such degree of proof is rarely possible. Only that degree of proof is necessary which convinces the mind and directs and satisfies the conscience of those who are bound to act conscientiously upon it.

Much is said by appellant concerning the irregularity of the payment to Bender. In this connection it is urged that the tax, being twice paid, was illegal and unusual. All of these arguments are met and answered in the case of People v. Robertson, 6 Cal. App. 518, 92 P. 498, wherein will be found most appropriate language disposing of similar claims.

[6] We come now to the third count. The dramatis personæ are the same, and each in his identical rôle. The taxpayer is the same, although represented by a different agent. The time of this transaction was earlier than the other two, in that it transpired in the year 1928. The taxpayer had received a tax notice from the assessor's office. At that time McCandless had a book of receipts and had been making tax collections. The mode of operation general in the office was to issue receipt books to the collectors. When money was received, a receipt would be given the taxpayer and a duplicate receipt would be left in the book. These receipts were numbered, as was each book. When the collector accounted for the book, he had all of the duplicate receipts and settled for the amount of total. The taxpayer in this instance paid in the sum of $702 by check. This check went through the hands of McCandless, and wound up in his possession. He had a receipt book showing collection of taxes in the sum of $8,787.73. When he came to make settlement on this book, he used the check for $702, though in that book of receipts was no property mentioned as assessed to the taxpayer, Spalding, who had paid the $702. In other words, this check was used to pay out on the receipts for moneys received from other sources. It might be conceded that the office sanctioned the turning in of all checks at as early a date as possible in order to avoid any charge of unreasonable delay in presentation. And it may be conceded further that a practice to this end had arisen. Appellant concedes that he handled this check and that he turned in the amount represented thereby in settlement of taxes. The testimony before the jury was that this money was received in payment of the taxes of Spalding. No record was found of any assessment against

Spalding for the year 1928. Therefore, claims appellant, it is reasonable to assume, and it must be so assumed, that Spalding simply used his check to pay the taxes of some one else, as does often happen. However, the check was made payable to the assessor, E. W. Hopkins, and in response to a tax notice received by Spalding's tax agent. Also there is evidence that during that year Spalding did own property subject to taxation in the county of Los Angeles; and further was there evidence that the checks of another concern had been similarly used by appellant. We think the showing withstands all argument. The fact that the check of $702 did actually remain in the county funds does not alter the situation, inasmuch as its use to cover up another shortage constituted and completed the offense charged. People v. Forman, 67 Cal. App. 697, 228 P. 378.

[7, 8] It may be noted that appellant did not take the stand nor did he offer any explanation of the facts indicating so clearly his guilt. We do strenuously affirm the rule that the failure of a defendant to testify in his own behalf shall in nowise be used against him; yet we must concede that the failure of a defendant to testify does not have the effect of strengthening his case, nor does it tend to weaken the case of the people. When facts are testified to by witnesses for the prosecution concerning which a defendant has personal knowledge, it is his inalienable right to remain mute and offer no explanation. But the one inevitable result is to leave the testimony uncontradicted; and we know of no rule of law that presumes a denial of the facts through silence. Naturally, there remains throughout the trial the presumption of innocence, and the facts are to be viewed in the light of that presumption; but that presumption does not of itself destroy the effect of evidence which is in itself satisfactory.

The record is free from error. The only defense is exceedingly technical and without merit. The guilt of appellant as to counts 2 and 3 was clearly shown. Embezzlement of public moneys is one of the most serious offenses known to our law, and one guilty thereof, and whose guilt so clearly appears as in the instant case, supported by his own admissions, should not find refuge in superficial technicality in nowise affecting the proof of the charge.

As to count 1 the judgment and order are reversed. As to counts 2 and 3 the judgments and orders are affirmed.

1. Eminent domain $\S$ 273.

Property owners held not entitled to injunctive relief against power company, but limited to remedy for damages for trespass on his land, where action was brought after poles were erected, power line strung, and use made thereof in public capacity.

2. Eminent domain $\S$ 265 (4).

Property owners who appealed in eminent domain action held entitled to their costs on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Harriet L. Smith and another against the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, and cross-complaint by defendant. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

W. E. Davies, of Marysville, for appellants.

Thomas J. Straub and Clinton F. Stanley, both of San Francisco, and W. R. Dunn, of Sacramento, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This action was begun on or about the 1st day of October, 1930, to recover of and from the defendant damages, and also for injunctive relief by reason of the following alleged facts:

That the defendant, on or about the 8th day of September, 1930, wrongfully and unlawfully, and without right or title or permission or consent of the plaintiffs, entered upon certain lands and premises belonging to the plaintiffs, dug ten holes and erected ten poles thereon, and strung, built, and erected wires and power lines thereon for the purpose of transmitting power.

The defendant, denying the allegations of the complaint as to the amount of damages inflicted upon the lands and premises belonging to the plaintiffs, filed a cross-complaint in the nature of an action in eminent domain to condemn a right of way across the lands belonging to the plaintiffs, for the purpose of maintaining its power lines and poles for the transmission of electric energy, setting forth, among other things, that the defendant is a public service corporation, and maintaining said line for and as a public use.

The court found in accordance with the allegations of the cross-complaint filed by the defendant that the defendant had a right to condemn a right of way over the lands and premises belonging to the plaintiffs for the purpose of maintaining its poles and electric power lines; that the same was intended for, and was being devoted to a public use, and awarded damages to the plaintiffs in the sum of $100 and costs in the action.

A review of the testimony shows that there was some conflict as to the amount of damages that should be awarded. However, the findings of the court in this particular appear to be supported by a preponderance of the testimony.

[1] Appellants' argument apparently is based on section 14 of article 1 of the Constitution, which provides that property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation having been first made to, or paid into court for the benefit of, the owner, etc. The record shows, however, that this action was not begun until after the poles had been erected, the power line strung, and use being made thereof in a public capacity. Under such circumstances, the law is well established that the remedy of the owner is one for damages, and that injunctive relief will not be awarded. In support of this we need only cite 10 California Jurisprudence, p. 540, § 136, and the case of Conaway v. Yolo Water & Power Co., 204 Cal. 125, 266 P. 944, 58 A. L. R. 674, where the authorities on this subject are fully set forth.

[2] Being an action in the nature of eminent domain, the appellants are entitled to their costs on appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

Application by the American Surety Company of New York for a writ of mandate prayed to be directed to the Appellate Department of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, and the Hon. Victor R. Peremptory writ of mandate issued.

Everett W. Mattoon, Co. Counsel, and J. F. Moroney, Deputy Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles (Burke, Hickson & Burke and Daniel G. Marshall, all of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondents.

PRESTON, Justice.

Action in mandate directed against the appellate department of the superior court of the county of Los Angeles to compel it to reinstate on its docket the appeal of defendant in a case begun in the municipal court of said county styled "Myron W. Goble, plaintiff and respondent, vs. American Surety Company of New York, a corporation, defendant and appellant," said superior court having entered an order purporting to dismiss the appeal for want of jurisdiction thereof.

The petition correctly states the question of law involved as follows: "Is the superior court without jurisdiction of an appeal from the municipal court merely because the undertaking on appeal is filed prior to the filing of a notice of appeal, where the undertaking was filed subsequent to the entry of judgment in the municipal court and thereafter, and within the time allowed by law a notice of appeal was filed?"

Plaintiff, in the trial court, sued defendant for breach of contract, and obtained a money judgment in the sum of $2,000. This judgment was entered on July 5, 1932. Defendant, pursuant to due notice, brought on for hearing his motion for new trial, which motion was denied on August 29, 1932. On September 10, 1932, the formal notice of appeal from the judgment was filed. All these steps were admittedly taken in due time. However, the undertaking on appeal required by sections 985 and 986 of the Code of Civil Procedure was actually on file on August 2, 1932, was still on file on September 10th thereafter, and has continuously remained a record in said court. Respondent court, upon this showing, refused jurisdiction of the appeal because of failure to lodge the said undertaking with the court subsequent to and within five days after the filing of the notice of appeal.

The undertaking, however, correctly recites the date of rendition of judgment, the amount thereof, the parties to the action; also that an appeal has been taken; that a stay of execution is desired, and it covenants that the surety is bound in double the amount of the judgment, if the appeal is dismissed or the judgment affirmed, to pay said judgment, together with damages and costs, and authorizes a summary judgment after thirty days from such termination of the action.

The statute in question, section 986 of the Code of Civil Procedure, contains the following language: "The undertaking on appeal must be filed within five days after the filing of the notice on appeal, and the notice of the filing of the undertaking must be given to the respondent. The adverse party may except to the sufficiency of the sureties within five days after the notice of the filing of the undertaking. * * *" This section and sections 983 to 987, inclusive, pertain to appeals from the municipal courts. They are modeled after sections 974 to 979, inclusive, of the Code of Civil Procedure, relating to appeals from the justices courts.

[1] Respondent contends that this law not only fixes the point of time beyond which an undertaking may not be filed, but also fixes the period when the right to file such instrument first accrues. We agree only with the first part of this contention. After the right of appeal accrues, we see no efficacy in limiting the mere order in which the notice of appeal and undertaking may be filed. The reasons which may have prompted a different holding under other statutes are not present here. The notice of appeal need not be served, but the notice of filing the undertaking must be served on respondent, and his duty to inspect it and his right to except thereto do not arise until such notice is received. This fact renders it immaterial whether the one filing precedes the other so long as both papers are filed after the right of appeal has accrued and within the period prescribed by law. The five-day period after the notice of appeal is filed is simply an enlargement of the period for the filing of the undertaking, but it does not forbid the filing of such undertaking at an earlier period after judgment.

We do not regard the cases of Buckholder v. Byers, 10 Cal. 481; Dooling v. Moore, 19 Cal. 81, and Carpentier v. Williamson, 24 Cal. 609, as binding upon us, for they arose under the Practice Act, enacted in 1851, which required a service of the notice of appeal, but did not require a notice of the filing of the undertaking; hence for the protection of the respondent it was proper to declare a definite time within which he might expect the undertaking to be filed and thus bring into being the right to except to the sufficiency thereof. Practically the same observation may be made as to the cases of Hewes v. Carville Mfg. Co., 62 Cal. 516, and Little v. Jacks, 68 Cal. 343, 8 P. 856, 9 P. 264, 11 P. 128, arising under section 940 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure, enacted in 1872 and as amended in 1874. Here, as already observed, we have a statute which does not require a service of the notice of appeal, but does require service of notice of the filing of the undertaking and the time for the respondent to except to the sufficiency thereof does not begin to run until such notice is received. No possible injury could come to respondent by holding the order of filing to be immaterial so long as the right of appeal has accrued.

From the above holding it follows that we necessarily disapprove of the holding in the case of Goodman v. Superior Court, 19 Cal. App. 457, 126 P. 185. However, we regard the case of Rigby v. Superior Court, 162 Cal. 334, 122 P. 958, as clearly paving the way for the holding we here make. There the court reviewed sections 974 to 979 of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to appeals from justices to superior courts, and pointed out that prior to 1909 the appellant was required to serve and file his notice of appeal within thirty days after rendition of the judgment, and that the appeal was ineffectual for any purpose, unless an undertaking was filed pursuant to section 978; further, that as the law did not specifically provide when the undertaking should be filed, it was thus inferred from the provisions as a whole that the undertaking must be filed within the period fixed for the taking of the appeal, but the order of filing of the notice of appeal and the undertaking was immaterial so long as both occurred within the thirty-day limit. The court then considered the amendment of 1909 (St. 1909, p. 1065), creating a new section, 978a, which was similar in its language to the statute we have before us. The court thereupon reasoned that the new section was designed to enlarge the time for the filing of notice of the undertaking, and that, in an extreme case, the undertaking could be filed as late as five days after the thirty-day period had elapsed. This holding is not adverse to the one here announced, but, on the contrary, we regard the conclusion we have reached as the logical outcome of the principles there declared. If it was immaterial which filing preceded the other during the thirty-day period, it was still immaterial after the time for filing the undertaking had been enlarged over the additional five-day period. In other words, the statute there fixed the period beyond which the undertaking could not be filed, but it did not declare when such period began or the order in which the notice of appeal and undertaking must be filed.

[2, 3] The existence of a judgment and the right of appeal therefrom furnish sufficient consideration for the undertaking, even though the undertaking precedes the filing of the notice of appeal. Clarke v. Mohr, 125 Cal. 540, 58 P. 176. And, were this not so, the presence of the undertaking in proper form at the time of the filing of the notice of appeal would furnish a proper consideration for the undertaking.

The conclusion we have reached is in harmony with the rule announced for the construction of similar provisions in the following cases: French v. Powell, 135 Cal. 636, 68 P. 92; Hub Hdw. Co. v. Aetna Acc. & L. Co., 178 Cal. 264, 173 P. 81; Williamson v. Egan, 209 Cal. 343, 287 P. 503.

Let a peremptory writ of mandate issue as prayed for, directing respondent court to reinstate the appeal in said action.

PRESTON, Justice.

Review of disciplinary proceedings had against petitioner by the state bar. No legal question is presented. Our sole task is to pass upon the weight of the evidence to establish the guilt or innocence of petitioner in order to determine what penalty, if any, should be imposed upon him.

The notice to show cause contained thirty-six respective charges of misconduct against petitioner growing out of his connection with various peculiar transactions and enterprises, conducted largely by his associates and others, including charges relating to the aiding and abetting of one Stevens, and United Adjustment Association, both unlicensed, to practice law in connection with the claims of certain minors for personal injuries received as the result of an automobile accident.

These various charges were heard at length before local administrative committee No. 5 for the county of Los Angeles. Voluminous evidence was received. At the conclusion of the hearing, the committee found to be true only those charges relating to the so-called "ambulance chasing" matter; that is, the committee found that petitioner did aid and abet said unlicensed persons to practice law and as a result of their activities accepted professional employment on behalf of the said several claimants and later remunerated said unlicensed persons for obtaining said employment. Summing up the result of its investigation, the committee found "from a great mass of testimony introduced, that the accused allowed himself to be interested in a large number of questionable business enterprises, and that undoubtedly many persons * * * alleged to have been defrauded out of money, did actually lose considerable sums of money in these various enterprises, largely through the representations of other persons associated in the enterprises in which the accused associated himself," but the committee further stated that it was unable to find that the representations causing such losses were made directly by the accused or that the accused conspired with any of his business associates to make fraudulent representations and cause losses to the various investors or that the accused acted in his capacity as an attorney, save with respect to said single and isolated case of "ambulance chasing." Further, with respect to that case, the committee found that accused had not prior thereto nor has he since engaged in similar practices and although he directly violated the rules of professional conduct in that particular matter, he acted fairly with respect to the claims of the parties involved. Upon these findings the committee recommended that the accused be privately reprimanded for his conduct in connection with said "ambulance chasing" charges.

Thereafter further proceedings were had and the cause was submitted to the board of governors of the state bar. That body approved and adopted the first thirty-six findings of the local committee, but, in connection with the prosecution of the claims of said minors for damages for personal injuries, it further found that, in collusion with said unlicensed persons, and by obtaining the appointment of said Stevens as guardian ad litem, entering into a settlement agreement with the insurer and thereafter dismissing the first court action and commencing a new action in the municipal court wherein judgment was entered for the same amount as the agreed settlement, and satisfied, all sums remaining after payment of expenses and fees being distributed to said minors, petitioner and Stevens acted knowingly with the intent and with the effect of taking into their own hands the fixing of fees and allowances to be paid as against said minors, thus depriving the court of its supervisory control of said matter. Further the board of governors found that "fraudulent transactions of the respondent's associates extended over a period of years; that respondent received profits from some of these transactions; that when the transactions were attacked by arrests and otherwise, he defended his associates and arranged settlements for them; that he must have acquired knowledge of the character of the operations they were carrying on, and that he nevertheless continued his business relations with them." In conclusion it was recommended that petitioner be disbarred.

We have examined this record with great est care and thoroughness. But we are unable to say that the evidence adduced is of sufficient strength to support an order of disbarment. Indeed, it is unfortunate, if there be any sound basis for the numerous accusations made against petitioner, that the extent of his participation in the enterprises of his associates was not more fully ascertained and that the fraudulent and wrongful acts on his part so broadly hinted were not brought into the full light of day.

Under the record as it now stands, we find ourselves in accord with the findings and conclusions of the local committee. It is, therefore, hereby ordered that the petitioner, Gerard Remington, be given a public reprimand, and this opinion shall constitute such a reprimand.

NOEL et al. v. CAPOBIANCO et ux.
S. F. 14824.

Supreme Court of California.
July 6, 1933.

Easements 54.

Owners of some of lots subject to right of way easement held entitled to reconstruct and regrade terrace to conform to street grade where other lots would be benefited.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John J. Van Nostrand, Judge.

Action by Daisy Noel and others against Alfredo Capobianco and wife. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

H. M. Anthony and Harold A. Harwood, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

Milton Marks, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

The respondents have made a motion to dismiss this appeal or affirm the judgment on the ground that the appeal is not substantial and, in fact, presents no debatable question of law. The parties, excepting the city and county of San Francisco, own lots adjoining a private right of way known as Culebra terrace, opening into Chestnut street. The grade of Chestnut street was recently raised and, of course, unless the Culebra terrace is also raised, the use thereof for pedestrians and vehicles is rendered difficult, and the free and open enjoyment thereof is prevented. The plaintiffs, representing nine out of the thirteen lots served by the terrace, brought this action against the defendants, Alfredo Capobianco and his wife (the owners of one lot), to have it declared that they had the right to reconstruct and regrade the terrace, at their own cost and expense. The appeal is from the judgment in favor of plaintiffs and is brought to us on the judgment roll. The court found that ever since September 14, 1911, "all of the parcels of real property fronting upon Culebra terrace have been subject to an easement of right of way over the said real property, for purposes of ingress and egress and for use as a private right of way," specifically describing the property so used. It also found that the use of the right of way was rendered difficult by reason of the change already mentioned, and, unless reconstructed, plaintiffs "will have no convenient nor free, open and unobstructed access to and from their real property" and that the grade could be raised according to plans prepared by the city and county of San Francisco, which reconstruction "will not interfere with but will aid and better the use and enjoyment of the real property owned by the defendants." The judgment was that plaintiffs had the right to do the work of reconstruction at their own cost and in accordance with the plans of the city and county of San Francisco.

The appellants contend that their property is taken for public use without compensation; that the judgment transcends the power of the court in declaratory relief actions; and that plaintiffs have no right to additionally burden their property by entering upon it for the purpose of making the alterations.

All of these contentions are answered by the findings and the judgment. In effect, the court declared that defendants' property was not taken or damaged, nor was any additional burden cast upon their property, and declared the rights of plaintiffs with respect thereto.

There is no merit in the appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

HOCKETT v. PACIFIC STATES AUXILIARY CORPORATION et al.

L. A. 12677.

Supreme Court of California.

June 26, 1933.

1. Bills and notes Ⓒ492.

Rebuttable presumption exists that maker made valid delivery of negotiable note in payee's possession (Civ. Code, § 3097).

2. Principal and agent Ⓒ123(3).

Evidence held to justify finding that grandmother authorized grandson to deliver her negotiable note to payee, or that lack of ordinary care to prevent negotiation estopped her from denying delivery (Civ. Code, § 3097).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Clair S. Tappaan, Judge.

Action by Alice E. Hockett against the Pacific States Auxiliary Corporation, and the Pacific States Savings & Loan Company, which filed a cross-complaint. From a judgment for cross-complainant, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

For prior opinion, see 15 P.(2d) 547.

C. F. Culver, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Earl L. Banta, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PRESTON, Justice.

Plaintiff, by this action, sues in equity to cancel a promissory note, and deed of trust to secure same, on the ground that each of said documents was forcibly taken from her by her grandson and negotiated to the defendant Pacific States Savings & Loan Company, without authority from or a consideration to her. Said defendant, the payee and beneficiary under said trust deed, cross-complained, alleging the validity of each of said instruments and praying for a decree to establish it. The cause was tried and the court made findings and gave judgment denying relief to plaintiff and sustaining in toto the cross-action of defendant. Plaintiff has appealed. The sole question for determination is the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the conclusion of the court.

[1] At the outset, it may be said that the promissory note is negotiable in form, plaintiff's signature appears thereon, and respondent has possession thereof. From these facts there arises a presumption that a valid and intentional delivery by the maker was made and this presumption obtains until the contrary is proved. Section 3097, Civ. Code. This, of itself, would ordinarily be sufficient to support the court's findings. However, here the court made, among others, the following findings: "The court finds that Willis E. Hockett is the grandson of plaintiff and that plaintiff signed and executed said note and Trust Deed and placed them in the hands of said Willis E. Hockett for the purpose of enabling said Willis E. Hockett to use the same for the purpose of raising the principal sum of * * * $1096. The court finds that plaintiff delivered said note and Trust Deed to said Willis E. Hockett, and further finds that if said Willis E. Hockett later took said note and Trust Deed from plaintiff, she allowed said note and Trust Deed to go into the possession of said Willis E. Hockett and to be used by him without using ordinary care in that she neglected and omitted to notify either the said payee of said note or the said Trustee under said Trust Deed that said note and Trust Deed were in the possession of said Willis E. Hockett without her consent. The court finds that said note and Trust Deed and each of them when they went into the hands of said Willis E. Hockett were regular on their faces. The court finds that by reason of the fact that said note and Trust Deed are regular on their faces and were in the possession of said Willis E. Hockett, the grandson of plaintiff, that the defendants relied upon the apparent due execution, genuineness and delivery of said instruments by plaintiff and induced thereby, advanced the sum of * * * $1096.00 * * * in consideration of the receipt of said note and Trust Deed and received the same for value in the ordinary course of business. * * *

From the evidence it appears that plaintiff had two pieces of real property, one incumbered and the other clear. At the instigation of the grandson the note and deed of trust were prepared and signed by her and the promissory note was also signed by the grandson as comaker. The documents were delivered to the grandson to be by him taken to a certain notary for certification and to then be taken for negotiation. But plaintiff contends that she thought that the purpose of the documents was to secure a refunding of the existing mortgage, or change of payee therein, with respect to her incumbered property; that she did not know that it was to incumber her clear property.

The notary, who was a banker and friend, returned with the grandson to plaintiff's residence and there explained to her the nature of the documents and surrendered them to her. At this point, plaintiff testified, respecting the instruments, as follows: "Well, the boy took it away from me. He just snatched it out of my hands. I did not acknowledge that trust deed before anybody—excepting Mr. Mayland and I never delivered it to the Pacific States Loan Company. I never got anything from them, or anybody else, in connection with that trust deed, or the note—in money or any consideration—or anything else. * * * After Mr. Mayland brought it back to me I stood and held it in my hand, and he (Willis E. Hockett) had come up and grabbed it out of my hands. Mr. Mayland was not there at the time. He just stepped out. I was too dumbfounded to do anything. I didn't understand what was happening to me. I went up to the bank and told Mr. Mayland about it. * * *

This occurrence was on May 15, 1928. The grandson was not a witness at the trial, but the plaintiff otherwise showed that a notary's certificate in regular form was placed upon the deed of trust by another and thereafter the grandson began negotiations with respondent loan company in the matter. On the same day a joint escrow was established with the Title Insurance & Trust Company of Los Angeles. The deed of trust was actually filed for record on the 22d day of March, 1928, but the consideration did not pass from respondent until on or about September 1, 1928, a period of some three and one-half months after the occurrence hereinabove related. During this period, by a proceeding in the superior court, a decree of said court was obtained terminating the joint tenancy of plaintiff and her deceased husband in said property. The property was registered under the Torrens Title Act (St. 1897, p. 138), and in the court proceeding just referred to there was also procured a duplicate Torrens title certificate, upon the allegation that the original certificate had been destroyed by fire, which allegation was untrue, because plaintiff held the original certificate herself and produced it in evidence in this cause. The consideration by respondent loan company was disbursed, usually upon orders to which the grandson attached the appellant's name by him. Two checks were made direct to appellant and indorsed in her name, but she denies the genuineness of her purported signatures.

[2] There is much evidence which tends to show that the plaintiff was grossly imposed upon by her grandson. But there is also ample evidence upon which the court could conclude that plaintiff was negligent in many particulars in not taking the proper steps to prevent negotiation of the documents. It is true that the evidence shows that she called upon the first notary, Mr. Mayland, who in turn visited the office of the registrar of titles and asked to be notified if any papers came in affecting the title to said property, but this was far from what should have been done under the circumstances. Said notary at least knew the name of the payee of the note or trustee in the deed of trust. Plaintiff could have found out this information. Plaintiff likewise had access to means of finding her grandson and doubtless, according to her own testimony, saw him upon several occasions before the full consideration passed from respondent and she could have obtained information as to his whereabouts from his father and mother, whose residence was known to her. From a consideration of the whole record, we are unable to say that the court was not justified in finding that plaintiff authorized delivery by the grandson or that her neglect and lack of ordinary care in the premises estopped her from denying such delivery.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action for injunction by the Coast Truck Line, a corporation, against the Asbury Truck Company. From an order granting a temporary injunction restraining the operation by defendant of a truck line without first obtaining a certificate of public convenience and necessity, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Libby & Sherwin and Warren E. Libby, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Henry J. Bischoff, of San Diego, for respondent.

WASTE, Chief Justice.

Defendant appeals from an order granting a temporary injunction. The action was brought by plaintiff, a duly certificated common carrier, to enjoin the defendant trucking company from transporting vegetables for compensation over the public highways of the state between Los Angeles and Oceanside and other points, without first obtaining a certificate of public convenience and necessity from the Railroad Commission, as required by the Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act. (St. 1917, p. 330, as amended).

[1] In response to an order to show cause why such injunction should not issue, defendant offered in evidence two orders or decisions of the Railroad Commission, dated, respectively, March 31, 1927, and June 9, 1927, which orders or decisions, when read together, are sufficiently comprehensive to authorize the defendant to transport vegetables for hire between the points above named. In opposition to this showing there was introduced in evidence two subsequent orders or decisions of the Railroad Commission. The first of these, dated August 16, 1927, rescinds and vacates the earlier decisions relied on by the defendant, while the second, dated December 1, 1927, grants to the defendant a certificate of public convenience and necessity "for the transportation of oil well supplies, heavy machinery, pipe, steel and tanks." Upon this showing the trial court properly concluded that the defendant was not possessed of a certificate authorizing it to transport vegetables. A temporary injunction was thereupon issued.

[2] Section 67 of the Public Utilities Act (Stats. 1915, pp. 115, 161), provides that "no court of this state (except the supreme court to the extent herein provided) shall have jurisdiction to review, reverse, correct or annul any order or decision of the commission or to suspend or delay the execution or operation thereof, or to enjoin, restrain or interfere with the commission in the performance of its official duties." Relying on this section, defendant urged in the court below and contends upon this appeal that the superior court was without jurisdiction to proceed in this cause. With this contention we cannot agree.

[3] The action of the superior court in the instant cause does not run counter to any provision of the foregoing section. It has not attempted to "review, reverse, correct or annul" any order or decision of the commission, nor has it undertaken to "enjoin, restrain or interfere" with the commission in the performance of its official duties. It has merely given effect to the most recent and final order of the commission by enjoining defendant from operating in violation thereof. The validity of the several orders of the commission was not involved nor under review in the court below. The interpretation of the several orders at most was the only question before the court. As a court of general jurisdiction, the superior court may properly interpret and give effect to any document or order even though it be the result of action by the legislative, executive, or judicial branch of the government. Henderson v. Oroville-Wyan-dotte Irr. Dist., 207 Cal. 215, 219, 277 P. 487. Moreover, under section 5 of article 6 of the Constitution, the superior court has "original jurisdiction in all cases in equity." The present action for an injunction falls squarely within this grant of power. In Yolo Water, etc., Co. v. Superior Court, 43 Cal. App. 332, 341, 185 P. 195, 199, it is declared: "Powers conferred by the Constitution upon the railroad commission to supervise and regulate public utilities and to bring suits to enforce its orders and compel public utilities to obey the law is not inconsistent with the power conferred upon superior courts to entertain injunction suits instituted by others than the commission against public utilities. To so hold will not create any conflict between the courts and the commission, because in all such suits the courts will be bound and guided and controlled in all respects in entertaining and deciding or dismissing them as much by section 23 of the Constitution and the Public Utility Act as by any other provision of the law."

[4, 5] There is no merit in petitioner's attack on the order of the Railroad Commission rescinding and vacating its two prior orders granting defendant authority to operate. On a collateral attack of this character, the defect complained of must appear on the face of the judgment roll. The vacating order, here assailed, states on its face that it was made after hearing had. Defendant's contention that it had no notice thereof is therefore without merit. In addition, it is well to point out that section 65 of the Public Utilities Act, supra, makes the orders and decisions of the commission final in all collateral actions and proceedings. Truck Owners, etc., Inc., v. Superior Court, 194 Cal. 146, 150, 228 P. 19.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

IRA F. THOMPSON, Justice.

Prior to August 2, 1926, the defendants Frank B. Ziegler and Harry F. Carling were the owners of a tract of land in San Diego county, which property John B. Zeller, M. Reiss, Ed. F. Gilbert, John W. Waybright, and A. E. Davies desired to purchase for the purpose of subdividing into smaller parcels and selling. With this purpose in view the land was deeded to the Union Trust Company of San Diego and a declaration of trust executed by all the parties. In brief, it provided for an adjustment of certain differences of interest between the former owners, Ziegler and Carling, who were designated in the instrument as payees, and for a class of beneficiaries, designated as class A, to the extent of $125,000, which beneficial interests it was provided might be sold to purchasers, but until so sold should belong to the class B beneficiaries, who were the purchasers already named. It was also declared, after making provision for payment of the purchase price, improvements, expenses, and a designated profit to the class A beneficiaries, that the class B beneficiaries should share equally with class A beneficiaries in the anticipated profits. In other words, and solely to make the arrangement clear, the class B beneficiaries were to guide the destinies of the subdivision; the purchase price, improvements, etc., were to be paid, at stated intervals, out of the sales of the property, and, if necessary, sales of class A interests were to be made to assist the purchasers to carry out their part of the undertaking, which was to pay the sum of $315,000 to defendants Ziegler and Carling; to improve the property; to protect and defend it from loss and damage; to pay all taxes or liens assessed against it; and to make sales of the subdivided property. The obligations of the beneficiaries were declared to be joint and several. Their beneficial interests were declared to be hypothecated for the purpose of securing performance of the terms of the declaration of trust. We may find it necessary hereafter to refer to

1. Mortgages ⇨375.

Assignee of purchasers' beneficial interests under trust declaration held liable with remaining original beneficiary for deficiency on principal indebtedness after sale of beneficial interests.

Declaration of trust imposed personal liability on beneficiaries for deficiency in principal indebtedness remaining after application of proceeds from sale of beneficial interest, and the assignee's acceptance of assignment of beneficial interest stated that assignee accepted assignment and approved, warranted, confirmed, and agreed to declaration of trust and all terms and conditions thereof.

2. Assignments ⇨109.

Intention of parties, construed either by their acts, subject-matter of contract, or their words, controls in determining whether assignee assumed obligations imposed by contract on assignor.

3. Mortgages ⇨375.

Where assignee of purchaser's beneficial interest under trust declaration was liable for payment of taxes, arrangement whereby assignee attempted to advance delinquent taxes to vendor receiving from him assignment pro tanto of amount paid held without consideration.

4. Mortgages ⇨375.

Assignee of purchaser's beneficial interest under trust declaration assuming liability for deficiency on indebtedness and payment of taxes could not recover from proceeds of sale of beneficial interest amount advanced for taxes.

some of the specific provisions, but for the present the general outline is sufficient.

The plaintiff in the two actions named in the caption hereof was not an original beneficiary, but acquired by assignment three-fifths of the class B beneficial interests during March, 1928, and another one-fifth August 29, 1928. During May, 1928, certain taxes on the property had become delinquent, and plaintiff, instead of advancing them directly in his capacity as a beneficiary, attempted to advance them as a payee through the defendant Ziegler, receiving from Ziegler an assignment pro tanto in the sum of the amount put up, to wit, $18,239.47. The first above-entitled action was commenced by Weidner to have it declared that the meaning of the assignment from Ziegler was that he assumed the position of a payee possessed of the rights of Ziegler until the advance was repaid to him and to enjoin a threatened sale of the beneficial interests by the trustee for defaults under the declaration of trust. Carling and Ziegler separately answered, denying that the plaintiff had advanced the money as a payee, and also jointly filed a cross-complaint in which they alleged that Weidner had accepted an assignment of a class B beneficial interest and had assumed the obligations of such beneficiary; that he had failed to make payments of principal and interest and taxes as required; that for the default thus occasioned they had caused a sale of the beneficial interests; and that, after the proceeds therefrom had been deducted, there remained due from plaintiff the sum of $117,940.26, and prayed for judgment accordingly.

In the second action the plaintiff sought to recover the sum advanced for taxes, upon the theory that at the sale of the beneficial interests by the trustee the sum of $150,000 was realized, out of which he claimed it was his right to be reimbursed.

The injunctive relief sought by plaintiff was, as is apparent from the facts already recited, denied. The two actions were consolidated. The court denied relief to the plaintiff in both actions and decided against the defendants and cross-complainants on their cross-complaint. From the judgment so entered the plaintiff has appealed as well as the cross-complainants.

[1] It becomes apparent from what we have already said that the controlling question in this case is whether the plaintiff and appellant undertook and assumed the obligations of a class B beneficiary under the trust. We have heretofore stated the ultimate conclusion to the effect that the original class B beneficiaries personally agreed to discharge and pay the purchase price, taxes, and improvements. There can be no doubt concerning that fact, but, if there were, it would be set at rest by the decision of the District Court of Appeal in the case of Davies v.

Union Trust Co. of San Diego, 125 Cal. App. 593, 13 P.(2d) 961, 962, a case involving the identical trust here under consideration, wherein it was pointed out that, although a "studious effort was made to avoid a clear covenant on the part of appellant and his associates to pay the indebtedness which is acknowledged to exist," yet there were express covenants to "protect the trust property from loss, damage, liability, and expense" and to pay for improvements and to pay installments of the principal indebtedness, together with taxes or assessments against the property, which provisions, it was determined, were sufficient to support a deficiency judgment against one of the original class B beneficiaries. The declaration of trust provides as follows: "The terms and conditions hereof shall inure to and bind Trustee, all of said Beneficiaries and Payees, and all other heirs, legatees, devisees, executors, administrators, successors and assigns." It was executed by the trustee and ratified by the payees, the defendants and appellants Carling and Ziegler and the beneficiaries, in language, a part of which, in view of the subsequent acceptance of assignment by Weidner, is significant, as follows: "We hereby jointly and severally assent, agree to, guarantee, warrant, approve, ratify and confirm said Declaration in all particulars." The plaintiff and appellant upon receiving the assignments already mentioned signed acceptances, each in the following words: "Assignee's Acceptance. The undersigned assignee in the foregoing assignment, does hereby accept said Assignment and does hereby approve, warrant, confirm and agree to the Declaration of Trust referred to in said Assignment and all the terms and conditions thereof, hereby acknowledging that the same has been read by the undersigned." Two factors are to be noted in this acceptance. Weidner accepted the assignment and thereby became a class B beneficiary, subject to all the terms and conditions imposed upon his assignor. But this was not deemed sufficient to accomplish and express the intent of the parties. Something further was required. Hence he agreed to, ratified, confirmed, approved, and warranted all the terms and conditions of the declaration. Let us suppose that Weidner had been originally a beneficiary, but for some reason his signature to the original ratification had not been appended, i. e., he had not executed it. And, indulging supposition further, let us contemplate the effect of his signature, upon discovery of the omission, in the exact words of the latter half of the acceptance. Can it be doubted that he had bound himself as effectually as though he had signed it in the first instance? We entertain no doubt upon the question, by which process of reasoning we also conclude that there was no doubt concerning the purpose and intent of the second half of the acceptance. By the first half Weidner was to become entitled to all the rights and privileges of a beneficiary, and by the second half he assumed all of the burdens and responsibilities. This is made the more manifest by the provision already quoted, that the terms of the trust shall bind the assigns of the beneficiaries.

[2] Considerable time and attention is devoted by counsel to the authorities dealing with the assumption of liability under a contract by an assignee thereof. There is nothing mysterious about the rule of law announced therein, nor is there any conflict in the cases when read in the light of that which governs, to wit, the intent of the parties, construed either by their acts, the subject-matter of the contract, or their words. It is conceded by counsel for defendants that the mere assignment of rights under an executory contract does not cast upon the assignee any of the personal liabilities imposed by the contract upon the assignor, for which proposition of law the books are full of authorities. But they point out that, in harmony with section 1589, Civ. Code, which reads: "A voluntary acceptance of the benefit of a transaction is equivalent to a consent to all the obligations arising from it, so far as the facts are known, or ought to be known, to the person accepting," there are a number of cases which declare an assumption by the assignee, such, for example, as Cutting Packing Co. v. Packers' Exchange, 86 Cal. 574, 25 P. 52, 10 L. R. A. 369, 21 Am. St. Rep. 63; Jones v. Allert, 161 Cal. 234, 118 P. 794, and Robinson v. Rispin, 33 Cal. App. 536, 165 P. 979. And our attention is especially directed to Brady v. Fowler, 45 Cal. App. 592, 188 P. 320, 321, which case involved an option with a covenant by the optionee to pay taxes during the term thereof. It was assigned, and the court in an opinion written by Mr. Justice Richards said: "The written instrument which the court declared to constitute an option is set out in full in the plaintiffs' complaint, and by its terms the obligations thereof are expressly made binding upon the successors and assigns of the parties thereto. No express assumption of those obligations by an assignee thereof was therefore necessary. Moreover, as we have said, this appellant having enjoyed the rights arising from his making of the monthly payments therein provided, he cannot escape the burdens coincidentally imposed during such period of enjoyment." In the case of Barberich v. Pooshichian, 59 Cal. App. 507, 211 P. 236, 238, it was declared that, as between the vendors and defendants who were the assignees of vendees, and who had undertaken and agreed "to keep, observe, and comply with each and all of the terms and conditions in said contract contained" on the part of the original vendee, there was a privity of contract which rendered the defendants liable under the contract. And in Title Insurance, etc., Co. v. Amalgamated Oil Co., 63 Cal. App. 29, 218 P. 71, 75, the assignee of an oil lease who took "together with all rights and privileges, burdens and benefits in said lease set forth" was declared to be "liable for the performance of all the obligations agreed to by the original lessee." Counsel for plaintiff and appellant lay considerable stress upon the case of Armstrong Co. v. Shell Co., 98 Cal. App. 769, 277 P. 887, but an examination of the case discloses there was no obligation resting upon defendant's assignor to pay the royalties sought to be recovered in the action. We might multiply considerably the authorities to the same effect as the first three discussed, but no useful purpose would be served. Our conclusion is that the plaintiff and appellant assumed the obligations of his assignors and is liable with the other sole remaining beneficiary for the indebtedness.

[3,4] This conclusion practically disposes of the claims of plaintiff and appellant that he was entitled to recover the sum advanced by him for the payment of taxes. Being under the obligation to pay the taxes, it is obvious that the finding of the trial court to the effect that no consideration was given or received for the execution of the purported and limited assignment by defendant and appellant Ziegler is correct. See Sullivan v. Sullivan, 99 Cal. 187, 33 P. 862; Marinovich v. Kilburn, 153 Cal. 638, 96 P. 303, and Shipley v. Rosemead Co., 100 Cal. App. 706, 280 P. 1017. It is also apparent that plaintiff's and appellant's claim that he was entitled to be reimbursed out of the sum realized from the sale of the beneficial interests pledged as security for the obligations which he had assumed is without merit.

It follows from what has been said that plaintiff was not entitled to recover, but that cross-complainants should have had judgment. The judgment in so far as it denies relief to plaintiff is affirmed, but that portion thereof which denies recovery to cross-complainants Frank B. Ziegler and Harry F. Carling is reversed.

COAKLEY v. SWIM.

S. F. 14574.

Supreme Court of California.

June 20, 1933.

1. Homestead ☞217.

Decree quieting plaintiff's title to homestead and enjoining defendant from asserting any claim thereto held not too broad as estopping defendant from proceeding to appraise value of homestead under statutes (Civ. Code, §§ 1245-1257).

2. Exemptions ☞62.

No lien can be impressed upon exempt property.

3. Homestead ☞110.

Homesteader is free to sell homestead and reinvest proceeds in other property which may likewise become exempt if he so elects.

4. Homestead ☞116.

Attachment and abstract of judgment obtained against debtor and her husband could not impress debtor's homestead with lien, where value of homestead was not appraised and it was not shown lands thereafter lost homestead character, that they had enhanced in value in excess of $5,000, and that excess was subject to judgment (Civ. Code, §§ 1245-1257).

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth Coakley against Meurice Swim, in which defendant filed a cross-complaint. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Meurice Swim, in pro. per. and Russell P. Tyler, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

William M. Malone, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SEAWELL, Justice.

This appeal is taken by the defendant from a judgment quieting plaintiff's title to her homestead and removing therefrom a cloud which was cast thereon by defendant asserting an interest therein, arising out of an action entitled Swim v. James K. and Elizabeth Coakley, husband and wife, commenced by defendant, Swim, upon an assigned claim on account of hospital care and attention rendered to James K. Coakley, husband of Elizabeth Coakley, plaintiff herein. Said action terminated in a judgment in favor of plaintiff and against said Coakleys for the sum of $163, together with costs taxed at $8.55 and interest in the sum of $8.45. Respondent herein, Elizabeth Coakley, on May 31, 1927, long prior to the commencement of said action and before said indebtedness was incurred, made and filed a declaration of homestead on the real property affected by this action for the joint benefit of herself, her husband, and two minor daughters. It is not disputed that said homestead was selected as provided by law, or that it has not been abandoned or in any wise lost or become subject to the lien of third parties, unless the proceedings taken by plaintiff therein (appellant in this action) have impressed said homestead with the lien of appellant herein, as asserted by him. The facts upon which the contending parties rest their respective claims follow.

On April 13, 1928, the defendant, Swim, commenced an action against said Coakley to obtain a judgment on account of said assigned claim for hospital services. Five months after the filing of said action, to wit, September 12, 1928, while said homestead was, and for more than a year prior to the commencement of said action had been, a valid and subsisting homestead, the defendant herein caused a writ of attachment to issue, which was levied by the sheriff upon said homestead. Thereafter he recovered judgment for said sum of $163.95, together with costs. He thereupon caused to be filed and recorded with said city and county recorder an abstract of said judgment, and by virtue of this abstract of judgment and said attachment he claims that said homestead has become impressed with a lien.

By a cross-complaint defendant specially asserts a lien upon said homestead by virtue of the levy made of a writ of attachment, without taking any other or further proceedings.

The appeal is before us on a bill of exceptions. The only point that appellant attempts to make in his brief for a reversal or modification of the judgment quieting plaintiff's title is that the order of injunction is too broad. His contention is thus stated:

[1] "The judgment provides that respondent's title be quieted and further that appellant be enjoined and debarred from asserting any claim adverse to respondent's title as hereby ascertained and determined." (Italics ours.) It is objected that, if appellant should proceed to appraise the value of said homestead under the provisions of sections 1245 to 1257, Civil Code, both inclusive, he would be violating the command of the judgment. There is no merit in this suggestion. The judgment could not be framed in any other language if it is to be made effective for any purpose. Every judgment is rendered with reference to the issues involved in each particular case. The decree enjoins the defendant from asserting any claim "adverse to respondent's title as hereby ascertained and determined." Nothing could be clearer. The injunction is expressly limited to the issues therein involved, and not to any new issues or to a changed condition as to increased value in excess of the sum fixed by statute in a proper proceeding. The judgment is limited to the precise situation and state of facts existent at the time it was entered.

[2-4] Defendant's claim to a lien, as shown by his pleadings, is placed solely upon the effectiveness of the attachment and the abstract of judgment obtained in the manner related, ex proprio vigore, to impress a lien upon a valid and subsisting homestead. The judgment does not purport to estop the appellant from prosecuting any right given him by the provisions of sections 1245, et seq., Civil Code. Defendant took no steps whatever to have appraisers appointed to appraise the value of the homestead. Until its value was shown to exceed the sum of $5,000, it was immune from execution and forced sale, except in those cases named in section 1241, Civil Code, of which the instant claim is not one. No lien can be impressed upon exempt property. A homesteader is free to sell the homestead and reinvest the proceeds in other property, which may likewise become exempt if he so elects.

If a homestead could be impressed with a lien, in the manner in which defendant by his asserted claim seeks to incumber the free use and title of plaintiff's property, then a creditor's claim would cloud the title of every homestead and the favored object of the law, to wit, the protection of the homesteader, would wholly fail.

Neither by his answer, cross-complaint, or in any other proceeding did he raise the issue as to the value of the homestead. The only objection whatever made to the validity of the homestead by the pleadings or at all is that the homestead was "abandoned by process of law subsequent to the declaration." What is meant by that objection, or upon what theory it was made, is not pointed out by the defendant. Defendant at no time appeared as a creditor in conformity with sections 1245-1257, Civil Code, and, if he had actually done so, it would have availed him nothing, inasmuch as he did not show or attempt to show that he applied to the superior court in the county in which the homestead is situated for the appointment of persons to appraise the value of said homestead within the time provided by law. Section 1245, supra, expressly provides that if such "application shall not be made within sixty days after the levy of such execution the lien of the execution shall cease at the expiration of said period, and no execution * * * shall thereafter be levied upon the homestead." Absolutely no step has been taken by the judgment creditor upon a verified petition or otherwise, or within the time or in the manner provided by section 1246, Civil Code, et seq., to comply with the provisions of law prescribing the manner in which the value of a homestead may be appraised by the court. Appellant has not shown that the lands of plaintiff thereafter lost their homestead character, or that they had enhanced in value to an amount in excess of the sum of $5,000, and that the excess was subject to the payment of a valid judgment.

Klemmens v. First National Bank, 22 N. D. 304, 133 N. W. 1044, relied upon by appellant, has no relevancy to the instant case. In that case the term "forever enjoined" was held to be too broad, on the ground that it might affect the right of a judgment creditor even in case the homestead had lost its character as such. The term "forever enjoined," used in the cited case, but not in the instant case, has the sanction of ancient usage, and we do not necessarily see anything menacing in its use. As a matter of course, such language is limited to the existing and controlling facts of the case before the court. That is to say, the injunction would continue "forever" if the facts and situation under which it was issued should continue unchanged "forever." But we have no such situation confronting us, as the word "forever" does not appear in the judgment in the instant case.

The appeal is without merit. The judgment is affirmed.

WALKER v. BACON.

Civ. 1237.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

June 16, 1933.

1. Automobiles ⇨181(1).

"Willful misconduct" warranting recovery by guest against automobile owner is intentionally doing something which driver should not do, or failing to do something which he could do in operation of motor vehicle under circumstances from which accident and injury to guest would be probable (St. 1931, p. 1693).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Willful Misconduct," see Words & Phrases.]

2. Automobiles ⇨244(20).

Willful misconduct of automobile driver may be inferred, in action for injuries to guest from circumstances surrounding accident (St. 1931, p. 1693).

3. Automobiles ⇨245(24).

In guest's action for injuries sustained when automobile ran into guard of cement culvert, automobile driver's willful misconduct held for jury.

4. Automobiles ⇨246(3).

In guest's action for injuries sustained in automobile accident, instructions defining willful misconduct, held erroneous as permitting recovery for gross negligence only (St. 1931, p. 1693).

Instructions stated, in substance, that for willful misconduct there must be an actual and conscious knowledge or its equivalent of peril to be apprehended and a like failure to act, and that such knowledge may be inferred from circumstances showing a reckless disregard for safety of others and a willingness to inflict injury complained of.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Action by Anne Walker against Albert Bacon. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Reversed.

Ray W. Hays and Wakefield & Hansen, all of Fresno, for appellant.

Frank Curran and Laurence B. Myers, both of Fresno, for respondent.

ANDREWS, Justice pro tem.

The essential facts developed on trial are: That both parties were employees of Fresno county, defendant a traffic officer, plaintiff a visiting nurse. Both had reason to go out of town on business connected with their work. Defendant invited plaintiff to ride with him and he would go first to the place he was to visit and then take her to the place she must go. The road at the place of the accident was paved with bitumen to the width of sixteen feet, with dirt shoulders two or three feet wide on each side, making the width about twenty-two feet in all. It is described as of old-fashioned construction, crowning in the center, and not very smooth. A cement culvert crossed under the road, on the end of which was some sort of cement guard, three feet high, into which the car ran, the track marks showing a sudden sharp deflection from its course into the cement culvert. Both parties were injured, and neither was able to tell what happened or what caused the car to leave the road. No other car was passing. Defendant was driving around sixty miles per hour, and plaintiff protested that it was too fast. The steering gear was worn and unsafe, of which defendant had been notified.

The decision to be arrived at depends upon the construction to be given the words "willful misconduct." Construed according to ordinary or popular definition, they would mean any act not conforming to right behavior, done purposely. This definition would describe most acts of negligence. For instance, reckless driving is wrong in law and as deportment, is done knowingly, but is only negligence. The history of the legislation culminating in limiting liability to acts of willful misconduct in guest cases gives evidence of a purpose to eliminate entirely the element of negligence as a basis of liability. The cases cited all agree that the Legislature intended by these words something other and different than negligence, whether ordinary or gross. The legislative sense of fair play seems to have been shocked by the perverted use of the law of negligence in guest cases to recover indirectly against insurance companies by suits against indifferent and irresponsible hosts; in some cases being a conspiracy between guest and host against the insurance carrier. The intent of the law as it stands must be derived from a construction so far technical that it does not embrace any meaning wherein negligence would be included, or the acts, if constituting negligence, must be subordinated to the idea of intent.

The cases quite generally use the word "intent" as pointing out the purpose of the law, the key with which to unlock its meaning. Willful misconduct refers to intentional acts; that is, acts designed to bring about the result involved in the suit. Some cases point out that the wrongful act complained of may be either positive or negative, one of commission or omission, but either or both must be intentional. In any definition of intent there is no room for any constructive knowledge because intent implies actual knowledge. Intent relates to a mental state or purpose, and there can be no direct testimony of the fact of its existence except on the part of the person who is charged with having the intent. The fact of its existence can be deduced from statements or conduct of the party in the light of surrounding circumstances or any motive or influence shown to exist.

The intent involved in the term "wrongful" is such intent as must be an element of most crimes, a deliberate purpose to accomplish the wrongful act complained of in the suit. Of course, such a conception of the purpose of the Legislature must recognize that practically no guest cases can be maintained at all, for rarely, if ever, would there be a case of intentional wrecking of a car by its owner or driver. Nevertheless, it is believed that this must be held to be what was intended by the enactment of the law, for there is no other logical stopping place. Any other construction which attempts to work out a basis of liability growing out of these words will end in permitting recovery on the basis of negligence, and is what leads to the confusion which exists. Therefore the rule should not be difficult to express. Willful misconduct would be an act done by the host with intent to cause the disaster involved in the suit with consequential damages to the guest, or the failure by the host to prevent the disaster, intending by such omission to permit the occurrence, with such injuries as would probably result therefrom to the guest.

The evidence in the instant case nowhere justifies a finding by the jury that defendant intended to cause the car to be wrecked with consequent injury. He may have been driving faster than was safe and did not cease to do so at plaintiff's request, and this may have been a contributing cause to her injuries, and he may have been warned that the steering gear was worn and dangerous, and he may have used bad judgment and have been negligent, but not a word of testimony or a circumstance connected with his conduct would lead to the inference that he deliberately caused or permitted the accident.

The other propositions advanced by appellant as errors are not considered or discussed; it being deemed best to rest the action taken by this court upon the view that the evidence does not support the judgment.

Judgment reversed.

MARKS, Justice (concurring).

I concur in the order reversing the judgment, but place my concurrence upon grounds other than those set forth in the foregoing opinion. In order to make my position clear, it is necessary to further review some of the facts of the case which are not particularly emphasized in the opinion of my associate.

The road over which appellant was driving just before the accident was not smooth. He described it as having a high center, and narrow, and with deep ditches on either side. He had been over the road many times. I quote from his testimony:

"Q. * * * Eliminating the question of duty and considering the question of the condition of that highway, would you drive in excess of 40 miles an hour, ordinarily over it? A. No.

"Q. And you would not because of the condition of the highway, isn't that a fact? A. Yes."

There is no evidence indicating that any duty required appellant to drive at a high rate of speed at the time of the accident.

Respondent testified that she became frightened at the rate of speed at which appellant was driving and saw that the speedometer was registering sixty miles an hour. She asked him not to drive so fast, but he increased his speed. She asked him again just before the accident not to drive so fast. Appellant testified that the speedometer registered about 10 per cent. slow.

Appellant's son testified:

That he had greased the car before the accident and that "the steering knuckle of the arm, from the steering column down, underneath the car, was very badly worn.

"Q. Is that steering knuckle— A. Yes, the piece that fits over it.

"Q. It was badly worn? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did you say anything to your father about that condition you observed? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did you tell him it was unsafe to drive his car? A. Yes.

"Q. Very well. How many times did you tell him, prior to March 15th? A. Twice that I remember of."

Numerous attempts have been made to define "willful misconduct" without any definitely satisfactory result. In Helme v. Great Western Milling Co., 43 Cal. App. 416, 185 P. 510, 512, it was said: "'Willful misconduct' means something different from and more than negligence, however gross." See, also, Howard v. Howard (Cal. App.) 22 P.(2d) 279, 281. It invites difficulties to conclude that "willful misconduct" is "something different" from negligence. If there is no negligence, there can be no willful misconduct, for, if there be no negligence, the driver of an automobile must be operating it in accordance with all the rules of the road and the dictates of prudence and caution. It is obvious that under such circumstances there could be no willful misconduct. It should be true that willful misconduct is "more than negligence, however gross."

[1, 2] Gross negligence has been defined as "the want of slight diligence," as 'an entire failure to exercise care, or the exercise of so slight a degree of care as to justify the belief that there was an indifference to the things and welfare of others,' and as 'that want of care which would raise a presumption of the conscious indifference to consequences.'" Howard v. Howard, supra; Krause v. Rarity, 210 Cal. 644, 293 P. 62, 77 A. L. R. 1327; 19 Cal. Jur. 554, and cases cited. When the Legislature in 1931 (St. 1931, p. 1693) omitted gross negligence from the grounds upon which a guest could recover damages against the owner, driver, or person responsible for the operation of the motor vehicle, it restricted the right of recovery to intoxication or willful misconduct. While negligence may be involved in willful misconduct, it is apparent that the Legislature intended to confine the right of recovery to a degree of carelessness and recklessness that is greater and beyond that which the law then knew and defined as gross negligence and which is "willful" on the part of the responsible person. While it is difficult to define that degree of carelessness which the Legislature must have had in mind, it is my opinion that it must be held that willful misconduct is willfully, that is, intentionally, doing something which a driver should not do, or failing to do something which he could do in the operation of a motor vehicle under circumstances from which an accident and injury to the passenger would be probable. Of course, willful misconduct may be inferred from the circumstances surrounding the accident.

[3] Taking into consideration the fact that appellant drove his automobile at a speed of at least sixty-six miles an hour over a high-crowned road that was not smooth when he knew the condition of the road did not justify a speed of more than forty miles an hour, and knowing further that his automobile had a very badly worn steering knuckle, it is my opinion that his conduct might have been willful misconduct, and that the jury was fully justified in drawing the conclusion that he was guilty of willful misconduct. This evidence, if believed, showed that he was intentionally doing something with a knowledge that serious injury would be a probable result to his passenger.

[4] The trial judge gave the following instructions to the jury in which the attempt was made to define "willful misconduct":

(a) "Plaintiff alleges that the defendant drove and operated his automobile at a high and dangerous rate of speed, and in such a careless and reckless manner, without regard to the safety of the plaintiff, that he caused the automobile to run into a concrete culvert on the edge of the highway, and that the carelessness, recklessness and willful misconduct of the defendant was the sole, direct and proximate cause of said accident and the injuries which plaintiff received. The defendant denies these allegations and it is upon the issues raised by the complaint and the answer that the case is submitted to the jury."

(b) "The burden is on the plaintiff to prove by preponderance of the evidence that the defendant was guilty of wilful misconduct in the operation of his vehicle at the time and place in question, and, likewise, to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the injuries received by plaintiff, if any, proximately resulted from the wilful misconduct of the defendant."

(c) "The word 'Wilfully' when applied to the intent with which an act is done or omitted, implies simply a purpose or willingness to commit the act, or make the omission referred to. It does not require any intent to violate law, or to injure another, or to acquire any advantage."

(d) "You are instructed that to constitute 'wilful misconduct' there must be actual knowledge, or that which in law is deemed to be the equivalent of actual knowledge, of the peril to be apprehended from the failure to act, coupled with a conscious failure to act to the end of averting injury."

(e) "In order to prove the requisite knowledge, it is not necessary for the evidence to show positively that the person was notified of the unsafe condition of the road or the automobile, but that it is sufficient if it appears that the circumstances surrounding the act of commissions or omissions are such as evinces a reckless disregard for the safety of others and a willingness to inflict the injury complained of."

(f) "If you believe from the evidence in the case that the defendant at the time and place referred to in plaintiff's complaint was guilty of 'wilful misconduct' in the operation of his automobile and that said 'wilful misconduct' directly and proximately resulted in and caused said automobile in which plaintiff was a passenger to run into a concrete culvert on the edge of the highway and be wrecked and if the wrecking of said automobile and the injuries plaintiff received thereby, if any, were caused directly and proximately by the 'wilful misconduct' of the defendant in the operation of his automobile, then I instruct you that plaintiff is entitled to recover against the defendant, Albert Bacon."

(g) "If you find that the defendant, Albert Bacon, at the time and place referred to in plaintiff's complaint, drove and operated his automobile with the knowledge of the peril of the unsafe condition of the road and with conscious indifference to consequences, then you are instructed that said defendant, Albert Bacon, was guilty of 'wilful misconduct' in the operation of his automobile."

Instructions which I have designated "b" and "f" seem to have been given on motion of the court. The other instructions were proposed by respondent and given with slight modifications in "a," "d," "e," and "g." There were no other instructions given on "willful misconduct."

These instructions would be proper in defining gross negligence. When the court told the jury that in "willful misconduct" there must be an actual and conscious knowledge or its equivalent of the peril to be apprehended and a like failure to act and that this knowledge may be inferred from circumstances showing "a reckless disregard for the safety of others and a willingness to inflict the injury complained of" it did no more than say that willful misconduct may be "an entire failure to exercise care or the exercise of so slight a degree of care as to justify the belief that there was an indifference to the things and welfare of others" and "that want of care which would raise a presumption of the conscious indifference to consequences" which constitutes gross negligence as defined in Krause v. Rarity, supra. It falls far short of applying the rule that "willful misconduct is wilfully, that is intentionally, doing something which a driver should not do, or failing to do something which he could do in the operation of a motor vehicle under circumstances from which an accident and injury to the passenger would be probable."

The quoted instructions permitted a recovery by respondent for gross negligence only. The implied finding of the jury might indicate a conclusion by that body that appellant was only guilty of gross negligence that did not amount to willful misconduct. Under these circumstances the judgment should not stand. A new trial should be had so that it may be determined in the court below whether the injury to respondent resulted from the willful misconduct of appellant.

The other error complained of, and probably a serious error, need not be considered here, as it need not occur at the next trial.

I concur: JENNINGS, Acting P. J.

O'KEEFE v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY.
Civ. 9186.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California.
June 30, 1933.

Executors and administrators ⇨216(2).

That former attorney for executor had sued executor to recover for services and that assignment of fees to executor had been made as security for payment of certain notes held not to prevent court having jurisdiction of estate from fixing value of attorney's fees.

Application by Anne O'Keefe for a writ of mandate to be directed to the Superior Court in and for Los Angeles County, to compel respondent to fix portion of attorney's fees payable from the estate of Michael Maher, deceased, to which applicant was entitled as attorney for executor of such estate.

Peremptory writ directed to issue.

Ralph C. Curren, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Avery M. Blount and William J. Clark, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

In course of administration of the estate of Michael Maher, deceased, the petitioner, Anne O'Keefe, was the attorney for the executor until March 10, 1932. At that time the administration was practically completed and was in a condition to be closed, except for the payment of an inheritance tax and the preparation of the final account and petition for distribution. At this point the attorney was discharged and another attorney substituted in her place. Later all taxes were paid, and executor's final account filed. Thereupon petitioner made application to the court to fix the portion of attorney fees payable from said estate to which she is entitled, determine the reasonable value of the extraordinary services rendered by her, and direct payment of said sums to petitioner.

When said matter came on for hearing, the court dismissed the petition without determining the merits of the same, said dismissal being made on the ground that the court is without jurisdiction to hear and determine said petition. The only reasons suggested in justification of such refusal to exercise such jurisdiction are that there was evidence that petitioner has filed in the municipal court an action against the executor James H. Maher, individually, to recover for legal services rendered to him, including the services rendered by her in course of administration of said estate, and the further fact of a purported written assignment by petitioner to James H. Maher of her said fee for services to the estate, such assignment purporting to have been made as security for the payment of certain notes.

Inasmuch as the court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of said application for allowance of said attorney fees, and inasmuch as such jurisdiction is in no wise affected by the pendency of said action in the municipal court, or by the said purported assignment of said notes, it is the clear duty of respondent court to proceed with the determination of said application upon its merits.

For the foregoing reason it has been ordered that the peremptory writ issue.

PEOPLE v. YOUNG et al.Cr. 252.District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

June 23, 1933.

Prostitution ☞1.

Female held chargeable as principal with offense of pimping, though opening statement of statute defining such offense recites "Any male person" committing acts therein prohibited should be guilty of felony (St. 1911, p. 10; Pen. Code, §§ 31, 261, 971, 1111).

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Arthur L. Mundo, Judge.

Earl Watson Young and June Young were charged with the offense of pimping. From a judgment dismissing the charge as to June Young, the People appeal.

Reversed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Thos. Whelan, Dist. Atty., and Frank Pomeranz, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of San Diego, for the People.

H. P. Sweet, of San Diego, for respondent.

ANDREWS, Justice pro tem.

The defendants having been arraigned upon the information, the defendant June Young entered a demurrer to the second count of the information. Her demurrer was sustained by the trial court and judgment entered dismissing her. The appeal here presented is by the people from that judgment. The crime involved is defined in the law as follows (Stats. 1911, p. 10): "Any male person who, knowing a female person to be a prostitute, shall live or derive support or maintenance, in whole or in part, * * * shall be guilty of a felony, to wit: pimping. * * *"

The question presented by the appeal is whether a female can be charged with this offense because the opening statement of the law is "Any male person." Penal Code, § 31, reads as follows: "All persons concerned in the commission of a crime * * * and whether they directly commit the act * * * or, not being present, have advised * * * its commission * * * are principals in any crime so committed." Penal Code, § 971, reads: "* * * and all persons concerned in the commission of a felony, whether they directly commit the act * * * or aid and abet in its commission, though not present, shall hereafter be prosecuted, tried, and punished as principals, and no other facts need be alleged in any indictment or information against such an accessory than are required in an indictment or information against his principal."

By these sections it is manifest that one who, not being the principal actor but who assists in the commission of a crime, although absent from the scene, is regarded as a principal and may be charged as such in the presentment without using any terms indicating the fact that such person was an accomplice. Penal Code, § 68, reads: "Every executive officer * * * who * * * receives * * * any bribe * * * is punishable" etc.

Under this section, it is held in People v. B. M. Anderson et al., 75 Cal. App. 365, 242 P. 906, that one not an executive officer can be convicted of the offense here charged in conjunction with the principal who has been guilty of the offense. In this case, reference is made to the distinction of principal and accomplice, although both are being prosecuted for the same offense by reason of sections 31 and 971, above cited.

Penal Code, § 261, reads: "Rape is an act of sexual intercourse, accomplished with a female not the wife of the perpetrator," etc. In People v. Bartol, 24 Cal. App. 659, 142 P. 510, it is held that information of this crime, brought the case under section 31 aforesaid, and the discussion in the opinion sets forth that while a woman could not be principal as that term is commonly understood, she could be convicted of the crime by proof of assisting in its commission. It should be noted that the clear inference in said section is that the crime set forth could only be committed by a male person, quite as clearly as if the language were explicit as in the crime involved in the case at bar.

The defendant cites the case of People v. Simpson, 79 Cal. App. 555, 250 P. 403, as one controlling in this case because it rests upon the question here involved. In that case the holding was made in the matter of corroboration of the testimony of a female accomplice.

Penal Code, § 1111, reads: "* * * An accomplice is hereby defined as one who is liable to prosecution for the identical offense charged against the defendant on trial in the cause in which the testimony of the accomplice is given." If the court in the case last cited had in mind the distinction recognized in the other decisions above cited, between principal and assistant, although charged in form with the same offense, it may have indicated that the word "identical" used in section 1111 was the basis for its holding and the summary disposition of the question. In that case, which involved the same crime here involved, in disposing of the question which is presented on the present appeal, the court used this language and no other: "It is here manifest that the witness Ruby Young could not be prosecuted for the crime of pimping."

It is evident that the question as here presented was not before that court. The trial court in this case may well have felt bound by that decision and relied upon it properly in sustaining the demurrer; but when the question is again presented to a court of review and there is no other expression upon this subject by other courts of review in this state, so that no rule has become settled, it seems appropriate that in this case further consideration should be given to the question.

The sections cited which make principals and accomplices subject to be prosecuted as principals and under the same wording or charge, so far as the form of the presentment is concerned, and the holdings that in case of an executive officer, one not an executive officer can be convicted, and in the case of rape a woman who assists can be convicted of that offense, seem to require a holding that a woman charged with the offense here involved, in connection with the charge against a male person of the offense, is properly charged and could be lawfully convicted on evidence that she assisted the principal.

The judgment of the lower court is reversed.

Appeals from Superior Court, San Luis Obispo County; T. A. Norton, Judge.

Separate actions by Ernest Harrington and by Ida Harrington against Luis Freddi and another, which were tried together. From judgments for plaintiffs, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Albert Nelson, of San Luis Obispo, and Thomas P. Weldon, of Santa Maria, for appellants.

Fred A. Shaeffer, of Santa Maria, for respondents.

YORK, Justice.

The plaintiffs Ernest and Ida Harrington are husband and wife, and upon stipulation their two actions against the defendants, which arose out of the same automobile accident, were tried at the same time before the same jury; said jury returning a separate verdict in favor of each plaintiff. From the judgments entered pursuant to said verdicts, the defendants appeal.

The accident occurred on the morning of April 23, 1931, on the state highway in the county of San Luis Obispo at a point south of the city of Arroyo Grande and north of the town of Nipomo, as the plaintiff Ernest Harrington, accompanied by his wife, Ida Harrington, was driving southerly on said highway in a Star car cut down and equipped for the conveyance of fish, and the defendant Prandini was driving northerly on said highway a truck loaded with cans of milk. The truck was going down a slight grade approaching a curve, and the Star car was approaching the same curve upgrade when the accident occurred and the plaintiffs were badly injured. The complaint in each case alleged that plaintiffs were injured as result of the careless and negligent operation of the truck by the defendant Prandini, as the agent of defendant Freddi, by whom he was employed. The answer in each case admitted the agency and the collision between the two motor vehicles, but denied the other material allegations of the complaint and alleged contributory negligence on the part of each plaintiff.

The appellants make twelve assignments of error: (1) The trial court erred in denying motion for nonsuit; (2 to 8, inclusive) the trial court erred in refusing to give certain instructions requested by defendants; (9) the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict; (10) the verdict is against law; (11) plaintiffs were guilty of contributory negligence; (12) the court erred in denying motion for a new trial.

[1, 2] Appellants maintain that the motion for nonsuit should have been granted for the reason that plaintiffs' Star car was being operated in an unlawful manner and that, therefore, they were guilty of contributory negligence; one of their contentions being that since the Star car was not equipped with a windshield wiper, plaintiffs were unable to see clearly through the windshield, and that if the Star car had been proceeding at a rate of speed that would have been reasonable at the time the driver thereof saw the truck, it could have been stopped in ample time to have avoided the collision. While it is true that the Star car was not equipped with a windshield wiper, the evidence clearly shows that Mrs. Harrington had wiped the windshield clean before passing Arroyo Grande and before the collision occurred, and further there is no evidence in the record which even tends to show that the plaintiffs were unable to see through the windshield at the time of the collision. Appellants further contend that since there was a curve in the road and the plaintiffs were unable to see two hundred feet ahead, they were violating the law in operating their car in excess of fifteen miles per hour. There is a conflict in the evidence as to whether the accident occurred on or approaching the curve in question, but at any rate, plaintiff Ernest Harrington testified that he was able to see ahead of his car for about 150 feet and defendant Prandini testified that he saw the Harrington car at least 160 yards before the accident. Furthermore, the jury was taken to the scene of the accident and were able to determine from observation on the ground just how far a person traveling on the highway could see around the curve in question. As was said in Badger v. City and County of San Francisco, 41 Cal. App. 571, 573, 182 P. 978: "In considering this proposition, [contributory negligence] it is necessary always to bear in mind that the jury has found to the contrary. In this case it not only returned a general verdict to that effect, but, in answer to a specific question, it declared that George H. Scott did not negligently drive upon the track. If there was any substantial evidence in support of this fact the verdict must stand, although the preponderance of the evidence may be against it." We believe this reasoning is applicable to the facts disclosed in the case before us, and that there was no error in denying the motion for nonsuit.

[3] We have carefully examined the instructions complained of—requested by defendant and refused by the trial court—and we are of the opinion that no prejudicial error was committed by the trial court in its refusal to give these instructions, in view of the fact that the court very fully instructed the jury as to the law and facts covered by the pleadings and proven in the case.

We find no merit in the last four points made by appellants.

The judgments appealed from are affirmed.

1. Appeal and error ⇨161.

2. Judgment ⇨768(1).

Appellant's creation of lien on respondent's realty by recording abstract of judgment appealed from provides security for enforcement of judgment if it becomes final on appeal (Civ. Code, § 2872; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 671, 674, as amended by St. 1927, pp. 829, 830, and § 1180).

3. Appeal and error ⇨164.

Appellant's action in causing abstract of judgment appealed from to be recorded held not ground for dismissal of appeal as attempt to enforce judgment or acceptance of fruits thereof (Code Civ. Proc. § 674, as amended by St. 1927, p. 830).

4. Appeal and error ⇨766.

Failure of interrogations, preceded by title "Statement of Questions Involved," on first page of appellant's brief, to conform strictly to requirements of court rule, held not to require dismissal of appeal (Rules for Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal, rule 8, § 2).

The interrogations implied that court erred in admitting certain testimony and denying motions for instructed verdict and judgment notwithstanding verdict and that jury erred in rendering verdict for unsatisfactory amount because it entirely disregarded certain instructions.

JENNINGS, Justice.

This is a motion by two defendants to dismiss plaintiff's appeal from the judgment. Two contentions are urged in support of the motion. The first of these contentions is that the plaintiff in whose favor the judgment was rendered has, subsequent to the institution of the appeal, taken affirmative action upon the judgment from which the appeal is prosecuted, thereby recognizing the validity of the judgment and consequently waiving his right to appeal. The second contention is that plaintiff's opening brief is fatally defective in that it fails to set forth on the first page thereof a statement of the question involved as required by section 2, rule VIII, of the Rules of the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal.

It appears from the record herein that the plaintiff instituted this action in the superior court of Orange county to recover from the defendants the sum of $5,000, together with interest and costs on a promissory note for the aforesaid amount alleged to have been executed by the defendants in favor of a third person who was alleged to have transferred the note to plaintiff prior to maturity for a valuable consideration. Defendants Bosch and Mott filed answers to plaintiff's complaint denying that plaintiff was a holder in due course of the note and further pleading as a separate defense to plaintiff's complaint that the defendants were induced to execute the note through fraudulent representations of the payee who later fraudulently conspired with plaintiff to transfer the note to him for nominal consideration. An additional defense alleged in the answers was failure of consideration.

The action was tried before a jury which returned a verdict in plaintiff's favor in the amount of $1,000. In conformity with the verdict thus returned, the judgment was duly entered. Plaintiff then moved the court for a new trial which was denied. Thereupon, plaintiff, being dissatisfied with the judgment, perfected an appeal to this court. After giving notice of appeal, plaintiff secured from the clerk of the court an abstract of the judgment and caused it to be recorded in the office of the county recorder of the county wherein the action was tried. Because of plaintiff's action in thus causing an abstract of the judgment to be recorded, it is contended that he accepted a benefit or advantage of the judgment and thereby waived his right to complain of it on appeal.

[1] There is no doubt that the rule is settled that an appellant may not accept the benefit of a judgment and at the same time assert his right to attack it. In re Estate of Shaver, 131 Cal. 219, 221, 63 P. 340; Storke v. Storke, 132 Cal. 349, 353, 64 P. 578; County of San Bernardino v. County of Riverside, 135 Cal. 618, 620, 67 P. 1047; First Nat. Bank

v. Wakefield, 138 Cal. 561, 562, 72 P. 151; Turner v. Markham, 152 Cal. 246, 247, 92 P. 485; In re Estate of Ayers, 175 Cal. 187, 190, 165 P. 528; Graham v. Alchian, 51 Cal. App. 263, 197 P. 134. The reason supporting this established legal principle is that the action of an appellant who voluntarily accepts the advantage afforded by a judgment and yet seeks to reverse it is fatally inconsistent. To this rule there is a clear exception that, where a reversal of the judgment cannot affect the right of the appellant to the benefit which he has taken, as, for example, where there is no controversy as to his right for the amount for which the judgment was given, but he claims to be entitled to a larger amount, he is not precluded from an appeal even though he has voluntarily accepted the amount awarded to him by the judgment. County of San Bernardino v. Riverside, supra; Walnut Irrigation Dist. v. Burke, 158 Cal. 165, 110 P. 517; In re Estate of Hubbell, 216 Cal. 574, 577, 15 P.(2d) 503; Guho v. City of San Diego, 124 Cal. App. 680, 682, 13 P.(2d) 387. The exception is not here applicable. The record shows that respondents by their answers to the complaint and by the evidence submitted on their behalf during the trial of the action denied that they were liable in any amount to appellant on account of the note which constituted the basis for appellant's right of action.

The contention of respondents on the motion to dismiss the appeal herein that appellant has taken affirmative action in support of the judgment with which he announces his dissatisfaction by his appeal therefrom is not devoid of merit. There is a species of inconsistency in appellant's action in this regard. Nevertheless, bearing in mind the desirability that appeals shall be considered on their merits, we may with propriety consider the effect of appellant's action in causing an abstract of the judgment to be recorded for the purpose of arriving at the conclusion whether or not he thereby brought himself within the operation of the aforementioned rule so that it must be declared that he waived his right of appeal from the judgment.

It must be conceded at the outset that appellant by his action secured nothing of tangible value. Certainly he derived no direct financial benefit. The only result which followed from the recordation of the judgment abstract was the creation of a judgment lien on any real property in Orange county owned by respondents or either of them at the time of recordation or which they might thereafter acquire during the time the lien continued in existence. If neither of them at the time of recordation owned any such property in the aforesaid county and if during the time the lien should continue neither should acquire any real property therein, obviously no benefit or advantage of any character can be said to have been derived. It may be observed that it is nowhere made to appear that either of the respondents owned any real property in Orange county. It may therefore be declared that, so far as appears, appellant derived no direct benefit by the recordation of the abstract. The only advantage that he may secure consists of a speculative benefit depending on the acquisition by either of the respondents of real property in Orange county during the time the judgment lien continues in existence.

[2] Furthermore, even if it be assumed that respondents owned real property in Orange county at the time the abstract of the judgment was recorded, appellant, by taking the affirmative action of causing the abstract to be recorded, derived no benefit other than the impressment on such real property of a judgment lien. The effect produced by the creation of such a lien is that some security is thereby provided for enforcement of the judgment should it become final on appeal. This must be true, since it is a distinctive characteristic of a lien that it makes the property to which it attaches security for the performance of an act. Section 2872, Civ. Code; section 1180, Code Civ. Proc.

Prior to 1927 (St. 1927, p. 829), section 671 of the Code of Civil Procedure provided that a judgment lien which would attach to real property of the judgment debtor in the county where the judgment was entered was created by the docketing of the judgment. The Legislature of California in that year amended the aforesaid section. Since its amendment the section reads as follows: "Entries in docket. Immediately after filing the judgment-roll, the clerk must make the proper entries of the judgment under appropriate heads, in the docket kept by him." In the same year (St. 1927, p. 830), the Legislature also amended section 674 of the Code of Civil Procedure to provide for the creation of a judgment lien upon real property of a judgment debtor in any county in the state by the recordation in such county of a certified abstract of a judgment rendered by any court of record of California, or of the United States. The effect produced by these amendments was therefore to eliminate the automatic creation of a judgment lien on real property of a judgment debtor in the county where the judgment is entered by the mere docketing of the judgment and to require the affirmative action of recordation of an abstract of the judgment in order to create a judgment lien which will attach to real property of a judgment debtor in such county.

[3] We entertain the opinion therefore that, although appellant's action in causing an abstract of the judgment to be recorded after he had announced his dissatisfaction with the judgment by initiating an appeal from it was inconsistent, nevertheless he should not, by reason of such inconsistent action, suffer the penalty of having his appeal dismissed. We make this declaration with due regard to the following language which is contained in the decision in Stetson v. Sheehan, 52 Cal. App. 353, at page 358, 200 P. 387, 390: "And it would seem that the only penalty which a plaintiff appealing from a money judgment in his favor might be put to in the event of his seeking to enforce said judgment pending his appeal would be that of having his appeal dismissed upon the ground that he had waived the same by accepting or seizing upon the benefits of said judgment."

With respect to the above-quoted language it may be observed, first, that it is dictum; and, second, that it is not applicable to the situation which exists in the instant case. So far as the record shows, appellant has proceeded no further in the enforcement of the judgment in his favor than to cause an abstract of it to be recorded. We think that it may not fairly be said that thereby he is "seeking to enforce" a judgment with which he has announced his dissatisfaction, but rather that he has simply taken the precaution to provide some security for the satisfaction of the judgment should it be affirmed on appeal. Certainly it cannot be successfully maintained that he has accepted "the fruits of the judgment," as this phrase is employed in numerous decisions hereinabove cited.

[4] The second contention of respondent urged in support of the motion to dismiss the appeal is that there is not set forth on the first page of appellant's opening brief a proper statement of the question involved on the appeal as required by section 2 of rule VIII of the Rules for the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal. Examination of the brief shows that the first page contains three interrogations preceded by the title, "Statement of Questions Involved." The first of the three interrogations refers to the court's action in admitting certain testimony and carries the implication that the court erred in permitting the testimony to be given. The second interrogation refers to the court's action in denying motions for an instructed verdict and for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, and carries the implication that the court's action in so doing constituted reversible error. The third interrogation refers to the amount for which the verdict was rendered, and carries the implication that the jury erred because it entirely disregarded certain instructions assertedly given by the court. It is our opinion that the so-called "Statement of Questions Involved," set forth on the first page of appellant's opening brief, does not strictly conform to the requirements of the above-mentioned rule. Nevertheless, it must be conceded that appellant made some effort to comply with the rule, and under the circumstances we do not feel impelled to impose upon him the harsh penalty of dismissal.

For the reasons stated, the motion of respondents to dismiss the appeal herein is denied.

DESMOND, Justice pro tem.

The plaintiff recovered a judgment in a jury-waived trial against both defendants in the sum of $3,500, assessed as damages for injuries sustained in an automobile collision. Both defendants have appealed, but no brief has been filed by defendant Barbe. Where hereinafter the term appellant is used, it refers to the other defendant, Ward. About 7:40 p. m. of July 30, 1929, plaintiff was riding in the rear seat of an automobile owned and operated by her son-in-law, the appellant Ward, who at that time was driving north on Berendo street near Beverly boulevard in the city of Los Angeles. Beverly boulevard is a main-traveled thoroughfare with boulevard stop signs throughout its course. The appellant brought his car to a full stop as he reached the southerly line of Beverly boulevard and observed traffic moving east and west along that street. According to his testimony, he saw more than one automobile coming from the west and a street car and at least one other automobile approaching from the east. He decided to enter the intersection between this traffic moving east and west, and, when he had reached the car tracks, came to a full stop; the street car in the meantime having passed his car on its westward course. Appellant put his hand out for a left turn, and, as his car stood upon the tracks, Barbe driving toward the east, struck the rear of the Ward car with his own auto, moving it in an easterly direction, and in this collision the plaintiffs suffered the injuries for which damages were awarded.

Appellant claims that the record does not as a matter of law disclose any evidence of negligence on his part. Respondent contends that the evidence justified the court in finding appellant was negligent in two particulars: First, in not waiting at the southerly curb line until all traffic with which he might collide had moved both east and west; next, in coming to an abrupt stop on the car tracks in approximately the middle of a street where traffic was moving in both directions. It may be noted here that Berendo street does not cross Beverly boulevard in a direct line; the northerly portion of that street being some 60 or 70 feet west of the southerly portion measured between the center lines of the street. The diagram of the locale also indicates that, when appellant stopped his car in Beverly boulevard, it stood in a diagonal position with the forward part pointing to the northwest across the northerly or west-bound car line; the rear portion being across the east-bound car line. Appellant testified that, when he stopped his car in that position, the street car had reached a point approximately 60 feet to the west. He also testified that at that instant the only other west-bound traffic was an automobile approximately 200 feet east of him traveling at a speed which he estimated at 30 miles per hour; further, that he remained stationary for about ten seconds. Under these circumstances, can it be said that there was no evidence to justify the finding that this appellant was negligent? We do not think so. The court may have concluded that conditions required the defendant not to stop his car, but, on the contrary, to make a short left-hand turn while traveling to the west on or near the west-bound tracks to a point at least opposite the northerly portion of Berendo street, if he intended going north, or to the west in the wake of the street car, if he intended going west.

Section 130 of the California Vehicle Act in force at the time of this accident, reads as follows (Stats. 1925, pp. 412, 413, § 15a):

"Sec. 130. Signals on turning. (a) The driver of any vehicle upon a public highway before starting, turning or stopping such vehicle shall first see that such movement can be made in safety, and if it can not be made in safety, shall wait until it can be made in safety; then, if the operation of any other vehicle may reasonably be affected by such movement, the driver shall give a signal plainly visible to the driver of such other vehicle of the intention to make such movement. Such signal may be given either by the use of the hand and arm in the manner hereinafter provided, or by means of a mechanical or electrical device which meets the requirements hereinafter set forth and which has been approved by the division of motor vehicles as hereinafter provided.

"Whenever the signal is given by means of the hand and arm, the driver shall indicate his intention to turn to the left by extending his hand and arm horizontally from and beyond the left side of the vehicle, his intention to turn to the right by extending his hand and arm upward and beyond the left side of the vehicle, and his intention to stop or to suddenly decrease speed by extending his hand and arm downward from and beyond the left side of the vehicle.

"The signal herein required to be given before turning to the right or left, whether given by means of the hand and arm or by means of an approved mechanical or electrical device, shall be given continuously during the last fifty feet traveled by the vehicle before turning."

In the instant case the appellant gave a signal with his left arm for a left turn and gave no signal for a stop. Possibly the other defendant, observing the signal for a turn and not for a stop, concluded that the Ward car would be off the southerly track in time for him to travel eastward without diminishing his speed, whereas, if he had seen a stop signal given by Ward, he might have thrown on his brakes and avoided a collision. If, instead of entering this boulevard at the time he did, appellant had waited for the traffic to clear, this accident would not have occurred. In view of what developed, we are not prepared to say that his failure to wait did not constitute additional evidence of negligence on his part.

Judgment affirmed.

Affirmed.

PARKER, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal by the defendants from a judgment, rendered upon a verdict of a jury, in favor of plaintiffs and against the defendants in an action to recover damages for and on account of injuries sustained by respondent Myrtle Coyne in an automobile collision.

No point is raised as to the sufficiency of the evidence, appellants conceding that there was a conflict and that there was sufficient evidence before the jury to sustain the verdict. No complaint is made as to the rulings of the trial court on the admission or rejection of evidence, nor is there any claim of contributory negligence urged. The sole question presented involves the giving of two instructions offered by respondents and the refusal of the court to give an instruction requested by appellants.

ing the last 100 feet of his approach to said intersection he does not have a clear and uninterrupted view of such intersection and of the traffic upon all the highways entering such intersection for a distance of 200 feet from such intersection. If you find from the evidence, therefore, that the view of the defendant, J. P. Whiffen, in approaching the intersection of La Brea avenue and Clinton street was obstructed within the meaning of the statute as above stated, and if you further find that in traversing the intersection said defendant, J. P. Whiffen, was then driving at a rate of speed in excess of fifteen miles, that said defendant was guilty of negligence, and if you further find that such negligence contributed directly and proximately to cause the collision between the automobile driven by said defendant and the automobile in which the plaintiff Myrtle Coyne was riding, and that as a direct result thereof the plaintiff, Myrtle Coyne, sustained injuries, then your verdict must be for the plaintiff and against the defendant." The instruction offered by appellants and refused by the court ties in with the argument on the one given, and we shall therefore consider the two together. The refused instruction reads: "Section 113 of the California Vehicle Act, in full force and effect at the time of the accident, in question, provided in part as follows: 'Restriction as to speed. (a) Any person driving a vehicle on the public highways of this state shall drive the same at a careful and prudent speed not greater than is reasonable and proper, having due regard to the traffic, surface and width of the highway, and no person shall drive any vehicle upon a public highway at such a speed as to injure the life, limb or property of any person.' Unless you find from a preponderance of the evidence that the defendants were violating the provisions of said section of the California Vehicle Act, you cannot find their speed to have been a negligent one."

The point of the argument is that section 113 (a) of the California Vehicle Act controls all speed limits of the statute; that there is no definite speed set forth in the statute that will of itself be a violation of the law unless coming within the terms of section 113 (a). In other words, the contention is that a speed in excess of that made lawful by the statute is no more than prima facie evidence of negligence, and not in itself to be declared negligence as a matter of law or negligence per se. Appellants frankly concede that the uniform holding of the Supreme Court and Appellate Court of this state is to the contrary. Notwithstanding this concession it is urged that the prior decisions failed to give full consideration to the question from the viewpoint of appellants herein. We cannot now abandon all precedent and follow a new trail. It is possible that appellants may convince the Supreme Court, and we are frank to state that the argument presented at once appeals to reason and everyday conditions of automobile traffic. We note this, however: The correction of alleged conditions might well be brought to the attention of the Legislature and provision made to cover the situations detailed as existing. In complete answer to the contention made we merely cite the following cases: Hayes v. Emerson, 110 Cal. App. 470, 294 P. 765; Havens v. Loebel, 103 Cal. App. 209, 284 P. 676; Benjamin v. Noonan, 207 Cal. 279, 277 P. 1045. This same point was passed upon by this court in Thompson, Adm'x v. Dentman et al. (Cal. App.) 21 P.(2d) 1009.

[2] Appellants next complain of an instruction given as follows: "The statutes of the state of California provide that the driver of any vehicle upon a public highway before turning such vehicle shall first see that such movement can be made in safety, and if it cannot be made in safety, shall wait until it can be made in safety; that if the operation of any other vehicle can reasonably be affected by such movement, the driver shall give a signal plainly visible to the driver of such other vehicle of the intention to make such movement. Such signal may be given either by the use of the hand and arm or by means of a mechanical or electrical device which meets the requirements of the statute and which has been approved by the division of motor vehicles. Whenever the signal is given by means of the hand and arm the driver shall indicate his intention to turn to the left by extending his hand and arm horizontally from and beyond the left side of the vehicle. The signal to be given before turning as herein provided, shall be given continuously during the last fifty feet traveled by the vehicle before turning. Therefore, where two vehicles are traveling in the same direction on the same street, one in the rear of the other, it is the duty of the driver of the rear car to exercise reasonable care with respect to the forward car, and if the driver of the forward car indicates by the proper signal as defined by the statute, his intention of turning to the left, it is the duty of the driver of the rear car to yield him that right."

It is of the last portion of this instruction that appellants complain, and we see no merit in the complaint. The purpose of the signal is to warn the rear driver of the intention to turn, and when this signal is given at the proper distance it surely must be for same purpose recognized to be accomplished if the legal mode is followed. The instruction places upon the driver of the rear car the duty of reasonable care, and that is always the duty of a motorist, whether ahead or behind. It would seem highly illogical to require the driver of the forward car to give a signal and continue the same for a distance of fifty feet before the turn and then hold that the driver of a car in the rear was under no duty to heed that signal. As a matter of commonplace the signal is intended solely to warn the rear car. Without further discussion, attention may be called to the following cases: Hanson v. Cardoza, 106 Cal. App. 500, 290 P. 62; Barton v. Studebaker Corporation, 46 Cal. App. 707, 189 P. 1025.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, of Los Angeles (Robert E. Paradise, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondents.

Mr. Justice R. L. THOMPSON delivered the opinion of the court.

The plaintiffs have appealed from a judgment which was rendered against them pursuant to an order sustaining without leave to amend, a demurrer to the second amended complaint. The complaint contains three causes of action, each of which is based upon fraud alleged to have been exercised incident to the procuring of an exchange of properties. The first two counts charge fraud in securing the execution of the instruments of conveyance and the complaint prays for rescission of the documents together with damages. The third cause alleges fraud in the foreclosure of a trust deed which was executed to secure a part of the purchase price of the real property received by the plaintiffs in the exchange, and asks for a cancellation of the judgment which was accordingly entered, together with damages.

The respondents contend that the complaint fails to state a cause of action, and that it is not susceptible of amendment, because it appears the plaintiffs were guilty of laches for failure to commence their suit within five years from the time of the alleged perpetration of fraud, and that the third cause constitutes a collateral attack upon a foreclosure judgment based upon acts which merely amount to intrinsic fraud.

Upon the contrary, the appellants assert their action is not barred under the provisions of section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure until three years have elapsed from the date of the discovery of the fraud which they have alleged occurred within that period of time. It is further claimed the court abused its discretion in sustaining the demurrer without leave to amend the pleading.

The complaint alleges that the transaction of exchange of properties which is the basis for this suit for rescission occurred February 17, 1925, and that the fraud was not discovered by the plaintiffs until September 1, 1927. The original complaint was filed July 24, 1930. The only specifications of fraud which are recited in the first two counts are that the defendants misrepresented the value of the property which they conveyed to plaintiffs; that they wrongfully represented the property was connected with the municipal sewer system; and that they agreed to repair the roof of the building which is situated on the premises. With respect to the discovery of the alleged fraud the complaint merely alleges "that on or about the 1st day of September, 1927, plaintiffs ascertained the falsity of said representations and because of the same, plaintiffs caused a grant deed of said lot 3 duly executed by them to be delivered to the defendants."

[1] Assuming, without so deciding, that the allegations of the complaint, except for the statute of limitations, state a good cause of action based upon fraudulent representations to warrant rescission, no facts are recited which will have the effect of tolling the statute so as to prevent the barring of the cause of action for more than three years after the alleged fraud was perpetrated. It is true, under the provisions of section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure, that "an action for relief on the ground of fraud or mistake" must be commenced "within three years," but that "the cause of action in such case [is] not to be deemed to have accrued until the discovery, by the aggrieved party, of the facts constituting the fraud or mistake."

The complaint fails to state a complete cause of action for the reason that it appears the suit was not commenced within three years from the time of the alleged perpetration of fraud and no facts or circumstances are recited from which the court may determine that the plaintiffs failed to actually discover the misrepresentations until a later date. All that the pleading alleges in that regard is "that on or about the 1st day of September, 1927, plaintiffs ascertained the falsity of said representations." No excuse for this failure is alleged. This is clearly inadequate. In the case of Consolidated R. & P. Co. v. Scarborough, 216 Cal. 698, 16 P. (2d) 268, 269, which was a case in all essential respects exactly like the one at bar, the Supreme Court said: "It is not enough that the plaintiff merely avers that he was ignorant of the facts at the time of their occurrence, and has not been informed of them until within the three years. He must show that the acts of fraud were committed under such circumstances that he would not be presumed to have any knowledge of them,—as that they were done in secret, or were kept concealed; and he must also show the times and the circumstances under which the facts constituting the fraud were brought to his knowledge, so that the court may determine whether the discovery of these facts was within the time alleged."

Many cases are therein cited which uphold the requirement to specifically recite facts in the complaint which will enable the court to determine as a matter of law whether the case is barred by the statute of limitations. Quoting with approval from the case of Galusha v. Fraser, 178 Cal. 653, 657, 174 P. 311, the Supreme Court said in the cause previously cited:

"Where the plaintiff sues for relief on the ground of fraud, and seeks exemption from the three-year period of limitation for the reason that he did not discover the fraud until after it was perpetrated, he must not only show (1) that he did not discover the fraud until within the three years next before the action was begun, and (2) that the fraud was committed under such circumstances that he would not be presumed to have had knowledge of it at the time, but (3) he must also set forth the times and circumstances under which the facts constituting the fraud came to his knowledge, so that the court may determine from the allegations of the complaint whether the discovery was within that period."

Far from averring facts in the complaint in this action tending to rebut the presumption that the plaintiffs had full knowledge of the actual value of the property and that it was not connected with the sewer system, they alleged that "plaintiffs entered into occupation of said Lot 3, Block 36, Tract 5609, on or about July 1, 1925." It seems unreasonable to assume that owners could occupy their city property for more than two years without discovering its value or the fact that it was not connected with the sewer.

[2] Subsequent to the filing of defendants' demurrer to the second amended complaint, the plaintiffs filed a document termed "Answer to Demurrer to Second Amended Complaint." This document contains arguments upholding the sufficiency of the allegations of the second amended complaint, together with a citation of numerous authorities. It is primarily in the form of an answer. It is now asserted this so-called answer to the demurrer contains additional allegations of facts and circumstances which supply the deficiencies of the complaint so as to render it adequate to meet the requirements necessary to toll the statute of limitations until the alleged discovery of the fraud. We find no such statements of fact. It may not be said to be an amendment to the amended complaint. No leave was asked or granted to file such an amendment. Moreover, there is no such pleading known to the California procedure as an answer to a demurrer. That document had no legal bearing on the pleadings in this suit, and contains no statements which would affect the determination of this appeal.

[3, 4] The third cause of action is based upon alleged fraud of the defendants in instituting a suit in equity and recovering a judgment by default against the plaintiffs for a deficiency indebtedness after the foreclosure sale of the property under the provisions of their trust deed which was executed to secure the balance of the purchase price of the property. No facts are stated to indicate that the parties were not duly served with process in that action or that the court was without jurisdiction to render the judgment. This count of the complaint states facts only which constitute mere intrinsic fraud. This is a collateral attack upon the judgment. The procuring of a judgment by mere intrinsic fraud will not justify a court in setting it aside. The only grounds upon which the judgment of a court may be vacated and set aside is that the court lacked jurisdiction to render the judgment, or that it was procured by extrinsic fraud. Hanley v. Hanley, 114 Cal. 690, 46 P. 736, 737; Pico v. Cohn, 91 Cal. 129, 133, 25 P. 970, 27 P. 537, 13 L. R. A. 336, 25 Am. St. Rep. 159; Hendricks v. Hendricks, 216 Cal. 321, 14 P. (2d) 83; 1 Freeman on Judgments (5th Ed.) 661, § 331. It is not claimed in this action that the defendants were guilty of conduct in the suit in which the default judgment was rendered which prevented them from having their day in court or which deprived them of a fair and an impartial trial. All that is asserted is that "defendants brought action claiming deficiency of $2,025.85 * * * in the superior court of the State of California, in and for the County of Los Angeles, and fraudulently by wilfully concealing from the court the terms of said contract referred to in paragraph VII of the above first cause of action obtained a default judgment against plaintiffs and issued an execution thereon against the business which was then owned by the plaintiffs. * * *"

[5] This is inadequate to state a cause of action based on extrinsic fraud. It was held in the case of Hanley v. Hanley, supra, that "it is settled beyond controversy that a decree will not be vacated merely because it was obtained by forged documents or perjured testimony." Such conduct is declared to be intrinsic fraud as distinguished from extrinsic fraud, which alone will justify a court in holding that a judgment is void.

[6] It is immaterial that the judgment which is assailed was procured by default. The defendants in that action had an opportunity to appear and protect their interest. They deliberately waived the right to their day in court by failing to appear and answer the complaint. A default judgment is an estoppel as to all issues necessarily litigated therein and determined thereby exactly like any other judgment provided the court acquired jurisdiction of the parties and subject-matter involved in the suit. Hutchings v. Ebeler & Trout, 46 Cal. 557; Strong v. Shatto, 201 Cal. 555, 258 P. 71; 3 Freeman on Judgments, (5th Ed.) 2690, § 1296.

[7] The court did not abuse its discretion by sustaining the demurrer without leave to amend the second amended complaint. The plaintiffs had two opportunities to amend their original complaint so as to set out the necessary facts to constitute a good cause of action, and they failed to do so. The fact that a demurrer is sustained without leave to amend the complaint does not constitute an abuse of discretion in the absence of a request for permission to amend the pleading. Consolidated R. & P. Co. v. Scarborough, supra; Haddad v. McDowell, 213 Cal. 690, 3 P.(2d) 550; 22 Cal. Jur. 119, § 77. No application to amend the second amended complaint was requested by the plaintiffs after the demurrer thereto was sustained.

The judgment is affirmed.

WESTERN LOAN & BUILDING CO. v.
SCHEIB et al.
L. A. 12305.

Supreme Court of California.

June 26, 1933.

1. Mortgages ⇐145, 151(3).

Mortgage, recorded April 8, 1927, did not attach until note, signed by mortgagor December 27, 1926, and left in possession of mortgagor's agent, was delivered to mortgagee May 27, 1927, and was not prior to mechanic's lien attaching April 13, 1927.

2. Mortgages ⇐69.

Delivery of note by mortgagor to his agent was not delivery to or for benefit of mortgagee.

3. Principal and agent ⇐23(1).

In mortgage foreclosure action, evidence showed one applying for mortgage loan acted solely as mortgagor's agent, so that his possession of note until certain date was mortgagor's possession.

4. Mortgages ⇐151(3).

More recording of mortgage before note was delivered to mortgagee could not give mortgage priority over mechanic's liens attaching between recording of mortgage and delivery of note.

5. Mortgages ⇐1.

"Mortgage" is merely security for debt, and if there is no debt there is no mortgage.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Mortgage," see Words & Phrases.]

6. Mortgages ⇐145.

Mortgage recorded April 8, 1927, came into existence as lien on May 27, 1927, when debt came into existence on delivery of mortgage note to mortgagee.

PRESTON and CURTIS, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Henry M. Willis, Judge.

Action by Western Loan & Building Company against Charles A. Scheib and others. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Bicksler, Smith, Parke & Catlin, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Miller & Ellis, James E. Mahon, Earle M. Daniels, Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, and Glen Behymer, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

Plaintiff appeals from a judgment of the trial court decreeing that the mechanics' liens of respondents have priority over the mortgage lien of plaintiff. It is admitted that each of the mechanics' liens held by the several respondents became a lien on the real property on April 13, 1927, and that respondents have duly and properly taken all steps required by law for the enforcement of their respective liens. The sole question presented for determination on this appeal is the priority between the mortgage lien held by appellant and the mechanics' liens held by respondents.

The facts giving rise to this appeal, as found by the trial court and concerning which, except as hereinafter indicated, there is no dispute, are as follows:

In November of 1926 defendant Charles A. Scheib, the owner of certain real property in the city of Los Angeles, made a written application to the appellant for a building loan of $55,000, to be secured by a mortgage. This application for a loan was not made by Scheib personally, but was made through one S. E. Beach; the latter acting as agent of Scheib for this purpose. Scheib agreed to pay Beach a commission for his services if the loan was secured. It should here be stated that all of the negotiations between Beach, as agent of Scheib, and the appellant, were carried on by mail; the main office of appellant being located in Salt Lake City, Utah.

On December 6, 1926, the appellant wrote to Beach, as the agent of Scheib, informing him that the executive finance committee had approved the application for the loan, and setting forth the terms and conditions on which the money would be advanced. On December 7, 1926, the appellant forwarded to Beach, as agent of Scheib, a form mortgage and promissory note which, it was stated, were to be signed by Scheib, the mortgage recorded and the documents, together with a title report and other information, returned to appellant at Salt Lake City. On December 27, 1926, Scheib signed the note, and signed and acknowledged the mortgage, and left them with S. E. Beach, his agent, to be recorded and forwarded to appellant. S. E. Beach, as agent of Scheib, through his son, W. E. Beach, and pursuant to appellant's request, delivered the mortgage (but not the note) to an escrow agent with instructions to record when a title insurance policy was furnished showing the mortgage to be a first lien. On April 8, 1927, the escrow agent had the mortgage duly and properly recorded. The county recorder mailed the recorded mortgage to appellant at Salt Lake City, he having received no instructions to the contrary, and the name of appellant appearing thereon, but the evidence sustains the view that this was probably not the intent of the parties, the intent being that the recorded mortgage should have been mailed back to the escrow agent or to Beach. All during this period Beach had the promissory note in his possession as the agent of Scheib. The note was not delivered with the mortgage on April 8, 1927. On April 13, 1927, it is admitted, the mechanics' liens of respondents attached. On May 27, 1927, appellant wrote to Beach, as the agent of Scheib, as follows:

"Under date of May 16th we wrote you relative to closing the above application. Since that time we have heard nothing from you concerning the same.

"If we do not hear from you within the next ten days we will take it for granted the application will not be completed and we will cancel it from our records."

On the same day, May 27, 1927, Beach mailed the note to appellant.

Subsequent to receiving the promissory note, and starting on May 31, 1927, appellant advanced various sums to Scheib in installments, totaling $42,500. The final installment of $12,500 was not advanced because Scheib failed to complete the building as agreed. Scheib defaulted in his payments to appellant, whereupon the latter instituted this action to foreclose its mortgage, joining as defendants all parties having any record interest in the property. All defendants defaulted except the respondents.

From the above facts the trial court concluded, as a matter of law, that although appellant's mortgage was recorded on April 8, 1927, and respondents' liens did not attach until April 13, 1927, the mechanics' liens were entitled to priority over the mortgage for the reason "that prior to the actual delivery of said note to plaintiff on May 27, 1927, no indebtedness existed in favor of plaintiff for which the mortgage recorded April 8, 1927, in favor of plaintiff as mortgagee, could act as security, and plaintiff's mortgage lien * * * attached on the 27th day of May, 1927, and not prior thereto."

[1] The sole question presented on this appeal is: When did appellant's mortgage lien attach as against respondents? Did it attach as of April 8, 1927, when the mortgage was recorded, or did it attach on May 27, 1927, when the promissory note was physically delivered? The proper answer to this question can only be determined upon ascertaining when the indebtedness between Scheib and appellant came into existence. The trial court found that this indebtedness came into existence on May 27, 1927, and not before. Under the facts, as above outlined, we are clearly of the opinion that this conclusion was correct. The problem is simply one of offer and acceptance of a contract. The appellant in December of 1926 made an offer to Scheib, through Scheib's agent Beach, to make the loan providing that Scheib executed and delivered to appellant a promissory note and mortgage, and performed certain other conditions. Until the offer was accepted by the performing of the required acts no binding obligation on the part of appellant to advance the money came into existence. In other words, no indebtedness was created until the offer was accepted. Scheib performed some of the required acts. He signed the note and mortgage, and through his agent caused the mortgage to be recorded and delivered to appellant. Title insurance was secured and other conditions performed. But the last act necessary to complete the acceptance—i. e., delivery of the promissory note evidencing the indebtedness—was not performed. Until the note was delivered the offer of appellant to make the loan had not been accepted, and no indebtedness was created until that time. Appellant itself placed this interpretation upon the transaction. This is made clear by the letter from appellant to Beach, as agent of Scheib, of May 27, 1927, above quoted, in which it is stated that appellant has heard nothing further concerning "closing the above application," and "if we do not hear from you within the next ten days we will take it for granted the application will not be completed and we will cancel it from our records." The only reasonable interpretation of that letter is that at the time it was written (May 27, 1927), the appellant itself did not consider that any binding contract to advance the money had been entered into; that appellant considered that its offer to make the loan had not been accepted; that unless it was accepted within ten days by sending the note the application for the loan would be canceled.

[2] Appellant seeks to avoid the application of the above reasoning to this case by the contention that Beach was acting as its agent for the purpose of accepting delivery of the note and mortgage, and that therefore the note was delivered to appellant on December 27, 1926, when Scheib signed it and left it in the possession of Beach. Of course, if Beach was in fact the agent of appellant for the purpose of accepting delivery of the note, it would be clear that the offer to make the loan was accepted on December 27, 1926. It is well settled that delivery of a contract by one of the contracting parties to a third person for the benefit of the other contracting party constitutes a good delivery. Carr v. Howell, 154 Cal. 372, 97 P. 885; Kelly v. Woolsey, 177 Cal. 325, 170 P. 837. But the rule enunciated in those cases has no application to the facts of this case. For that rule to apply there must be a delivery to the third party for the benefit of the other contracting party. Here the trial court expressly found that Beach at all times was acting solely and exclusively as the agent of Scheib, and at no time was he acting as the agent of appellant. If these findings are supported by the evidence it necessarily follows that while the note was in the possession of Beach solely and exclusively as the agent of Scheib, the possession of Beach must be considered the possession of Scheib, and the note was not delivered until May 27, 1927.

[3] Appellant contends that the above findings are not supported by the evidence; that the evidence shows that Beach was the agent of appellant for the purpose of securing the execution and delivery of the note and mortgage; that the finding of the trial court that Scheib left the note and mortgage in the possession of Beach and that they were "left by him in the possession of S. E. Beach to be recorded and forwarded to plaintiff" is inconsistent with the finding that Beach was acting solely and exclusively as the agent of Scheib. After reading the record we are clearly of the opinion that the findings of the trial court that Beach at all times during this transaction was acting solely and exclusively as the agent of Scheib and at no time was acting as the agent of appellant are amply supported by the evidence.

V. R. Marsden, manager and vice president of the appellant, testified that: "This loan was negotiated by S. E. Beach. He acted in the capacity of a broker. He was not a broker for the plaintiff company. He has no connection with our company and never did have any connection with our company. He was never authorized to use our name on his office as our legal representative or as agent on behalf of our company at any time." He was then asked:

"And you know that Mr. Beach had no connection whatsoever with this company in regard to this loan? A. Well, I don't say that.

"Q. Other than as broker for someone else? A. Yes, sir."

Marsden further testified: "I know W. E. Beach. He is the son of S. E. Beach. He has no connection with our company. * * * S. E. Beach had nothing to do with these transactions. The only thing with any of these loans that Mr. Beach had anything to do with our company was merely as broker for the applicant."

In addition to this testimony of the manager and vice president of appellant there was introduced into evidence the application for a loan made by Scheib through Beach. This application was a regular form application furnished by appellant to prospective borrowers. This form, which was signed and acknowledged by Scheib, contains the following provision: "Charles A. Scheib, being first duly sworn, deposes and says: That I understand and agree that if this application is made by me, through any person, or by any means except by direct communication to the home office of the company at Salt Lake City, Utah, that the person I deal with is not the agent of the Western Loan & Building Company, but is My Agent."

Mr. Charles A. Scheib testified that "Mr. S. E. Beach was my agent. I asked him to act as my agent when I applied for the loan. * * * I signed the affidavit [above quoted] * * * being a statement that the agent making the application is the agent of the borrower and not the agent of the Western Loan & Building Company."

S. E. Beach testified that: "I am in no manner connected with the plaintiff Western Loan & Building Company and never have been in any way only as to sending in applications for loans. I never had any connection with the plaintiff whereby I represented them in any capacity. W. E. Beach is my son. To my knowledge he has never represented plaintiff in any capacity." Beach was then asked for whom he was acting when he caused the mortgage to be recorded and replied:

"Mr. Scheib. Q. You were acting for Mr. Scheib when you caused this mortgage in which he is mortgagor [to be recorded], for Mr. Scheib? A. Yes.

"Q. Is that correct? A. Yes, sir; he was the mortgagor and I acted for Mr. Scheib."

In the face of this testimony by the agent, S. E. Beach, by the principal, Scheib, and by the appellant's vice president and manager, all to the effect that Beach was acting solely and exclusively as the agent of Scheib, and at no time, for any purpose, was the agent of the Western Loan & Building Company, we must hold that the findings complained of not only are supported by substantial evidence, but are supported by the overwhelming weight of the evidence. Since this is so, it follows, as already stated, that while the note was in the possession of Beach, as agent for Scheib, it must necessarily be considered as still within the possession of Scheib. It follows, therefore, that no delivery of the note took place until May 27, 1927, long after the mechanics' liens of respondents had become a lien on the real property involved.

[4-6] Of course, since the trial court held, on substantial evidence, that no debt was incurred until May 27, 1927, the mere recording of the mortgage on April 8, 1927, could in no way give the mortgage priority over the liens of respondents. A mortgage is merely security for a debt, and if there is no debt there is no mortgage. 17 Cal. Jur. § 17, p. 710; § 161, p. 873. Since the debt did not come into existence until May 27, 1927, the mortgage as a lien came into existence at that time. The liens of respondents dating as they do from April 13, 1927, clearly are, therefore, entitled to priority over the mortgage.

The question of priority of liens must in practically every case be controlled by a strict application of the rather technical procedure regulating the priority of lien claimants.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

PRESTON, Justice (dissenting).

I am not in accord with the opinion as written in this cause. Under the undisputed evidence and under the findings of the court below, Scheib executed the note and mortgage and delivered them to Beach to be transmitted to plaintiff. There were no conditions or reservations made by Scheib at the time of such delivery. The facts are that on December 7, 1926, plaintiff wrote Beach, the broker in the transaction, and among other things sent him a copy of the note and mortgage with instructions as follows: "Kindly have papers properly executed, recorded and abstracted * * * after which return to this office. * * *" The court finds that on December 27, 1926, defendant Scheib signed the note and signed and acknowledged the mortgage and then finds as follows: "That said note and mortgage, after the same were signed by Charles A. Scheib, were left by him in the possession of S. E. Beach to be recorded and forwarded to plaintiff." The further finding is that Beach thereafter, through his son W. E. Beach, delivered the mortgage in escrow to the Guarantee Building & Loan Association of Hollywood; that in so leaving the mortgage in escrow, young Beach signed himself as the representative of the plaintiff and the escrow party secured the certificate of title, bringing it up to April 8, 1927. The mortgage was also recorded on the same day, and actually forwarded thereafter to the plaintiff.

Inasmuch as the certificate of title was procured and the mortgage recorded, the transaction was complete. Whether the plaintiff received the manual tradition of the papers on that day or six months thereafter, on that day the constructive delivery under section 1059 of the Civil Code took place and the authorities cited in appellant's brief apply, such as Carr v. Howell, 154 Cal. 372, 97 P. 885; Kelly v. Woolsey, 177 Cal. 325, 170 P. 837. Indeed, the following language of Valley Lumber Company v. Wright, 2 Cal. App. 288, 84 P. 58, 59, is directly in point: "Here the note and mortgage were executed for a definite amount, and there was an agreement on the part of the loan association to pay to Wright this amount, with the further understanding that the money should be used for the construction of the building, which latter was to be for the further security of the loan. The loan association was under an enforceable obligation to furnish this money, and the execution of the note and mortgage was sufficient consideration for the agreement."

A kindred line of cases also includes Stone v. Daily, 181 Cal. 571, 185 P. 665, and Hotaling v. Hotaling, 193 Cal. 368, 224 P. 455, 56 A. L. R. 734. In each of them a deed, after execution and symbolical delivery, was actually left with the grantor himself and the delivery was held proper. In this case if Scheib himself had gone to the title company and procured the certificate and caused the mortgage to be recorded, there would have been a delivery of both the note and the mortgage on the happening of this event, even though they had remained physically in the possession of Scheib.

I think the judgment in this cause is clearly wrong and should be reversed.

CHILCOTE v. SAN BERNARDINO COUNTY.

L. A. 14087.

Supreme Court of California.

June 29, 1933.

1. Automobiles ⇨187.

To be in "operation" within statute rendering county liable for injuries from negligent "operation of county motor vehicle by county employees," vehicle must be in active exercise of some specific function by performing work or producing effects at time and place injury is inflicted (St. 1923, p. 675; Civ. Code §§ 1714¼, 1714½).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Operation," see Words & Phrases.]

2. Automobiles ⇨260.

Motorcyclist's death from encountering pools of oil spread on highway by county's oil trucks held not due to "operation of county motor vehicles by county employees," so as to render county liable (St. 1923, p. 675; Civ. Code §§ 1714¼, 1714½).

Swing & Swing, all of San Bernardino, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice.

Ameliorating to some extent the rigor of the common-law rule that a public corporation exercising sovereign power may not be held liable for the torts of its officers and servants, the California Legislature in 1923 (St. 1923, c. 328, p. 675) enacted a law permitting such actions against counties, municipalities, and school districts, where the injuries complained of resulted from defective conditions in streets, highways, buildings, and grounds, where the governing board of such entity had knowledge or notice of such defective condition.

Later, in 1931, the Legislature, by section 1714½ of the Civil Code, extended the doctrine by adding other classes thereto and by providing a right of action for damages for injury to person or property, or death, where such damage resulted from the negligent operation of a motor vehicle by an officer, agent, or employee of such corporation. So much of the statute as is here involved reads: "Hereafter * * * every county * * * owning any motor vehicle shall be responsible to every person who sustains any damage by reason of death, or injury to person or property as the result of the negligent operation of any said motor vehicle by any officer, agent, or employee or as the result of the negligent operation of any other motor vehicle by any officer, agent or employee when acting within the scope of his office, agency or employment. * * *"

[1] It seems clear, when we view these two enactments along with the provisions of related legislation, such as section 1714¼ of the Civil Code, that it was the intention of the Legislature to use the word "operation" in its popular and ordinary sense as applied to motor vehicles. That is, to be in operation, the vehicle must be in a "state of being at work" or "in the active exercise of some specific function" by performing work or producing effects at the time and place the injury is inflicted. Moreover, to sustain plaintiff in his contention would be to interpret these two enactments as overlapping. For then in some instances, to fasten liability on the municipality, notice of the defective highway would be required, while in other instances liability would be fixed without notice of any kind.

[2] In the cause before us judgment on the pleadings was given for the defendant and plaintiff has appealed. The basic facts alleged are that plaintiff's minor son, while riding on a motor vehicle on the public highway, leading through the city of San Bernardino to Lake Arrowhead, encountered on the highway large pools of oil, spread over a large area thereof, and as a result of encountering this condition, the minor was thrown from the motor vehicle violently to the ground and received injuries which resulted in his death on the same day. Supplementing these facts are allegations that the condition of the highway was due to the negligent operation of motor oil trucks by servants of said county of San Bernardino. The injury under these allegations was primarily based upon the condition of the highway and whether or not it was brought about by the negligence of the servants of the county is not the controlling factor in the situation. Therefore, in view of the construction we have placed on the word "operation" in the statute, the complaint fails to state a cause of action.

The judgment is affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., James S. Howle, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Buron Fitts, Dist. Atty., and Clarence S. Hunt, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for the People.

PER CURIAM.

Defendants were convicted of the crime of burglary under five counts, and the crime of robbery under seven counts. Their motions for a new trial being denied, this appeal was taken. In a voluminous brief they argue that the evidence against them is weak and that any serious errors must be deemed prejudicial. Their evidence was chiefly directed to the defense of alibi, to offset the testimony of identification. Nevertheless, they do not contend that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict on any of the twelve counts, and it is therefore unnecessary for us to engage in any extended review of the record.

The first alleged error stressed on behalf of defendants is in the reception of the testimony of C. F. Fordice, a police officer. He was permitted to testify that two days after the date of the last offense charged against defendants, he was on patrol duty checking automobile numbers, on the lookout for stolen cars; that he saw defendant Romer taking some grips and ladies' wearing apparel out of a La Salle sedan; that by the number he knew that the car was wanted; that he told Romer to come to the station, saying, "There seems to be something wrong with the car"; that Romer asserted that the car was his; that Romer then asked him to wait until he could take the contents of the car up to his apartment; and that Romer went upstairs and disappeared. This testimony was offered to prove flight and a consciousness of guilt.

[1] It is contended by defendants that since there was no charge against them of stealing an automobile, the testimony was erroneously admitted, since it did not tend to show flight following a charge of the crime for which they were on trial. Respondent argues, on the other hand, that other testimony in the record shows that Romer possessed and drove a La Salle sedan on the night certain of the crimes were committed, and that the testimony of Officer Fordice tends to show Romer's connection with these crimes. We are not convinced of its admissibility on this ground, but while we might not approve of its reception, we are not prepared to give it the weight of reversible error under the circumstances of this case. Defendants had the opportunity to move to strike it out, and seek an instruction against its effect, which they failed to do. Nevertheless the court did instruct the jury that they were not to be influenced in any way by evidence of any offenses or matters not charged in the information.

Appellants lay their greatest stress upon the alleged error committed in interrogating them on their prior convictions, after they had taken the stand in their own behalf. Barnett was questioned as follows: "Have you ever been convicted of a felony? A. I have. * * * Q. Have you been convicted of more than one felony? * * * A. I have. * * * Q. How many felonies have you been convicted of? * * * A. Two times, but I was pardoned * * * once. Q. What was the first felony you were convicted of? * * * A. Robbery. Q. When were you convicted of that felony? * * * A. 1911, I believe. Q. What was the second felony that you have been convicted of? * * * A. Assault with a weapon." Romer was similarly cross-examined and admitted four felony convictions. Defendants objected to all the questions.

[2, 3] Under section 2051 of the Code of Civil Procedure, a witness may, by way of impeachment, be asked whether he has been convicted of a felony, and may also be asked the nature of the felony. People v. Chin Hane, 108 Cal. 607, 41 P. 697, People v. Putman, 129 Cal. 258, 61 P. 961. Defendants having voluntarily taken the stand, they were obviously subject to impeachment in the same manner as any other witness, under this section. But they make the contention that when section 969a of the Penal Code was enacted in 1927 (St. 1927, p. 1064), the effect was to wipe out the provisions of the other section, in so far as they applied to defendants in criminal cases. Section 969a provides that whenever it shall be discovered that a pending indictment or information does not charge all prior felonies, it shall be amended to charge them, and the defendant shall be arraigned and be required to plead thereto. It is defendants' theory that if, upon examination under section 2051 of the Code of Civil Procedure, they are compelled to answer as to the conviction of a felony, they are thereby forced to give evidence which may subject them to further criminal prosecution and punishment.

[4] We are unable to agree with defendants that the effect of these questions is to compel self-incriminating answers. It is elementary that a person once convicted can never be prosecuted again for the same offense. The statutory provisions for increased punishment to a subsequent offender do not provide for such second prosecution. There is a single prosecution for the new crime, the punishment being more severe because of the character of the offender. In re Rosencrantz, 205 Cal. 534, 271 P. 902. On the admissibility of these questions, we see no reason to depart from the position taken by us in People v.

La Verne, 212 Cal. 29, where we said at page 32, 297 P. 561, 562:

"The alleged incriminating questions asked him, of which amicus curiae complain, were whether he had ever been convicted of a felony, answered in the affirmative; then 'What felony?' and other questions along the same line. Had these questions been asked for other than purposes of impeachment, the provisions of section 1025 of the Penal Code would be applicable; appellant, however, having voluntarily offered himself as a witness, was subject, upon cross-examination, to the usual rules for testing his credibility by impeachment, and in particular became subject to the provision of section 2051 of the Code of Civil Procedure to the effect that a witness may be impeached 'by evidence that his general reputation for truth * * * is bad, but not by evidence of particular wrongful acts, except that it may be shown by the examination of the witness * * * that he had been convicted of a felony.'"

We are satisfied that no reversible error was committed, and the judgment and order are therefore affirmed as to each defendant.

LANGDON, Justice.

Defendant Dawson was sued by R. B. Coleman in one suit and by By-Products Fuel Machine Company in another. Judgment was for the plaintiffs in each case. Appeals were taken by the defendant on the same transcript, and one judgment was affirmed and the other reversed. After final judgment was entered, costs were awarded defendant in the case in which he was successful, and the present appeal is from the order taxing costs. Plaintiff objects to an item of $838.48 for the transcript on appeal. It appears that plaintiff had secured a daily transcript of the testimony from the reporter, and that at the time when defendant took his appeal, he purchased the same from plaintiff for $838.40, which was thereupon paid. It is plaintiff's contention that this sum was not paid to the reporter for a transcript on appeal, and that therefore it was not a proper item of costs under section 1027 of the Code of Civil Procedure. We cannot see how plaintiff can complain of the allowance made, since defendant could have secured another original transcript from the reporter, at additional cost, and an allowance for this would have been proper. Defendant's act in utilizing the transcript already paid for by plaintiff resulted in a substantial saving to both parties. Moreover, it was stipulated between them that the said transcript was "to constitute a full and complete reporter's transcript at the trial of said action after demand for the said transcript was made under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, by the appellant." There is no doubt but that the expenditure was made by defendant "in connection with said appeal, and the preparation of the record for the appeal." (Code Civ. Proc. § 1027.)

No other points require discussion. The order is affirmed.

PER CURIAM.

A hearing was granted in this case after decision by the District Court of Appeal, First Appellate District, Division 2. Upon further consideration of the cause, we adopt the opinion of Mr. Justice Sturtevant as the opinion of this court. It reads as follows:

On July 11, 1927, the plaintiff commenced an action to obtain a divorce from the defendant, and in her complaint she charged him with extreme cruelty. He answered the complaint, and at the same time he filed a cross-complaint making the same charge against his wife. She answered the cross-complaint, and on the issues so framed a trial was had before the trial court sitting without a jury. The court made findings in favor of the plaintiff, and from the judgment entered thereon the defendant has appealed, and has brought up typewritten transcripts. The record consists of nearly fifteen hundred pages, but references in the briefs to page or line in the transcript are frequently omitted. Therefore we will confine ourselves to an investigation of that portion of the record to which references have been made.

[1, 2] The first finding is as follows:

"That prior to the commencement of this action, without provocation on part of plaintiff, without any cause, reason or justification, defendant had treated plaintiff with great and extreme cruelty and more particularly in that on the 3rd day of June, 1927, in the residence of plaintiff and defendant at 118 West Lake Avenue in the City of Watsonville, County of Santa Cruz, State of California, defendant repeatedly struck plaintiff upon the head with a blunt instrument, by reason whereof plaintiff sustained a depressed fracture of the skull, necessitating the removal of portions of the skull from the brain, and plaintiff's confinement in a hospital for a period of five weeks thereafter.

"That said act of defendant has caused plaintiff great and extreme anguish and mental and physical suffering, and has greatly undermined plaintiff's health and permanently impaired same."

Defendant claims that the only evidence of the truth of the allegations to which that finding is responsive is the uncorroborated testimony of the plaintiff. That claim may not be sustained. After the assault and injury complained of occurred, at different times the defendant, the plaintiff, and others were in the immediate presence and hearing of each other. On several of those occasions the plaintiff charged the defendant with having committed the acts complained of, and he made no denial.

As a witness in her own behalf, the plaintiff recited what she claimed to be the facts regarding the assault. The defendant asserts her testimony was improbable in its nature, contradictory in its terms, and was wholly contradicted by the defendant. All of those attacks were for the consideration of the trier of the facts, and are not properly for the consideration of a court of review.

[3, 4] The defendant attacks subdivisions 2, 3, 4, and 5 of finding No. II, which find certain funds to be community property. Before this action was commenced, and at least for a while thereafter, the defendant and his two brothers were partners engaged in conducting a packing house at Watsonville. In the transaction of that business they bought and sold crops of apples. The purchases amounted to thousands of dollars annually. During the same period of time the plaintiff and defendant were engaged in loaning their surplus earnings on promissory notes secured by mortgages. Some of those notes were paid after the commencement of the action. Finding No. II, so far as pertinent, is as follows:

"Plaintiff and defendant were, at the time of the commencement of this action, ever since have been and now are, seized and possessed of certain community property described as follows:

"1. All of those certain lots, pieces or parcels of land situate, lying and being in the City of Watsonville, County of Santa Cruz, State of California, and particularly described as follows: (describing them).

"2. The sum of $1200, together with interest thereon, collected by the defendant from Carrie Picanzo under and by virtue of that certain mortgage executed by Carrie Picanzo to Mitchell Secondo recorded in the office of the County Recorder of Santa Cruz County, State of California, in Volume 31 of Official Records, page 352.

"3. The sum of $500, together with interest thereon, collected by the defendant from James A. Covell et ux., under and by virtue of certain mortgage executed by James A. Covell et ux. to Mitchell Secondo recorded in the office of the County Recorder of Santa Cruz County, State of California, in Volume 23 of Official Records, page 206.

"4. The sum of $360.89 together with interest thereon, collected by the defendant from Edna S. Bingham et vir., under and by virtue of certain mortgage executed by Edna S. Bingham et vir. to Mitchell Secondo, recorded in the office of the County Recorder of Santa Cruz County, State of California, in Volume 23 of Official Records, page 374.

"5. The sum of $9136 withdrawn by defendant in 1927 and 1928 from the partnership of Secondo Bros., City of Watsonville, County of Santa Cruz, State of California.

"6. All furniture, furnishings, fixtures, together with silverware and linens in the former residence of said plaintiff and said defendant at 118 West Lake Avenue in the City of Watsonville, County of Santa Cruz, State of California.

"All of the above described real and personal property was at the time of the commencement of this action, ever since has been, and now is community property of plaintiff and defendant."

In substance the defendant claims that the effect of subdivisions 2, 3, 4, and 5 was to find that the spouses owned, held, and possessed as community property the items mentioned in said subdivisions. He also claims that the items of interest are not supported by the evidence, and moreover are a false quantity. The proof does not show that any one of the loans carried interest. However, if it be inferred that they did, and we think the trial court was entitled so to infer, then it would follow that the defendant collected the principal and interest for which he was bound to account to the plaintiff. The defendant contends, and the plaintiff does not cite any portion of the record to the contrary, that there was no evidence as to the amount of the interest collected. As to the principal, the defendant admitted he had collected the loan. However, he testified that he had spent the money. At that point the evidence stopped. As to the withdrawals from the partnership, the defendant admitted the amount, but testified he had spent the money. As to those expenditures, the evidence stopped. There is no evidence in the record that the defendant spent a dollar in fraud of the plaintiff's rights. There is evidence that, from the time the action was commenced down to the date of the trial, the defendant conducted his business as he had done before the action was commenced; that, after the commencement of the action, the defendant paid the plaintiff alimony and counsel fees. The order for alimony was $250 per month. That order was made July 25, 1927, and commenced to run August 1, 1927. The findings were signed on August 31, 1929. The record, by inference, shows $4,500 was paid by the defendant in compliance with said order. The amount paid in counsel fees is not clear, but was apparently in excess of $1,000. Whether at the time the action was commenced the plaintiff and defendant had debts outstanding for which the moneys collected were disbursed does not appear. Whether, after the action was commenced, the defendant suffered losses in transacting his business, does not appear. Moreover, no effort was made at any time to show to the trial court the amount of personal property on hand and subject to division by the trial court. As the evidence did not show those items of property to be in the hands of the court, the claim is sound. Van Horst v. Van Horst, 96 Wash. 658, 165 P. 886. In that case, at page 888 of 165 P., 96 Wash. 658, the Supreme Court of Washington said: "If this were an action for an accounting between plaintiff and defendant, many elements might enter into the case that cannot properly be considered in a proceeding such as this. The court, in making a disposition of the property of the spouses incidental to granting a decree for divorce, is necessarily limited by the amount of property in the hands of the court for division. Palpably it cannot divide that which does not exist. In making provision for the wife in the way of alimony the court is also powerless to compel the husband to pay more than he is able to pay, no matter what his conduct may have been in wasting or dissipating property belonging to the wife."

[5] Having found the items in subdivisions 2, 3, 4, and 5 of finding No. II to be community property, the trial court added them together, and the total, $11,206.89, was declared a lien on the real estate described in finding No. III and which the trial court found to be the defendant's separate property. The defendant contends that Civil Code, § 140, is not authority for the creation of a lien on the separate property of the husband to secure the payment to the wife of a share in the community property. The contention is fully sustained by the ruling in Mayberry v. Whittier, 144 Cal. 322, 326, 78 P. 16.

[6] The trial court awarded the custody of the two minor sons to the mother. It made a finding that the defendant might visit said minors at least once a month and spend the day with them in the presence of a probation officer of San Francisco. The defendant claims the provision prescribing that the visit should be in the presence of a probation officer was erroneous. In reply, the plaintiff calls to our attention finding No. I quoted above. The record shows that at the time of that transaction the sons were not present and were not in any way whatever connected therewith. There is not a particle of evidence in the record that the defendant was otherwise than a kind and affectionate father. The limitation imposed was not, therefore, sustained by the record.

[7] The court made a finding awarding the plaintiff $500 counsel fees in addition to amounts theretofore allowed. The defendant objects to the finding, and cites and relies on the rule stated in Sheppard v. Sheppard, 15 Cal. App. 614, 618, 115 P. 751; Loveren v. Loveren, 100 Cal. 493, 35 P. 87; Stampfli v. Stampfli, 53 Cal. App. 126, 132, 199 P. 829. The point is well founded. An examination of the record does not disclose that prior to the date of signing the findings and interlocutory decree any application for counsel fees remained undisposed of. The record showed no necessity for making the order at the time it was made.

[8] The judgment ordered that the costs be paid by the defendant. He asserts the order was in effect double taxation, because theretofore he had been ordered to pay the plaintiff $250 for costs and counsel fees, and that it will be presumed he had made the payment. No cost bill is contained in the record. An examination of the transcript discloses several orders for the payment of counsel fees and costs. However, it does not show how much was incurred for costs, and we have no means of separating the items. Therefore the record does not support the contention.

[9] The defendant offered his will in evidence, but the objection of the plaintiff was sustained. The will was dated December 31, 1918, and by its terms all of defendant's property was to go, in the event of his death, to the plaintiff. The defendant claims the will was evidence to the effect that, when the defendant struck the plaintiff, as recited in finding No. I, on June 3, 1927, the striking was not with the intention of putting her out of the way so that she could not inherit his property. Under the facts, we think the court did not err in sustaining the objection to the offer. Estate of Anderson, 185 Cal. 700, 718, 198 P. 407.

For the reasons indicated, the judgment is reversed, and the action remanded to the trial court, with directions to try the issues of fact covered by the following findings: Finding II, subdivisions 2, 3, 4, and 5; finding VI; finding IX; and finding X. Finding IV is hereby modified by striking therefrom the words "in the presence of J. C. Astredo, Chief Probation Officer of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, or some suitable person designated by him." The other findings are either unchallenged or fully supported by the record, and the issues determined by them should not be retried. Upon retrial of the issues covered by the findings specified above to be retried, the trial court is directed to prepare new findings and conclusions of law not inconsistent with the views expressed in this opinion.

WASTE, Chief Justice.

The appellant, Dallas Egan, was charged with the crime of murder. The information also charged four prior convictions, two of which were suffered in other jurisdictions and two in the state of California. Defendant entered a plea of not guilty, and denied the prior convictions. Prior to the date set for his trial, he asked to be permitted to change his pleas to (a) not guilty, (b) not guilty by reason of insanity, and (c) admit the four prior convictions. His motion to enter a plea of not guilty by reason of insanity was denied, but on being arraigned—and the record indicates being fully advised as to his rights—he admitted the four prior convictions.

The trial of appellant and two codefendants was begun. After it had been in progress for several days, the appellant asked permission to withdraw his plea of not guilty, and to enter a plea of guilty. The court thereupon personally questioned appellant, advising him fully as to his rights, and also questioned his counsel. Being satisfied that the appellant and his counsel fully appreciated the situation, the court ordered the appellant to be arraigned, and there was entered a plea of guilty. On stipulation that the evidence already taken at the trial could be considered by the court in fixing the degree of the crime, and after hearing further facts and evidence then submitted to it, the court found the degree to be murder of the first degree. Before pronouncement of judgment and sentence, appellant made an oral motion for a hearing as to his present sanity, and a motion for a continuance in order to present testimony as to his then sanity. These motions were denied, and the death sentence was pronounced.

[1, 2] On this appeal two questions are presented: (1) Did the trial court abuse its discretion in denying appellant's motion to be allowed to change his plea of not guilty by the addition of the plea not guilty by reason of insanity? (2) Did the trial court abuse its discretion in denying appellant's motion, made after conviction and before sentence, for a hearing as to his present sanity?

The record shows that appellant and several accomplices, two of whom were subsequently shot to death while engaged with appellant in a bank robbery, were robbing a jewelry store in Los Angeles. While they were so engaged, W. J. Kirkpatrick, an elderly passerby, and unarmed, entered the store to compare his watch with the master clock. Appellant Egan ordered him to the rear of the store, where the proprietor and clerk had been driven, and when he refused to comply fired a bullet into his brain, killing him instantly. Appellant admitted, in answers to questions by the trial court, that by reason of his incarceration in Folsom prison for a number of years, a considerable portion of the time being in solitary confinement, he had "just come out embittered against society * * * and came out with the intention that society owed [him] a duty and [he] was going to collect that duty. [He] didn't come out to kill, but made up [his] mind if necessary [he] would kill for any cause." He further told the court that he "got together this group to go down there and rob" the jewelry store; that he carried a gun with him "for the simple reason to rob"; and that if there had been any protest on the part of the people he intended to rob, he would have been prepared to kill them. When asked further if that was the reason why he shot the decedent, he replied: "That's the reason why. I gave the man full warning." When asked why he did not shoot the proprietor of the jewelry store who had commandeered an automobile to follow the robbers, he replied: "I had an army Springfield [rifle] * * * I figured if he had tailed us four more blocks I would have shot him." Subsequent to the murder of Kirkpatrick, the appellant and others committed the bank robbery in which two of their number were shot to death. One of the bank tellers was shot. When questioned in the present case, appellant admitted doing the shooting.

Section 1016 of the Penal Code provides that the court "may," for good cause shown, allow a change of plea at any time before the commencement of the trial. We cannot, however, accept appellant's view that the trial court abused its discretion in refusing to grant him permission to enter a plea of not guilty by reason of insanity, or in subsequently denying his request that his present sanity be inquired into. No good cause for such action was shown. His motion to be permitted to change his plea was based upon his own affidavit, the substance of which was that he did not enter the additional plea of not guilty by reason of insanity when first arraigned because, at that time, he was unable to prove certain facts, to wit, that at the time of his birth one of his parents was deranged; that a number of his family have been adjudged mentally incompetent; that as a child he was sickly and feeble-minded; that as a schoolboy he was struck on the head and seriously hurt, as a result of which action his brain was injured; that his mentality was further impaired by a shooting affray in 1914, in which he was wounded; and that all of his life he had been irrational and irresponsible; that he expected to establish these facts by testimony of a sister, two brothers, and an uncle, all of whom resided in other states, and, having communicated with affiant, had promised they would testify to the foregoing facts.

Admitting that the witnesses named by the appellant would testify as indicated, and everything set out in the affidavit to be true, no showing is thereby made that appellant was "insane," as that term is used and understood at law, at the time of the commission of the offense. There is nothing in the affidavit to indicate that when the act was committed appellant was so deranged and diseased mentally that he was not conscious of the wrongful nature of the crime committed. See People v. Troche, 206 Cal. 35, 46, 273 P. 767. Furthermore, the trial court had the appellant before him at the time of making the motion for permission to change his plea, and also at the time the appellant made the oral motion in court for a hearing as to his present sanity. There is no room for the claim that the trial court, in either of these matters, abused its discretion or acted arbitrarily in the slightest degree. We have before us the entire record of the proceedings had in the trial court, including the testimony given by the appellant. There is not the slightest doubt that the appellant killed the decedent Kirkpatrick in a cold-blooded and merciless manner in pursuance of the determination he had formed in his own mind before engaging in the robbery. Aside from his own admissions, he was positively identified by the proprietor of the jewelry store, by his assistant, and by others. When the appellant withdrew his plea of not guilty, and changed it to one of guilty, the trial court carefully, even painstakingly, took him on examination and questioned him minutely as to his part in the commission of the crime, resulting in the testimony the substance of which we have given. No trace of insanity or unsoundness of mind of the appellant was found by the trial court, and none can be gleaned from the record. He stands out as a boastful, arrogant, merciless, determined criminal.

The orders appealed from and the judgment of conviction are, and each is, affirmed.

Certiorari to Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James G. Conlan, Judge.

Action by Catherine C. Christie against Alice M. Stafford. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals, and to review an order, granting defendant's motion to set aside an order continuing a temporary injunction, plaintiff brings certiorari to the Superior Court in and for the City and County of San Francisco, George H. Cabaniss, Judge Presiding in Department 3.

Writ discharged, and judgment affirmed.

Joseph A. Brown, of San Francisco, for petitioner and appellant.

Albert Picard, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

[1] The above-entitled matters are, first a petition for writ of certiorari; and, second, an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment of the superior court of San Francisco. Both deal with the same controversy, which arose as follows: In a prior proceeding, Alice Stafford sued Catherine Christie and obtained judgment by default, in the sum of $1,020.98. Catherine Christie then brought an action in equity to set aside the judgment on the ground that summons was never served upon her, and in that action she was granted a temporary injunction against the enforcement of the said judgment by execution levied against her property. Upon the trial Judge Conlan gave judgment against the plaintiff, finding that she had been properly served, and that a meritorious case had existed in favor of Alice Stafford in the first suit. This judgment, entered November 12, 1931, dissolved the temporary injunction. To prevent the sale of her property under the execution previously levied, Catherine Christie obtained an order from Judge Conlan continuing in force the temporary injunction "until the further order" of the court. In January, 1932, Alice Stafford moved to set aside this order on the ground that it was beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and on June 3, 1932, Judge Cabaniss granted the motion. Thereupon Catherine Christie petitioned for a writ of certiorari, contending that Judge Cabaniss had no power to vacate Judge Conlan's order. Prior to this time, on January 15, 1932, she gave notice of appeal from the judgment. A writ of certiorari was granted and the matter heard in this court. Thereafter the briefs on appeal were filed, and both matters are now before us for determination. Since the decision on the appeal will finally adjudicate all the issues, it is unnecessary to give consideration to the propriety of the remedy of certiorari, although it may be observed that the statute is explicit in its provision that certiorari does not lie where an appeal is possible. Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 1068; Stoddard v. Superior Court, 108 Cal. 303, 41 P. 278; Hughson v. Superior Court, 120 Cal. App. 658, 8 P.(2d) 227; Helbush v. Superior Court, 99 Cal. App. 501, 278 P. 1062; Leach v. Superior Court, 215 Cal. 531, 12 P.(2d) 1.

[2, 3] On the appeal, we see no alternative, but to affirm the judgment. The process server testified that he handed the summons to a lady, about sixty years of age, answering the general description of Mrs. Christie, as he saw her in the courtroom, that this lady had said she was Mrs. Christie until handed the summons, and that thereafter she had denied it. He was positive in his statement that the woman could not have been young or middle aged. For the appellant, Mrs. Ruth Prince, niece of Mrs. Christie, who took care of her during a period of illness at this time, testified that the summons was handed to her (Mrs. Prince) in spite of her denial that she was Mrs. Christie. Mrs. Christie also testified that she was never served. Certain contradictions in the testimony of these last two parties as to the circumstances need not be elaborated upon, but they fully warranted the trial court in resolving the square conflict in the evidence against appellant. The presumption arising from the former judgment is, of course, in favor of the regularity of the service, and the burden is on the party attacking it. See Vail v. Jones, 209 Cal. 251, 287 P. 99; Eichhoff v. Eichhoff, 107 Cal. 42, 40 P. 24, 48 Am. St. Rep. 110. On the merits as well the evidence was strongly conflicting, but there is ample in the record to justify the court's conclusion that Mrs. Christie was indebted to Mrs. Stafford in the amount recovered.

The writ of certiorari heretofore issued is discharged, and the judgment is affirmed.

L. A. 13086.

Supreme Court of California.
June 30, 1933.

Rehearing Denied July 28, 1933.

1. Judgment ⇨403.

Equity has jurisdiction to afford appropriate relief from judgments generally and from orders and decrees in probate proceedings in proper cases.

2. Wills ⇨221.

Equity may not set aside probate of will, but may declare beneficiary trustee for those who have been wrongfully defrauded.

3. Judgment ⇨445, 521.

Proceeding for equitable relief from effect of judgment, order, or decree is not "collateral attack," and doctrine of res judicata has no application.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Collateral Attack," see Words & Phrases.]

4. Appeal and error ⇨917(1).

In determining whether trial court correctly sustained demurrer to amended complaint, facts stated therein must be accepted as true.

5. Judgment ⇨443(1).

Equity will give relief from effect of judgment only upon proof of "extrinsic" and collateral fraud, as distinguished from "intrinsic fraud," or fraud practiced in former action.

"Extrinsic fraud" is where an unsuccessful party has been prevented from exhibiting fully his case, by fraud or deception practiced on him by his opponent, as by keeping him away from court, a false promise of a compromise; or where the defendant never had knowledge of the suit, being kept in ignorance by the acts of the plaintiff; or where an attorney fraudulently or without authority assumes to represent the party and connives at his defeat; or where the attorney regularly employed corruptly sells out his client's interest to the other side, and in other cases where, by some fraud practiced directly upon the party seeking relief against the judgment or decree, that party has been prevented from presenting all of his case to the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Extrinsic or Collateral Fraud" and "Intrinsic Fraud," see Words & Phrases.]

6. Judgment ⇨460(4).

Complaint for relief against judgment admitting will to probate held to show "extrinsic fraud" entitling plaintiff to relief against beneficiary.

Complaint alleged that beneficiary who had married plaintiff's father, had falsely concealed her real identity, past record, and marital status, by means of misrepresentations to plaintiff, so that he was unable to trace her in time to make effective contest when will was offered for probate; that beneficiary was a notorious woman who had married plaintiff's father for corrupt purposes; and that will had been procured by fraud and undue influence.

7. Wills ⇨355.

Plaintiff's difficulty in proving prevention from contesting will by beneficiary's alleged fraud, and that will was procured through fraud, held without weight in determining whether complaint attacking judgment admitting will to probate stated cause of action.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Douglas L. Edmonds, Judge.

Suit by Oscar P. Caldwell against Leonore Taylor, sometimes known as Leonore Fisher Caldwell, and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed, with instructions.

D. A. Knapp, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Andreani, Haines, Bisher & Carrey and Haines & Bisher, all of Los Angeles, for respondent Leonore Fisher Caldwell.

Harold E. Thomas, of Los Angeles, for respondent Bank of America Nat. Trust & Savings Ass'n.

CURTIS, Justice.

This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment of dismissal based upon an order sustaining demurrers filed by defendants to plaintiff's second amended complaint without leave to amend.

By this suit in equity, plaintiff, the only son and heir of Perry Moore Caldwell, seeks to have a beneficiary named in his will as Leonore Fisher Caldwell declared an involuntary trustee for the use and benefit of plaintiff, of the property devised and bequeathed to her, upon the ground that said will was procured by fraud exerted upon the testator by the beneficiary, his supposed wife. Faced at the outset by a judgment sustaining the order admitting the will to probate (Caldwell v. Bank of Italy, 112 Cal. App. 104, 296 P. 312), plaintiff, while admitting the existence of said order, attempts to avoid its effect by seeking the aid of equity upon the ground that said order admitting the will to probate was procured by virtue of fraud practiced upon him (the plaintiff), whereby he was prevented from properly presenting his contest of said will.

Briefly stated the allegations of said complaint are to the effect that the defendant, Leonore Taylor, "a notorious woman who had been arrested many times for grossly immoral acts and for sundry misdemeanors and crimes," induced Perry Moore Caldwell, father of the plaintiff, to accompany her to Tia Juana, Mexico, where in a drugged and intoxicated condition, he was induced to go through a marriage ceremony with her before a Mexican magistrate; that she falsely represented to him that she was a woman of fine character and good reputation and prior to her marriage to him was a single woman; that Perry Moore Caldwell at the time of the marriage was a victim of incurable cancer of the throat and defendant, in order to gain his sympathy, represented to him that she was a victim of a like fatal disease in its earlier stages; that after living with him as his wife for about a fortnight, she induced him to go to a hospital, where he remained until his death less than two months later; that during this time she importuned him to make adequate financial provision by will for her, his legally wedded wife, and "so harassed, urged, cajoled, threatened and nagged him" that he made a will in which he left her the sum of $4,500 for the purchase of a home and devised to the Bank of Italy the sum of $25,500 as a trust fund, the net income of which should be paid to her during her life; that during this time she prevented to a large extent plaintiff from visiting his father; that the deceased communicated with plaintiff by writing, as he was unable to talk, and by writing informed plaintiff that he had executed the will because of the fact that the defendant was his lawfully wedded wife and she had assured him that she was a woman of fine character and reputation and worthy of his consideration, but that he had become suspicious of her, and that he wished his son to investigate in order that he might act accordingly; that upon discovering the communications between the father and son, the defendant prevented the plaintiff from seeing his father except for brief periods; that "at or about the time of or prior to the probate of the will" by defendant, the plaintiff ascertained from the police records of the city of Los Angeles that said Leonore Taylor was a "vicious, dissolute and grossly immoral woman of the streets"; that "prior thereto" plaintiff talked with defendant and asked her directly what her name and marital status were prior to the time of her purported marriage to plaintiff's father; that she represented to him that she was, on the day of said marriage, a widow, her husband having died many years before, and that her name was Leonore Fisher; that shortly after the six months' period allowed by statute for the contest of the probate of the will, plaintiff ascertained that not only was the defendant, Leonore Taylor, a notorious woman who had been many times arrested, but that on the date of her purported marriage to Perry Moore Caldwell she was in fact the wife of Carl L. Taylor; that said misstatements with reference to her real identity and her marital status were represented and stated by defendant to plaintiff with the intent and purpose of thereby preventing the discovery by plaintiff of sufficient facts to enable plaintiff to fully and properly present a case in contest of said will within six months after the probate thereof, and that by reason of said false and fraudulent representations and of her deceit she succeeded in preventing the plaintiff from presenting a contest of said will; that the estate of Perry Moore Caldwell, at the time of his death of the value of approximately $60,000, had been diminished by the prevailing prices of stocks and bonds to less than $29,500, approximately the value of defendant's interest in said estate. In his prayer, plaintiff seeks to have the Bank of America appointed an elisor by the court to receive all moneys as and when payable to said defendant, Leonore Taylor, in the place of said defendant, to receipt therefor in her name and to pay the same over to plaintiff, the acts of said elisor to be construed as the acts of Leonore Taylor as constructive trustee for the plaintiff, and for such other relief as the court may deem proper.

[1-3] The jurisdiction of equity to afford appropriate relief from judgments generally and from orders and decrees in probate proceedings upon a showing of proper circumstances is well settled. Bacon v. Bacon, 150 Cal. 477, 89 P. 317; Campbell-Kawannanakoia v. Campbell, 152 Cal. 201, 92 P. 184. It has been specifically held that equitable relief may be granted against orders and decrees of a probate court, including a decree of distribution, and a decree probating a will. Estate of Ross, 180 Cal. 651, 182 P. 752; Nicholson v. Leatham, 28 Cal. App. 597, 153 P. 965, 155 P. 98; Bacon v. Bacon, supra. Since the probate of a will is a matter exclusively within the jurisdiction of the probate court equity may not set aside the probate, but it may declare the beneficiary a trustee for those who have been defrauded. Estate of Ross, supra; Estate of Walker, 160 Cal. 547, 117 P. 510, 36

L. R. A. (N. S.) 89; Campbell-Kawannanako v. Campbell, supra; Bacon v. Bacon, supra; Sohler v. Sohler, 135 Cal. 323, 67 P. 282, 87 Am. St. Rep. 98. And such character of relief is common. The judgment, order, or decree from the effect of which relief is sought cannot constitute a bar to equitable relief. A proceeding for equitable relief is not a collateral attack, and since its sole aim and purpose is to avoid the effect of said judgment, the doctrine of res judicata can have no application to such judgment. Bacon v. Bacon, supra; Campbell-Kawannanako v. Campbell, supra.

[4, 5] The case comes to us upon the question of the correctness of an order sustaining the demurrers, and the facts stated in the complaint must be accepted as true, at least for the purpose of the present argument. Assuming them, therefore, to be true, does the complaint state facts sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to the interposition of the aid of equity to avoid the effects of the judgment affirming the order of probate already made and entered? The claim of plaintiff that he is entitled to such aid is predicated upon the fraud practiced by the defendant, Leonore Taylor, a beneficiary under his father's will. An analysis of the authorities upon the question of what fraud will warrant the aid of equity indicates that only upon proof of extrinsic and collateral fraud can plaintiff seek and secure equitable relief from the judgment. A showing of fraud practiced in the trial of the original action will not suffice. The authorities hold this to be intrinsic fraud, and uniformly hold that since there must be an end to litigation, and the fraud was part of the case presented in the former action, equity will not reopen the litigation. The leading case of United States v. Throckmorton, 98 U. S. 61, 65, 25 L. Ed. 93, so holds. In that case it was held that a decree will not be vacated merely because it was obtained by forged documents or perjured testimony. "The reason of this rule is that there must be an end of litigation; and when parties have once submitted a matter, or have had the opportunity of submitting it, for investigation and determination, and when they have exhausted every means for reviewing such determination in the same proceeding, it must be regarded as final and conclusive, unless it can be shown that the jurisdiction of the court has been imposed upon, or that the prevailing party, by some extrinsic or collateral fraud, has prevented a fair submission of the controversy." Pico v. Cohn, 91 Cal. 129, 25 P. 970, 971, 27 P. 537, 13 L. R. A. 336, 25 Am. St. Rep. 159. In United States v. Throckmorton, supra, the court stated that the cases where such relief would be granted are those in which, "by reason of something done by the successful party to a suit, there was in fact no adversary trial or decision of the issue in the case. Where the unsuccessful party has been prevented from exhibiting fully his case, by fraud or deception practiced on him by his opponent, as by keeping him away from court, a false promise of a compromise; or where the defendant never had knowledge of the suit, being kept in ignorance by the acts of the plaintiff; or where an attorney fraudulently or without authority assumes to represent a party and connives at his defeat; or where the attorney regularly employed corruptly sells out his client's interest to the other side;—these, and similar cases which show that there has never been a real contest in the trial or hearing of the case, are reasons for which a new suit may be sustained to set aside and annul the former judgment or decree, and open the case for a new and a fair hearing. [Citing authorities.] In all these cases, and many others which have been examined, relief has been granted on the ground that by some fraud practiced directly upon the party seeking relief against the judgment or decree, that party has been prevented from presenting all of his case to the court." (Italics ours.) This definition has become the well-recognized and standard definition of extrinsic fraud. The rule laid down in that case that intrinsic fraud would not justify equitable intervention was stated in Pico v. Cohn, supra, which held that a judgment would not be vacated merely because it was obtained by forged documents, perjured testimony, or by bribing a witness to swear falsely. And in Clavey v. Loney, 80 Cal. App. 20, 251 P. 232, 234, the court held the fact that by mistake an entire interest in property was by decree of distribution distributed to one entitled to only a fractional interest therein, would not in the absence of extrinsic fraud, warrant equitable relief. The court there stated that "the extrinsic fraud, which alone will warrant a court of equity in setting aside a judgment or decree, consists of such fraud as prevents a real trial upon the issues involved in the case, like conduct which prevents the injured party from receiving notice of the action, or which causes the absence of necessary witnesses."

It also seems to be the rule that the fraud alleged must not be the fraud which is in effect the issue in controversy, the fraud upon which the cause of action in the former suit was based. In other words, the rule awarding equitable relief cannot be held to include such frauds as could have been relieved by the probate court itself by refusing probate, where the injured party had actual notice of the probate proceedings in time to make his contest and was not prevented from so doing by some fraud of the other party. In Brazil v. Silva, 181 Cal. 490, 185 P. 174, the court held that, inasmuch as the issues presented by the complaint before it were not questions before the probate court, that is, the question as to the instrument being the legal and valid will of the decedent unrevoked at the time of his death, the plaintiffs were not concluded by the order admitting the will to probate.

It is apparent from the foregoing discussion that the issue of fraud practiced upon the testator which was the issue involved in the contest of the probate of the will (although in fact the case was decided upon the issue of whether or not the contest had been filed within the statutory time allowed) is forever foreclosed from further consideration unless it be successfully established by plaintiff that by a different and distinct fraud practiced directly upon him by his opponent he was prevented from presenting all of his case to the court. Plaintiff has foreseen and recognized the necessity for the presence of such fraud, extrinsic and collateral to the main issue of fraud involved in the will contest, and seeks to supply it by the allegation of his complaint that "plaintiff talked with said defendant and asked her directly what her name and marital status was prior to and at the time of her purported marriage with plaintiff's father; that defendant then and there stated that she was a single woman on May 29, 1929 (the date of said marriage ceremony in Tia Juana), that her name was Leonore Fisher, that she had never gone by any name except Leonore Fisher since many years before when she had married a man named Fisher * * * that defendant so represented and stated with the knowledge that plaintiff could find in no record of vital statistics or any other public record any fact disclosing the truth as to her marital relationship on said May 29, 1929, and with the intent and purpose of thereby preventing the discovery by plaintiff of sufficient facts to enable plaintiff to fully or properly present a case in contest of said will within six months after the probate thereof, August 21, 1929; that by reason of her said false and fraudulent representations and of her deceit in the premises said defendant succeeded as aforesaid in preventing plaintiff from presenting to the above named court a contest of said will." By this statement, plaintiff has attempted to avoid the pitfalls of pleading either intrinsic fraud, or fraud inherent in the original cause of action, and has attempted to state a cause of action which will come within the classification of extrinsic fraud as indicated by those cases in which relief has been granted. Sohler v. Sohler, supra; Bacon v. Bacon, supra; Simonton v. Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank, 192 Cal. 651, 221 P. 368; Brazil v. Silva, supra; and Flood v. Templeton, 152 Cal. 148, 92 P. 78, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 579.

[6] We think plaintiff has been successful, in that, in said allegation above set out he has stated facts which distinguish the fraud therein alleged from the fraud which was the subject-matter of the will contest. Although it is true that, in a manner of speaking, the deliberate and intentional falsehood made by defendant, Leonore Taylor, to plaintiff for the purpose of concealing her real identity, her past record, and her marital status, was the same specie of fraud as that designedly practiced upon the testator, plaintiff's father, and was but the final step in the plan of fraud as originally conceived and executed, which step was necessary to prevent the entire structure of falsehood and deceit from collapsing, it is, in fact, not an actual part and parcel of the original fraud which was the subject-matter of the contest of the will. That fraud was fraud practiced upon the testator, the fraud stated in the above allegation was practiced upon the plaintiff with the intent and purpose of misleading him and thereby preventing him from presenting to the court the actual facts with reference to the fraud which would, if established, vitiate the will.

The question remains whether he has stated a case of extrinsic rather than intrinsic fraud. The distinction between intrinsic and extrinsic fraud is quite nebulous and a rather extensive search has failed to disclose any case, either one dealing with intrinsic fraud, or one dealing with extrinsic fraud, in which the facts are closely similar to those set out in plaintiff's complaint. We are of the opinion, however, that the fraud therein alleged does come within the general definition of extrinsic fraud as defined by the above authorities. The main requirement to establish extrinsic fraud is that the unsuccessful party was prevented by his adversary from presenting all of his case to the court. One of the examples given is that of a party who is prevented from appearing in court. It would seem that the deceit practiced in the instant case was just as effective to prevent the proper presentation of the contest as if the plaintiff had been prevented from being present at the hearing. In Flood v. Templeton, 152 Cal. 148, 92 P. 78, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 579, supra, the court held that one who was induced to refrain from presenting a proper defense to a foreclosure of a mortgage suit by virtue of the promises and agreement of the plaintiff therein to devise and bequeath the property upon his death to the defendant was, as to the defendant, extrinsic fraud which prevented a presentation at the trial of defendant's meritorious defense. Conceding that the facts are not similar, the underlying thought is the same in that case as in the instant case wherein the plaintiff, by virtue of the false statements of the beneficiary, was prevented from setting up a real defense to the probate of his father's will. In each case, the party seeking the aid of equity had been deprived by the deceit of an opponent from properly presenting the real issues. The instant case is also somewhat similar in principle to the case of Ocean Insurance Co. v. Robert Fields, 2 Story 59. Fed. Cas. No. 10406, a case which involved a suit on an insurance policy in which the court held that the willful concealment of the fact of the original fraud upon which the action to recover the insurance on a lost boat was based was sufficient to warrant the aid of equity, since the fact of such original fraud if known to the defendant would have been a complete answer to the success of the suit.

In determining whether or not the willful concealment by defendant of her real identity and her deliberate falsehood to plaintiff with reference to her marital status at the time of her purported marriage to the testator will warrant the interposition of equity to prevent the retention by her of the fruits of her fraud, it must be borne in mind that, accepting as true the allegations of the complaint, the statements so made were not mere equivocations or slight deviations from truth, but were in fact false declarations deliberately and designedly made for the express purpose of preventing plaintiff from discovering and disclosing to the court the fraud and deceit practiced upon the testator, within the short period of six months now allowed by statute for the contest of a will after probate. It would, of course, be too much to expect one who would designedly enter upon the course of deceit and fraud alleged in the complaint to give aid to her adversary by confessing to him any facts detrimental to the success of her scheme. Plaintiff does not, however, complain that his opponent remained passive and failed to give him assistance, but predicates his claim to relief in equity upon the charge, in fact, that she by active deceit and by intentional and deliberate falsehoods designed to prevent a successful contest of the will within the time limit provided by statute did in fact delay and hinder and prevent him from successfully prosecuting such contest.

[7] We are, therefore, of the opinion that if plaintiff upon a trial of this issue is able to prove that in fact by such fraud he was prevented from adequately and fully presenting his contest of his father's will, then he is entitled to a consideration by the court of the question of whether or not the will was in fact procured by the fraud of the beneficiary, as alleged in his complaint, which question has been heretofore foreclosed to him by the order admitting the will to probate. Upon successful proof by him that it was so procured, he is entitled to whatever relief the court may deem proper. The fact that it may be extremely difficult to successfully prove that plaintiff was prevented from contesting the will by reason of the deliberate falsehoods of the defendant beneficiary of the will, and further that the will was procured through the fraudulent schemes and deceit of the defendant beneficiary can have no weight in deciding the question of whether or not the plaintiff has stated a cause of action in his complaint.

It follows from what we have said that the lower court was in error in its conclusion that the complaint failed to state a cause of action.

Judgment is reversed, with orders to the trial court to overrule the demurrers of defendants.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. T. Price, Judge.

Action by Max E. Hayward and others against E. A. Widmann and others, wherein defendants filed a cross-complaint. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Lawler & Degnan, Barry Brannen, and Newlin & Ashburn, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Meserve, Mumper, Hughes & Robertson, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

Plaintiffs brought this action to recover the balance owing them on a promissory note executed to plaintiffs Hayward by defendants; also to foreclose a lien against certain shares of stock which had been deposited with plaintiff Title Insurance & Trust Company as security for the payment of said note. Defendants by their answer denied liability on said note, and alleged that they had been induced to enter into a contract for the purchase of 23,000 shares of the capital stock of the International Indemnity Company through the false representations of plaintiffs Hayward, and that the note sued upon represented a part of the purchase price of said stock. They also filed a cross-complaint in which they alleged that they were induced to enter into said contract for the purchase of said shares of stock by the said false representations, and asked judgment for $270,008.19. Judgment was rendered for plaintiffs for the balance owing on said note, and for the foreclosure of the lien against said shares of stock. From this judgment the defendants appeal.

On March 20, 1928, respondents and appellants entered into an agreement for the sale of the 23,000 shares of the capital stock of the International Indemnity Company to appellants for the sum of $718,300, to be paid as follows: $10,000 at the date of the execution of said agreement, $190,000 on April 2, 1928, and for the remaining sum of $518,300 appellants executed their promissory note payable in installments of $20,000 on the 1st day of May, 1928, and the same amount on the 1st day of each and every month thereafter until the principal sum thereof had been paid, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum. Said agreement further provided that the 23,000 shares of the capital stock of the International Indemnity Company and 6,000 shares of the Keystone Capital Corporation should be deposited with the Title Insurance & Trust Company as collateral, to secure the payment of the said promissory note. On the same date (March 20, 1928), appellants entered into an agreement with the Title Insurance & Trust Company by which they agreed to deposit with said title company the 23,000 shares of the capital stock of the International Indemnity Company and the 6,000 shares of the capital stock of the Keystone Capital Corporation, to be held a pledge for the payment of said note. Under the terms of this pledge agreement, the said title company became the trustee of said pledged stock, and was authorized, upon default of payment, to sell said security and apply the proceeds to the payment of said note, interest, and costs. Thereafter respondents caused to be issued to appellant Hansen the said 23,000 shares of the International Indemnity Company stock, and appellants deposited said stock, together with the 6,000 shares of the capital stock of the Keystone Capital Corporation, with the said title company as collateral security for the payment of said note.

Appellants paid to respondents the said $10,000 on the execution of said agreement and the $190,000 on the 2d of April, 1928, and on the 1st of May, and for the three succeeding months, paid to respondents the installments of $20,000 called for by said note. They then defaulted in their said payments. It appears from the evidence that, while the note and agreement were dated as of March 20, 1928, the transaction was not consummated until March 27, 1928.

Appellants contend that they were induced to enter into the contract for the purchase of the said shares of stock through the false representations of respondents Hayward; that these false representations were that the contingent liability of said International Indemnity Company for unsettled claims, and losses and expenses in connection therewith, had been accurately and fairly computed, and that the reserves of said company posted against said unsettled claims, losses, and expenses exceeded any possible contingent liability of the said company therefor by the sum of at least $150,000. Upon conflicting evidence, the trial court found against appellants upon this contention, and also found that, while it was true respondent Max E. Hayward stated to appellants in December, 1927, that there was an equity of $150,000 in the reserves carried by the International Indemnity Company on its financial statement of September 30, 1927, for the payment of losses and expenses, this statement was made by the said Hayward as an expression of his opinion; that the appellants did not rely upon said opinion to enter into the said contract for the purchase of said shares of stock, nor were they thereby induced so to do.

On November 24, 1927, appellant Hansen sent a telegram to Max Hayward requesting an option on 21,000 shares of the capital stock of the International Indemnity Company. Following this telegram, negotiations were had between the parties, and on December 7, 1927, an agreement was entered into between appellants and respondents Hayward by which, in consideration of $10,000, said respondents gave to appellants the option to purchase, on or before March 1, 1928, 21,000 shares of stock of said International Indemnity Company at $31.50 per share and 2,000 shares at $28.50 per share, all to be paid in cash not later than March 10, 1928.

On January 21, 1928, appellant Hansen employed Harwood E. Ryan, a member of the insurance auditing firm of Woodward, Fondiller & Ryan of New York to go to Los Angeles to survey and audit the affairs of the International Indemnity Company, and particularly to include in said audit the adequacy of the loss reserve. By virtue of said employment, Ryan went to Los Angeles, where shortly thereafter he was joined by appellants. Max Hayward testified that during the course of Ryan's examination of the affairs of said company Ryan told him it appeared to him that the loss reserves were inadequate. Appellants also informed Max Hayward that Ryan had told them the loss reserves, in his opinion, were inadequate. Dan S. Hammack testified that about March 9, 1928, at a meeting at which appellants were present, they said that according to Ryan's report the reserves were inadequate. Immediately after the said investigation by Ryan was completed, Max Hayward received the following letter from appellants: "Mr. Max E. Hayward, International Indemnity Company, Los Angeles, Cal. Dear Sir: This will formally advise you that option in reference to sale of certain stock in the International Indemnity Co. wherein C. M. Hansen and E. A. Widmann were granted the right on Dec. 8th, 1927, to purchase 23,000 shares—will not for reasons already explained to you and your brother Sam T. Hayward, be exercised, and we hereby make formal demand for return of the $10,000 posted. C. M. Hansen. Our accountant found conditions quite different in many respects, and less advantageous to buyers, than shown by your statement of Sept. 30. Eugene A. Widmann." In answer to this communication Max Hayward wired Hansen refusing to return the $10,000, and Hansen in turn wired him that the amount was too small for a disagreement, and that he was satisfied they would ultimately be of mutual assistance. Thereafter negotiations for the purchase of said shares of stock were renewed, and on March 20, 1928, a written agreement was signed by the respective parties, but the deal was not finally consummated until March 27, 1928. There is some evidence that on March 21, 1928, and before the transaction was completed, appellant Hansen was informed by A. Hall McAllister, the claims manager of the International Indemnity Company, that the loss reserve was inadequate. This was denied by Hansen, who claimed that he had no knowledge of the inadequacy of the loss reserve until after the deal had been closed.

The International Indemnity Company was engaged in the writing of a general fidelity and casualty business. In the course of this business claims would arise, some of which would be adjusted and settled over a period of months, and others were resisted and defended in the courts. At the date of the agreement and negotiations, there were some 8,000 unsettled claims existing against said company. Under these conditions, the estimate of the reserve against loss contained in the statement of September 30, 1927, could not be mathematically calculated, and must have been so understood by appellant Hansen, who possessed wide experience in these matters, since he had been engaged in similar insurance business continually from the year 1907.

[1-3] It seems to be well settled that, where there is any doubt whether a representation was intended and understood as a mere expression of opinion, or a statement of a fact, the question is not one of law, but one of fact for the court or jury. French v. Freeman, 191 Cal. 579, 217 P. 515; Dickey v. Dunn, 80 Cal. App. 724, 252 P. 770; Palladine v. Imperial Valley F. L. Ass'n, 65 Cal. App. 727, 225 P. 291; McKeever v. Locke-Paddon Co., 58 Cal. App. 51, 207 P. 1040; Stockton v. Hind, 51 Cal. App. 131, 196 P. 122. Furthermore, there is evidence that appellants did not rely on the statement of Max Hayward that the equity in the loss reserve was $150,000 as shown by the financial statement of September 30, 1927, but undertook an independent investigation of their own into the affairs of the International Indemnity Company and its loss reserve by employing Ryan, an expert, to make an audit of the affairs of said company, and particularly by direction of appellants was Ryan instructed to include in such audit the adequacy of the loss reserves.

In Maxon-Nowlin Co. v. Norswing, 166 Cal. 509, 137 P. 240, 241, the court used the following language: "To entitle a person to relief or redress because of a false representation, it is well settled that it is not enough to show merely that it was material, that it was known to be false, and that it was made with intent to deceive, but it must also be shown that it actually did mislead and deceive; or, in other words, it was relied upon by the party complaining." [Citing authorities.]

In Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (4th Ed.) § 893, it is said: "If, after a representation of fact, however positive, the party to whom it was made institutes an inquiry for himself, has recourse to the proper means of obtaining information, and actually learns the real facts, he cannot claim to have relied upon the misrepresentation and to have been misled. * * *

One who has actually investigated the truth of the representation, and is given full and fair facilities for doing so, and who acts upon his own judgment and knowledge, cannot be said to rely upon the representation. Colton v. Stanford, 82 Cal. 351-383, 23 P. 16, 16 Am. St. Rep. 137; Spinks v. Clark, 147 Cal. 439, 82 P. 45; San Jose Ranch Co. v. San Jose L. & W. Co., 132 Cal. 582, 64 P. 1097; Shermaster v. California Home Bldg., etc., Co., 40 Cal. App. 661, 181 P. 409. In the instant case Ryan was given full and free access to the records of said company and had full opportunity to examine into its affairs and its loss reserve. We are therefore of the opinion that appellants did not rely upon the representation of Max Hayward that the loss reserve as shown by the financial statement of September 30, 1927, was $150,000.

[4] The note sued upon in this action provides that, in case suit is commenced to collect it, or any part of it, appellants agree to pay such additional sum as the court may find reasonable as attorneys' fees. Appellants claim that the attorneys' fee of $20,000 is excessive. On behalf of respondents, reputable attorneys placed the value of the services rendered by these attorneys at a much larger figure than that allowed by the court. Appellants offered no evidence as to the value of these services. Taking into consideration the sum involved in this case, and that sixty-four days were consumed in the trial, we cannot say that $20,000 was an unreasonable amount to allow respondents as attorneys' fees.

The findings sufficiently cover the issues in this case, and are supported by the evidence. The judgment is affirmed.

Appeals from Superior Court, Alameda County; E. C. Robinson, Judge.

Actions by Helen B. Mitchell, by Henry L. Wissig, and by Nellie M. Booth against S. W. E. Stringer, who filed a cross-complaint. From judgments for defendant except on his cross-complaint in the second case, plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

Ford & Johnson, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Cooley, Crowley & Supple, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

The above actions, consolidated for the purpose of trial, are for damages resulting from injuries received in a collision of two automobiles.

Plaintiff Wissig, the driver of one of the automobiles, was traveling southerly along the Santa Cruz mountain highway. With him, as his guests, were plaintiffs Mitchell and Booth. Respondent was driving an automobile northerly on said highway. The two automobiles collided, resulting in the injuries to plaintiffs and the damage to defendant's automobile. Plaintiffs alleged in their complaints that the collision of said automobiles which resulted in their injuries was caused by the negligence of defendant. The defendant in his answers to the complaints denied that he was negligent, and by his cross-complaint alleged negligence upon the part of plaintiff Wissig and asked judgment for the damages sustained by his automobile. The jury returned a separate verdict in each of the cases in favor of the defendant, except in the Wissig case it returned a verdict against defendant on his cross-complaint. Each of the plaintiffs moved for a new trial and, said motions being denied, separate judgments were rendered in accordance with the verdicts.

The evidence in these cases is conflicting and warrants the jury in finding either for plaintiffs or defendant. Apparently the appeal by Wissig has been abandoned. The one point urged for a reversal in the cases of Mitchell and Booth is that the verdicts of the jury are inconsistent in this: that while the verdict of the jury in the Wissig case was in favor of respondent, by said verdict it also found for Wissig on respondent's cross-complaint. In other words, that while the jury found respondent was not guilty of negligence in the Wissig case, it did find him guilty of negligence on his cross-complaint, and for that reason returned a verdict against him; that therefore Mitchell and Booth, occupying the positions merely as guests of Wissig, were entitled to recover from respondent for the injuries sustained by them. The fault in this contention is that it cannot be said with certainty that the jury, in returning the verdict on the cross-complaint, did so upon the theory that respondent was negligent. Under the instructions the jury, in view of the conflict in the evidence, might well have found that neither Wissig nor respondent was guilty of negligence and this is borne out by the verdict in all three of the actions, where the jury found that respondent was not negligent and where by the verdict on the cross-complaint it found that Wissig was not guilty of negligence. If the verdict was defective, it was the duty of appellants to call the attention of the court to such defects before the jury was discharged in order that it might retire and correct its verdict. By their failure to do this they waived the defects if any existed. Code Civ. Proc. § 619; Asebez v. Bliss, 178

3. Assault and battery Ⓒ35.

Evidence, in action for assault, established prima facie case of authority of person repossessing automobile to represent alleged principal (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subs. 1, 5, 20).

Evidence showed that automobile was owned by company which had offices with alleged principal, that person taking possession of automobile subsequently rightfully used tags prepared by alleged principal for use in repossessing automobiles insured by it where there was default in payments, and that in repossessing automobile he was acting for alleged principal. Such evidence was sufficient because, in absence of controversion, it must be assumed under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subs. 1, 5, 20, that person repossessing automobile was innocent of crime or wrongdoing in using tags or in seizing automobile, that alleged principal possessed evidence as to whether person repossessing automobile was acting for it, and that such evidence was not produced because it would have been unfavorable to it, and that the ordinary course of business was pursued in repossessing automobile and use of tags.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Thomas C. Gould, Judge.

Action by George J. Dooley and Neva Dooley against the West American Commercial Insurance Company and another. From a judgment for plaintiffs, named defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Rex Hardy and Vernon W. Hunt, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Abbott & Ashton, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

ARCHBALD, Justice pro tem.

The complaint herein alleged in substance that defendant Carl C. Vianelli was the agent of the defendant corporation, and that, while acting in that capacity, he assaulted the plaintiff Neva Dooley, injuring her. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs the corporation has appealed.

Appellant contends that (1) the evidence is totally insufficient to prove that at the time of the alleged assault Vianelli was in its employ or acting as its agent; (2) that, irrespective of what the evidence shows as to agency, it does not show that appellant was liable for the assault by Vianelli; and (3) that the amount of the judgment is excessive.

Neva Dooley parked her car in the street at a neighbor's, left the "switch key" therein, and started up the steps to the neighbor's home. As she was about halfway up the porch steps, she saw a man get into the car, afterwards identified as the defendant Vianelli. She thereupon ran to the curb and jumped on the running board of the car. The alleged assault occurred while the car was being driven some three blocks, evidently in an attempt to force her to get off the vehicle. Mrs. Dooley, however, was able to steer the car into a service station, where she was joined by her husband. At this service station Vianelli presented plaintiffs with a card, introduced as Exhibit No. 1, on which appeared the following:

"Complete Automobile and Casualty Cove—ge.

"West American Commercial Insurance Company.

"I. W. Langeloh Trinity 66S1

"Claims Department 201 Roosevelt Building "Los Angeles.

"by Carl C. Vianelli."

The last line was in pencil, the balance of the card being printed. Defendant corporation refused to stipulate to the agency of Vianelli, and objected to any conversation had with plaintiffs on the ground that the same was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, hearsay, and no foundation laid. The court, on promise that the agency would be shown, permitted the conversation to be detailed. Vianelli asked the husband if he were Mr. Dooley, to which the latter replied: "Yes; what is coming off here?" Mrs. Dooley then said: "This man is stealing the car," to which Vianelli replied: "No, I am not. I am a representative of the West American Insurance Company, and I am repossessing the car." Mr. Dooley then asked Vianelli to identify himself as the man named on the card, which he did by producing an American Legion card. The automobile was then taken to the garage of one H. D. Tapley by Vianelli and Mrs. Dooley, where Vianelli presented a tag to Tapley, which on one side contained a check of the car equipment and on the reverse side the following:

"West American Commercial Insurance Co.
201 Roosevelt Bldg. Los Angeles
Telephone Trinity 6681

"Claim No. 27927 No. 2071

"Geo. J. Dooley—C D C

"Assured

"11941 1609 Worthington Ave.

"Dealer

"Make

"A 533-526 Ford Cpt. 3 N 2903
"Motor No. License No.

"This automobile is stored with you for our account. Deliver same only upon our order or the surrender of other part of this check.

"Placed in Storage by (Signed)

"Carl E. Vianelli."

The witness Tapley testified that on the day the car was taken from the garage, and the storage, gasoline, and oil paid for, he was given another tag, which also contained a check of the car equipment and description of same as on the first card, but in lieu of the storage order contained on the first tag was the following:

"Place of Storage

"Upon payment of your charges, this authorizes you to deliver to bearer the above mentioned automobile, and this will act as our receipt for the same.

"West American Commercial
Insurance Co.

"By [Signed] Carl C. Vianelli

"Receipt must be signed by authorized agent of this Company."

With regard to the second tag Tapley testified: "It is a part of the same card, I suppose. They correspond in number and also in tear." The car was evidently not taken from the garage by Vianelli, but by "a man with a star."

In buying the car on installment payments, and when he was given the machine, Dooley was handed an "Instalment Coupon Book" which requested him to make payments "without notice" to "Commercial Discount Company, 201 Roosevelt Building," Los Angeles, which, it is to be observed, is also the address of appellant as given on the cards and tags above mentioned. The coupon book also contained, immediately after the last coupon, the following:

"Lest You Forget

" * * * The renewal date of your insurance policy is near at hand.

" * * * To act now on this reminder with instructions to us for its renewal will insure continuous protection.

" * * * It has been a privilege to serve you in the past, and we will value the opportunity to continue as your source of protection.

" * * * May we have your renewal instructions now that you will be certain of continuous protection.

"West American Commercial
Insurance Co.

"Home Office, Roosevelt Building,
Los Angeles."

There is evidence from which it might be concluded that Dooley was in default in his payments and had changed his place of residence.

At the trial, the defendant corporation presented some five witnesses for the purpose of testifying as to the character of plaintiffs. Most of them testified that the reputation of Mr. Dooley for truth, honesty, and integrity in the community in which he lived was bad, but they did not testify as to that of Mrs. Dooley, and the court remarked, in summing up the case: "We are concerned primarily with the testimony, of course, of Mrs. Dooley and not Mr. Dooley."

[1, 2] 1. Unquestionably, the mere declaration of a person that he is the agent of another is not, in and of itself, competent evidence of the agency, unless made in the presence of, or communicated to, and acquiesced in by, the principal. Union Construction Co. v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 163 Cal. 298, 125 P. 242. Where, however, prima facie evidence of such agency is shown, such declarations are admissible. Union Const. Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co., supra. In the case cited it was held that, where one had called defendant's office by telephone, and in answer to his inquiry was told that it was the office of defendant, there was prima facie proof "that the person answering was the agent of defendant at its said office, employed there by it to receive for it such communications as should come in that manner," and that "all of these conditions were shown to exist upon the trial of the case, either by direct evidence or by fair and reasonable inference, or as matters of judicial knowledge."

[3] In our opinion, the evidence in this case, as well as inferences fairly to be drawn therefrom, establishes a prima facie case of authority to represent appellant on the part of Vianelli in taking possession of plaintiffs' automobile. It appears therefrom that the contract covering the car belonged to Commercial Discount Company, which company had offices in the same suite with appellant, the insurance carrier of said car; that Vianelli in storing said car, after taking possession, rightfully used tags prepared by appellant for use in repossessing cars insured by it where there was default in payments and apparent "wrongful conversion, embezzlement or secretion" of such property, and that he was acting as the agent of appellant in making such repossession. In the absence of controversion, we must assume, under section 1963 of the Code of Civil Procedure, that Vianelli was innocent of crime or wrong in the use of such tags and in seizing such car (subdivision 1), and that the ordinary course of business was pursued by him in so doing (subdivision 20); and we are of the opinion, in view of the fact that appellant must have possessed evidence as to whether or not Vianelli was acting for it in so doing, which evidence was not produced at the trial although appellant defended the action, that such suppressed evidence would have been adverse to it had it been in fact produced (subdivision 5).

[4] 2. Granting appellant's contention that Vianelli, being in possession of the car, had the right to use all force necessary to protect himself or his property, still we are of the opinion that, considering all the evidence in the case, the court was justified in concluding that his actions were not justified and that they constituted an assault.

[5] 3. Appellant urges that the judgment is excessive. Mrs. Dooley testified that Vianelli hit her in the mouth, pinched her on the arms, tore her dress in front, that she was dragged for about two blocks, with first one foot and then the other on the ground, before she could get back on the car, that Vianelli choked her while she was on the running board, and that she was in bed a little over a week because thereof. Dr. Scott, who was called to see Mrs. Dooley the day of the accident, testified that she appeared to be suffering greatly from pains in the lower part of the spine and in the left knee; that the pain in the left knee apparently left between his visit on the 6th of October and his visit on the 10th, but that the pain in the spine persisted and that the patient still complained of it. The doctor gave osteopathic treatment to relax congested muscles and relieve the pain. He made seven visits to the home, and Mrs. Dooley called at his office seventeen times. In addition, her testimony shows that she was still under treatment. The doctor described seven scratches on Mrs. Dooley's right arm above the elbow, and twenty-three scratches on the left arm between the elbow and wrist, as well as the imprint of fingers on the right forearm "as if the four fingers had been compressed deeply there." He further testified that there were "black and blue spots on the left shoulder, a large discolored area, black and blue, on the lower part of the spine, over the left hip," a "decided mark across the front [of the] right leg between the knee and the ankle," and "a bruising of the lower lip on the right hand side." There were many scratches on her forearms, and one about the middle of the back, four or five inches long, "evidently where the dress had been torn," which were apparently made by a young lady companion of Vianelli, who was trying to assist him in getting the car away from Mrs. Dooley.

We cannot say that under such evidence a judgment of $1,250 is so grossly disproportionate to any reasonable compensation for the injuries sustained as to raise a presumption that it is based on prejudice or passion instead of sober judgment. Counsel for appellant cites as authority for the action desired the case of Ware v. McPherson, 63 Cal. App. Dec. 1063. The opinion in that case does not appear in the bound volumes of the California Appellate Reports for the reason that on a hearing granted by the Supreme Court of such case the latter tribunal came to a different conclusion from that reached by the District Court of Appeal. 213 Cal. 120, 1 P. (2d) 433. It is only fair to counsel to say, however, that the opinion last cited was handed down after appellant's brief was filed herein.

Judgment affirmed.

Generally, greater care must be exercised for protection of young children than for adults.

3. Schools and school districts ⇨122.

Negligence of principal of school who, in operating school bus, stopped on traveled portion of pavement on side opposite boy's home, and apparently failed to give boy warning of rapidly approaching automobile, held question for jury in action for injuries to 10½ year old boy struck by approaching car while crossing highway.

The evidence disclosed that the injured boy was of an impulsive nature, and that, when he left the bus, he started for home on the run, and principal knew it was the custom of the children to walk along the side of the bus to the rear end before crossing the highway, so that their view of approaching machine was obscured by the bus.

4. Automobiles ⇨245(74).

Contributory negligence of 10½ year old boy struck by automobile while running across highway without looking, after alighting from school bus, held question for jury in action against school district for negligent failure to warn.

5. Automobiles ⇨223(3).

Child of tender years need not exercise same care in looking for approaching vehicles as adults.

6. Negligence ⇨141(10).

Questions of negligence of young children are generally for jury's determination.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by Grover Shannon, individually and as guardian ad litem for Samuel Shannon, against the Central-Gaither Union School District and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; SHENK, J., dissenting.

Len H. Honey, of Stockton, and Loyd E. Hewitt, of Yuba City, for appellants.

Rich, Weis & Carlin, of Marysville, and Arthur Coats, of Yuba City, for respondents.

Mr. Justice R. L. THOMPSON delivered the opinion of the court.

The plaintiff's ten and a half year old boy was struck and seriously injured by a passing automobile while he was crossing the highway from the school bus to his home. Suit for damages was brought against the school district and the trustees. A jury returned a verdict of $1,109.40 against the defendants. From the judgment, which was accordingly rendered, they have appealed.

It is claimed the evidence fails to prove negligence on the part of the defendants or their driver of the school bus, and, on the contrary, that the boy's contributory negligence is established as a matter of law.

The plaintiff, Grover Shannon, lives on the river road in Sutter county near Tudor. His residence adjoins the public highway in a rural district. The highway has an 18-foot paved strip with wide receding shoulders. It is straight and level at this point. There is ample room for a vehicle to park on the shoulders of the roadway without resting the wheels on the concrete pavement. The plaintiff's young son Samuel and his daughter Barbara, who was a couple of years older, had attended the Central-Gaither Union School for several years. The district operated a school bus by means of which the pupils were conveyed to and from school. At the time of the accident, the regular bus driver was absent, and Mr. Manners, the principal of the school, was engaged in driving the bus. Six children ranging from ten to fourteen years of age were riding in the conveyance. The machine was 22 feet in length with doors on the sides near the front of the vehicle. Mr. Manners stopped the bus across the highway opposite the Shannon home. The machine was parked with two-thirds of its width overlapping the concrete pavement contrary to section 136 of the California Vehicle Act (as amended by St. 1931, p. 2128, § 50), although the driver admitted "there was no difficulty to drive off if I had driven off" the pavement. Before he opened the door for the Shannon children to leave the bus, he saw a machine approaching on the highway from in front. He said it was then 100 or 150 yards away and traveling toward them at the rate of about 40 miles an hour. Neither of the children saw or heard this approaching machine. He knew it was the custom of the children to leave the conveyance and walk along the side to the rear end of the bus before crossing the highway. Their view of the approaching machine was thus obscured by the intervening bus. Although Manners testified that he warned the Shannon children of the approaching machine, all six of the children who were riding in the bus denied that they heard any such warning. Mrs. Shannon also testified that, when Manners carried her boy into the house after the accident occurred, he said to her, "I have warned them repeatedly, and this time I failed to warn them." There was therefore a conflict of evidence regarding the warning. Barbara preceded her brother across the highway. Samuel reached a point about halfway across the paved portion of the highway, when his sister suddenly observed the approaching car and the danger which threatened him. The car was driven by a Filipino. It had reached a point nearly opposite the bus. She called to her brother, who, for the first time, saw the machine. He stopped and turned too late to escape. He was struck and dragged a considerable distance before the Filipino's car was stopped. The child was rendered unconscious and suffered severe injuries. The doctor testified that he received ruptures of both a kidney and the liver. Injury to the nerves of one leg left a weakened condition of the limb. He suffered from severe shock and hemorrhage. Blood transfusion was necessary to restore his strength. He was confined to the hospital at Sacramento for nearly a month.

The plaintiff Grover Shannon brought suit against the school district and its trustees for the medical and hospital expenses incurred as a result of the accident. As guardian of his minor son, he also asked for damages for the injuries suffered. The answer denies the charges of negligence against the defendants, and affirmatively alleges that the injuries were sustained as the proximate result of the boy's contributory negligence. The cause was tried with a jury. The following verdict was returned: "We, the jury, find our verdict in favor of the plaintiff Grover Shannon and fix his damages in the sum of $1,109.40, and we find our verdict in favor of the plaintiff Samuel Shannon and fix his damages in the sum of $——."

A judgment for that sum was accordingly rendered. From this judgment the defendants have appealed.

Three questions are raised on this appeal. The respondent contends the driver of a school bus which conveys only the pupils of its school is, nevertheless, a common carrier of passengers which must be operated with the "utmost care and diligence" under the provisions of section 2100 of the Civil Code. The appellants assert that the evidence fails to support the judgment, for the reason that it does not appear the driver of the bus was guilty of negligence, and that upon the contrary the record discloses the fact to be that the injured boy was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.

[1] We are of the opinion that a bus which is operated only for the convenience of a particular school under the circumstances of this case is a mere private carrier as distinguished from a common carrier, and that ordinary prudence for the safety of children under similar circumstances is all that is required of the district or the driver of the bus. Gornstein v. Priver, 64 Cal. App. 249, 221 P. 396; Klein v. Baker, 112 Cal. App. 157, 296 P. 631; 4 Cal. Jur., 815, § 2. Section 2168 of the Civil Code defines common carriers as follows: "Every one who offers to the public to carry persons, property, or messages, excepting only telegraphic messages, is a common carrier of whatever he thus offers to carry."

Section 2096 of the same Code provides that: "A carrier of persons without reward must use ordinary care and diligence for their safe carriage."

In the case of State v. Nelson, 65 Utah, 457, 238 P. 237, as it is reported in 42 A. L. R., note, at page 855, this statement of the law is found: "One who operates a bus or stage in accordance with the terms of a contract, for the benefit of a particular class, and not for the benefit of the public generally, is not a common carrier."

In 6 Words and Phrases, Third Series, 118, the following distinction between common and private carriers is expressed. The quotation is with reference to Orr & Lanning v. Boockholdt, 10 Ala. App. 331, 65 So. 430. It is there said: "The distinction between a 'common carrier' of passengers and a 'private carrier' is that the former must receive all who apply for passage so long as there is room and no legal excuse for refusing, while such duty does not rest on the latter."

Since a school bus is operated for the sole convenience of the pupils of a particular school, and there is no legal obligation for it to carry passengers generally or even to carry the pupils of other schools, it may not be deemed to be a common carrier of passengers, and the highest degree of care and diligence in its operation is therefore not required. We assume that the defendants in the present action are liable only for failure to exercise ordinary care and prudence for the safety of their pupils under the particular circumstances of this case.

[2] There is ample evidence to support the implied finding of the jury to the effect that the driver of the school bus was guilty of negligence, under the circumstances of this case, which proximately contributed to the injuries of the child. It is ordinarily necessary to exercise greater care for the protection and safety of young children than for an adult person who possesses normal and mature faculties. One should anticipate thoughtlessness and impulsiveness in the conduct of a young child. In Victory Sparkler & Specialty Co. v. Latimer (C. C. A.) 53 F. (2d) 3, it is said: "One dealing with children must anticipate ordinary behavior of children."

And likewise it is said in 45 C. J. 702, § 78: "The known characteristics of children should, * * * be taken into consideration in determining whether or not sufficient care for the safety of a child has been exercised in a particular case. Accordingly, the fact that children cannot and do not ordinarily exercise the same degree of prudence and care for their own safety as adults imposes upon those by whose acts or omissions a child may be injured an obligation of exercising more vigilance and caution than might be sufficient with respect to an adult, and conduct which might reach the standard of ordinary care with respect to an adult might, in the case of a child, amount to negligence."

[3] The question of the negligence of the defendants in the present case should therefore be determined with due regard to all the surrounding circumstances, including the age, mentality, and childish impulses of the injured boy. The boy was but ten and a half years of age. He was full of life and activity. He was addicted to hilarious pranks. He was armed with a sling shot which he carried in his trousers' pocket at the time of the accident. The moment he left the bus he started for home on the run. He was just the sort of an eager, active boy that lacks deliberation. The principal who drove the bus had charge of the boy in school. He must have known of his impulsive temperament, yet the record contains evidence which warranted the jury in assuming that Manners permitted the child to leave the bus and dart back behind the vehicle to cross the highway without warning him of the rapidly approaching machine which was but a short distance away.

The evidence presents the following questions regarding the negligence of the driver of the bus: Was he justified in stopping the school bus on the side of the roadway opposite the children's residence, requiring them to cross the traffic of the highway to reach their home? Did the parking of the bus at the roadside so as to overlap the traveled portion of the pavement some 4 feet, in violation of the statute, increase the danger to the children and proximately contribute to the accident? It may be reasonably assumed that, if Manners had complied with the statute and had parked the bus on the shoulder, as he admitted he might have done, there would have been more space after passing the rear end of the bus within which to discover the approaching machine. Finally, with full appreciation of the youthful immaturity of the boy, with knowledge of his impulsive temperament and his habit of darting to the rear of the bus to cross the highway, it is important to determine whether it was negligent for the driver of the bus to permit the child to leave the machine without warning him of the danger of the rapidly approaching car. These are all questions of fact to be determined by the jury. In view of the conflict of evidence, the court may not resolve these questions in favor of the defendants as mere matters of law. From the verdict it must be inferred the jury found that the driver of the bus was guilty of negligence with respect to one or more of the foregoing acts or omissions and that this negligence proximately contributed to the injuries which were sustained by the child.

[4, 5] The remaining problem is whether the admission of the boy to the effect that he did not look for approaching machines before he attempted to cross the highway constitutes contributory negligence under the circumstances of this case. We conclude that the question of the contributory negligence of a ten and a half year old boy under the circumstances of this case was a problem for the determination of the jury, with the solution of which this court may not interfere on appeal.

The appellants contend that the admission of the boy that he failed to look for approaching machines before he attempted to cross the highway is conclusive proof of his contributory negligence as a matter of law. On cross-examination which was conducted by appellants' attorney, Mr. Honey, the following record appears:

"Q. You knew better than to run across the road without looking to see if any machine was coming? A. Yes sir.

"Q. You knew if you did that you were likely to get hit? A. Yes.

"Q. You just ran across there without looking this time? A. Yes sir.

"Q. That's all."

Without any disposition to criticize counsel, this reads like the ingenious examination of a skillful attorney. It indicates the obliging answers of a timid youth who is unfamiliar with the solemn proceedings of a courtroom. It is significant that, when these favorable answers were elicited from the boy, the subject was immediately and wisely abandoned by the attorney. The jury observed the boy upon the stand and the adroit manner in which he was examined. They were better able to determine the weight and effect of these admissions. In view of the serious result of the accident, it is not surprising that he should admit after much subsequent thought over the matter that he knew he was likely to get hit if he attempted to cross the highway. And the last alluring question, "You just ran across there without looking this time?" probably propounded with a friendly smile, naturally induced the reply, "Yes sir." Of course, it is material to know whether the boy actually did thoughtlessly run onto the highway without looking. It seems quite likely he did not look in the direction from which the automobile came or he would have seen the machine. This failure to look for approaching machines might be deemed to furnish conclusive evidence of contributory negligence on the part of an adult person. But the same degree of care is not required of a child of tender years. In the case of Oberholzer v. Hubbell, 36 Cal. App. 16, 171 P. 436, it was held that the failure of an adult person of mature judgment to look for approaching machines at the intersection of cross streets did not constitute contributory negligence so as to defeat her right to recover damages as the result of an automobile collision. The court there said: "It was developed upon the cross-examination of the plaintiff that there was nothing to obstruct her view or that of her husband of the approach of the defendant's automobile; that neither she nor her husband looked to see if other vehicles were approaching; and that if they had looked in the direction from which the defendant's automobile approached they could have seen it and 'would have stopped.'"

Notwithstanding these facts, a judgment in favor of the plaintiff was affirmed on appeal, and a rehearing was denied by the Supreme Court. Contributory negligence was an issue in that case. This merely means that the mere failure to look for machines before one crosses a highway does not necessarily charge him with contributory negligence. This failure should be considered with all the other facts and circumstances of the case in determining whether one is guilty of contributory negligence.

In the present case the failure of the child to look for approaching machines is of much less consequence than it appears to have been in the Oberholzer Case. That case involved the crossing of a busy thoroughfare of a city street by intelligent adult persons. The present case involves the crossing of a highway in a rural district with scarcely any traffic in sight. The boy who is charged with negligence was but ten and a half years of age. He possessed a child's mind and thoughtless disregard of unseen dangers. The intervening autobus concealed his view of the highway until he emerged from behind the vehicle. In spite of the admissions contained in the foregoing evidence, the question of his contributory negligence was a problem for the determination of the jury. It does not constitute negligence as a matter of law, under the circumstances of this case.

[6] The question of the negligence of a child of tender years is usually and naturally a problem for the determination of a jury. Almost uniformly the question of the negligence of young children is considered a problem for the decision of a jury. In the case of Loftus v. Dehail, 133 Cal. 214, 65 P. 379, 380, relied upon by the appellants, it was not decided that the infant child of seven years of age was guilty of contributory negligence in falling into an open, unguarded cesspool which was maintained on the property of the defendants. The court said: "She was pushed in, in a fit of temper, by her younger brother. His act was the proximate cause of the injury." Upon this theory, that case was decided. It has no bearing on the present suit.

The rule applicable to the question of the responsibility for the negligence of a child is clearly stated in 5-6 Huddy's Encyclopedia of Automobile Law, 195, § 116, as follows: "Children of very tender years are not chargeable in law with contributory negligence; and if children are sui juris, so that contributory negligence may be attributed to them, judgment is not passed on their conduct with the same strictness as in the case of adults. Children are not regarded as possessing the same mental capacity to appreciate the dangers incident to the use of the public thoroughfares as those of mature age. What is required of a child is that it shall exercise the same degree of care as would ordinarily be exercised by a reasonably careful child of the same age and intelligence under like circumstances; and this rule applies in the absence of evidence on the subject of his intelligence. This requirement as to care may, of course, result in a finding that a child was guilty of negligence which contributed to its injury. Generally the negligence of the child is a question for the jury."

To the same effect is the text found in 1 Thompson on Negligence, 292, §§ 310-313. This is but a sensible and humane doctrine. It would be unreasonable to judge of the responsibility of a child for its conduct and acts upon the same rules which are applicable to an adult person of mature intelligence. See, also, Rosenberg v. Durfee, 87 Cal. 545, 26 P. 793. Likewise in the case of Sanders v. Toberman, 192 Cal. 13, 218 P. 394, in affirming the order of court granting a new trial in a suit for damages for the killing of an eight year old boy while he was crossing a street, in which a verdict was rendered in favor of the defendant, the court said: "The question as to whether or not a child of eight years was guilty of negligence is ordinarily a question of fact to be determined by the jury, notwithstanding the fact that the child may have done things which in an adult would be held contributory negligence as a matter of law. Mayne v. San Diego Elec. Ry. Co., 179 Cal. 173, 175 P. 690, and cases there cited. See, also, Cahill v. E. B. & A. L. Stone Co., 167 Cal. 126, 139, 138 P. 712. It is sufficient for the purposes of this appeal to say that the accident occurred at the intersection of two streets on one of which the defendant was traveling with his automobile, and that the deceased child was attempting to draw a little wagon across the street, accompanied by his sister. The question of whether or not the child was negligent in failing to exercise due caution in observing the traffic at the street intersection was a question for the jury to determine under proper instructions."

We are persuaded the same principle which is above stated applies to the case at bar. There is ample evidence to support the implied finding of the jury in this case to the effect that the child was not guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, in spite of his admission that he failed to look for approaching machines before he attempted to cross the highway.

The appellants were very fully protected by elaborate, forcible, and favorable instructions which were given to the jury at their request upon every possible defense to the action.

The judgment is affirmed.

MEADS v. WARNE.
Civ. 4922.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

June 26, 1933.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 24, 1933.

Certiorari ⇨ 28(2).

Certiorari held not to lie to review affirmation by superior court of judgment of small claims court, since by appealing to superior court petitioner submitted to jurisdiction of that court though small claims court had no jurisdiction.

Petition by O. E. Meads for writ of certiorari to the Superior Court of Calaveras County, J. T. B. Warne, Judge Pro Tempore, to annul a judgment of affirmation on appeal from the Small Claims Court.

Judgment of Superior Court affirmed.

A. H. Carpenter, of Stockton, for petitioner.

Virgil M. Airola, Dist. Atty., of San Andreas, for respondent.

Mr. Presiding Justice PULLEN delivered the opinion of the court.

An action was commenced against O. E. Meads as defendant in the small claims court of San Andreas township, county of Calaveras, for the recovery of an amount within the jurisdiction of that court.

The defendant appeared and after the taking of testimony upon behalf of both sides, a judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff and against the defendant therein.

Thereafter the defendant appealed from the judgment of the small claims court to the superior court of Calaveras county, and there answering, objected to the jurisdiction of the court to proceed with the matter on the ground that defendant was not at the time of commencement of the action in the small claims court, and never was a resident of San Andreas township, but was at the commencement of the action, and at the time of the appeal was, a resident of the county of San Joaquin. Upon that issue and special appearance, the superior court found against the defendant Meads and judgment was entered accordingly. Thereupon defendant Meads sought by this writ of review to test the jurisdiction of the court and the validity of the judgment so given.

Petitioner contends that the small claims court had no jurisdiction of the action against him. Let us, without determining that fact, assume that to be true; nevertheless by the taking of the appeal to the superior court the defendant submitted himself to the jurisdiction of that tribunal, and the issues there presented having been determined by a court having jurisdiction, a writ of review will not lie to this court.

The case of De Matel v. Superior Court, 74 Cal. App. 147, 239 P. 853, 854, arose from a justice's court in Lake county wherein an action was brought for goods sold and delivered. The complaint was served on one of the petitioners in the city and county of San Francisco. No allegation was contained in the complaint that any of the defendants were residents of the county of Lake nor that defendants or either of them, contracted in writing to perform the obligation in the county of Lake. In due time the petitioner moved to quash the service of summons claiming the court had no jurisdiction. The justice's court ruled against petitioner, and he, refusing to proceed further, his default was entered. From said judgment by default peitioner appealed to the superior court and in time that court affirmed the ruling of the justice's court. Thereupon petitioner by a writ of certiorari sought to review the judgment of the superior court, claiming that court acted in excess of its jurisdiction.

Mr. Justice Hart, for the court, said:

"In the present case, even if, in point of fact, it be true, as is the claim, that the justice's court never acquired jurisdiction of the persons of the petitioners, the latter certainly submitted themselves or their persons to the jurisdiction of the respondent court by the very act of taking the appeal from the judgment of the justice's court. If this were not true, there would be presented the very novel and, indeed, absurd, situation in which the superior court, in the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction in the case, would be limited to the doing of one of two things, viz.: Reverse the judgment or dismiss the action. In truth, the necessary assumption of the petitioners herein is that the superior court has jurisdiction to reverse the judgment, but is without jurisdiction to affirm it, the practical effect of which position is that, in such a situation as is presented here, the appellant would have it in his power to control the discretion of the superior court in the decision of the appeal. Or, as one of our cases has well interpreted a like position taken by the appellant on an appeal from the justice's court to the superior court, he thus was asking the Supreme Court to restrain the superior court 'from trying (and determining) the appeal which he was prosecuting.' Sanborn v. Superior Court, 60 Cal. 425.

"But it is well settled, at least in this state, that the writ of certiorari will not lie 'to review the judgment of a justice's court after appeal taken and determined in the Superior Court.' Olcese v. Justice's Court, 156 Cal. 82, 86, 103 P. 317. * * * It was held therein that the defendant in the justice's court, by taking an appeal to the superior court, submitted his person to the jurisdiction of said court; that said court, being one of general jurisdiction and empowered to pass upon the law and the facts of the case, its determination thereof was res adjudicata and operated as an estoppel. It is further stated in that case that an appeal from a justice's court is tantamount to a writ of error, and that to sanction the review of the decision of the superior court on the appeal would in effect amount to the entertainment of a second writ of error aimed at the judgment of the justice's court, a procedure which is, of course, not allowable. See, also, American Law Book Co. v. Superior Court, 164 Cal. 327, 128 P. 921; Albers v. Superior Court, 30 Cal. App. 772, 775, 159 P. 453; Bogmuda v. Young, 58 Cal. App. 19, 207 P. 915."

This court, in the case of Behrens et al., Petitioners v. Superior Court, 23 P.(2d) 428, had a somewhat similar situation under consideration, and there authorities which are applicable to this case are assembled and considered.

We are therefore of the opinion that petitioner, having submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the superior court, has had his day, and we cannot through a writ of certiorari again review the issues presented by him.

The judgment of the superior court is affirmed.

We concur: R. L. THOMPSON, J.; PLUMMER, J.

DESMOND, Justice pro tem.

The defendant, convicted by a jury of first degree burglary, seeks a reversal on the grounds of insufficiency of the evidence, refusal of the court to give one of his requested instructions, and the admission of certain evidence hereinafter mentioned in some detail. The appeal is also from the order of the trial court denying a new trial.

[1] The complaining witness, one Anderson, had a room upon the sixth floor of a hotel in Los Angeles. Shortly after midnight of February 2, 1933, he went to bed, leaving his trousers on a chair in his room. In a pocket of his trousers was a single-fold wallet containing a $10 bill, a $5 bill, and a check. The bills were folded once. The house officer of this hotel, one Brophy, testified as follows: While he was making his rounds at 5:50 a. m. February 3d, he saw the defendant in his stocking feet back out of Anderson's room and slowly and quietly close the door; that at this time witness was only eight or ten feet away from the defendant, who then passed within a foot of him and bounded up two flights of stairs, the officer pursuing, but failing to see him in the hallway when he reached the eighth floor, hearing one of the doors in that hall shut just before he reached the top of the stairs. Brophy then went back to the sixth floor, entered Anderson's room and awakened him. Anderson found that his wallet was gone. Brophy then returned to the eighth floor, summoned the elevator operator and the two went to the defendant's room on that floor and knocked for admittance. Before the knock was answered, both these witnesses, according to their testimony, heard the toilet in defendant's room flushed several times. Brophy searched the defendant upon entering his room and in his side trousers pocket found a $10 bill and a $5 bill folded once. Mr. Morey, the manager of the hotel, was summoned to the room, and later Brophy went down to the sixth floor, where Anderson had remained meanwhile, and then both of them went back to the defendant's room at about 6:20 a. m., according to Anderson. Two police officers entered shortly afterward, and the defendant was searched again by one of them, who found $23 in bills in defendant's watch pocket near the belt strap of his trousers. In the water at the bottom of the toilet in defendant's bathroom, Brophy found two keys of unusual make, characterized by one of the officers as "picks." No wallet was found upon the person of the defendant, but one of the officers, going to a window in defendant's room, focused a powerful flash-light on the roof of a garage building about 30 feet below defendant's bedroom window, and there saw an object which later proved to be Anderson's wallet. The other officer went down to the third floor of the hotel, and there gaining access to the garage roof from a window directly below the window of defendant's room, picked up the wallet, and, on a second trip, the check, which belonged to Anderson and which had been in his wallet when he went to bed. Other officers were called in, and one of them, Jones, handcuffed the defendant, took him to Anderson's room, and in the presence of defendant, using the "picks" which Brophy had found, succeeded in opening Anderson's door, although it was locked at the time with the room key. Anderson testified that he had locked his door upon retiring.

The defendant testified that he had gone to bed in his room between 9:30 and 10:30 p. m. of February 2d, and had never been out of his room up to the time Brophy knocked upon his door shortly before 6 a. m. the following morning, which defendant estimated was about 45 minutes after he arose and dressed. He was fully dressed at the time he admitted Brophy.

[2] It is not contended that upon the facts above related the evidence is insufficient to support a verdict of burglary, but appellant argues that there was no evidence placed before the jury upon which they could base a verdict of first degree burglary, and suggests that this court has power under section 1181, subd. 6, Penal Code, if satisfied that the evidence was sufficient to fix the crime of burglary upon the defendant, to modify the judgment in such manner as to establish the offense as second degree burglary. The question on this point then resolves itself into this: Was there evidence upon which the jury could find beyond a reasonable doubt that Anderson's room was entered before sunrise? This is a question of fact, and, having in mind that the offense, according to the testimony, was committed early in February at 5:50 in the morning, and that when Anderson went to the defendant's room at about 6:20 it was necessary for the officer, in order to survey the roof of the adjoining garage building, to use a flash-light, we see no reason to disturb the finding of the jury upon that point. Neither did the trial court, empowered as it was to take judicial notice of the exact minute when the sun rose on February 3, 1933. 10 Cal. Jur. 720; People v. Mayes, 113 Cal. 618, 625, 45 P. 860.

[3] Appellant predicates error upon the court's refusal to give the following instruction, as copied from the record: "Defendant's Instruction No. 2. The court instructs the jury that I need hardly say to you that an effective alibi is a perfect defense and that all effort to make it effective is entitled to the same serious and earnest consideration upon the evidence that you are expected to give to any other material element of the case involved. The defense of an alibi stands upon the same footing as any other defense which the law recognizes as a legitimate one, and it may be and often is the first and only refuge of the innocent. Refused—covered Hahn." If for no other reason, the proposed instruction was properly refused because of the apparent fact that in effect its language constitutes an argument combined with an erroneous statement of the law. We cannot agree with the statement that "the defense of an alibi stands upon the same footing as any other defense." One difference was noted by this court in People v. Vasquez, 93 Cal. App. 448, at page 452, 269 P. 549, 550, where the degree of proof required to establish insanity as a valid defense is contrasted with the proof which, in connection with a claimed alibi, is sufficient to secure an acquittal. We observe the word "covered" in the notation upon this instruction, and it may be that the trial court was under the impression that another instruction upon the specific subject of alibi had been given. We also observe that among the instructions given were several marked merely "Refused" and several marked "Refused—covered." Possibly through inadvertence or mistake the word "covered" was entered upon this particular instruction. At any rate, since it does not state a correct principle of law, it cannot be said that it was improperly refused. Therefore no error arises.

[4] In regard to the remaining contention, that the court erroneously permitted testimony to go to the jury relative to prior arrests of this defendant, we have reviewed the evidence bearing on this subject, and find that the first mention of it was made by Officer Jones under direct examination when, in detailing certain conversations had with the defendant after his arrest, he said, as to one of them "about ten or fifteen minutes later I took him around to the fingerprint bureau and got a record card. He said, 'Well, this is a bum break. It is a bad beef.' He said 'This is my thirteenth pinch on a Friday, with a $2 bill in my pocket.'" No objection was made to the introduction of this testimony, nor was there a motion to strike the answer. On the contrary, under cross-examination information was elicited from this witness, to the effect that the card in question was in fact the record card of the defendant and showed that under three aliases, all differing from the name Masters, he had been arrested twelve times, four times upon suspicion of burglary. This conversation having been gone into in such detail upon cross-examination, the court permitted the respondent to inquire upon redirect examination as to whether any portion of the conversation in question had been omitted. The proceedings becoming somewhat confused, the learned judge took a hand in the examination, but we are satisfied that his purpose was to clarify the situation as to the particular conversation and the time when it was held; the ruling being that, since inquiry had been made under cross-examination as to the conversation, the jury was entitled to hear it all. Section 1854, Code Civ. Proc. No objection was made at any time that the inquiries of the court and the district attorney related to matters incompetent, irrelevant, or immaterial, but merely that the questions were not proper upon redirect examination. As to this objection, the following statement is pertinent: "It frequently happens that evidence which might be inadmissible under strict rules is nevertheless introduced into the case through inadvertence or otherwise, under which circumstances it is held that the adverse party is entitled to introduce evidence on the same matters lest he be prejudiced, the rule being that the party who first introduces evidence which is irrelevant to the issues cannot assign error on the admission of evidence from the adverse party relating to the same matter." 22 Cor. Jur. p. 195, Evidence, § 163.

We fail to find any error in this record which, in our opinion, worked prejudicially to the rights of the defendant.

Judgment and order affirmed.

Orbison & Irwin, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

ARCHBALD, Justice pro tem.

Appellant was accused by the district attorney of Los Angeles county, in an information consisting of two counts, of burglary. The first count alleged that appellant entered the office of Dr. H. B. Griffin, located at 5107 Hollywood boulevard, with intent to commit theft. The count also charged three prior convictions. The second count contained a similar allegation on the same day, in entering the offices of Dr. Donald H. Wilkins, located at 4471 Sunset boulevard. By another information appellant was charged with a violation of the state Narcotic and Drug Act, on the same day, in having in his possession a preparation of morphine containing more than one-fourth grain of morphine to the avoirdupois ounce, in violation of said act. This information also alleged three prior convictions. A jury was waived and the two cases consolidated for trial before the court. The court found defendant guilty on all counts of both informations. From the judgment of conviction and the order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant appealed.

Both doctors are dentists. The office of Dr. Griffin is located in a building at the northwest corner of Normandie and Hollywood boulevard in Los Angeles. On January 8, 1933, at about 7 p. m. one Joe Meyer, who was standing on the southwest corner of said street, opposite said building, had his attention directed to the offices of Dr. Griffin, across the street by "the flashlight I seen running up and down the wall." Accompanied by Eugene Barner and Ed Pugh, the janitor of the building, they went to Dr. Griffin's office, opened the door, walked in, and turned on the lights. Just as they did this appellant came out of the dentist's laboratory. Appellant said he wished to see the doctor, as he had a toothache. The doctor was called and treated the tooth. Appellant was asked by Meyer what he was doing with the flashlight, to which he replied that "he used it in his car." Two officers came and questioned appellant. Officer Workman asked him "if he did not think it was an unusual hour to be 'in a dentist's office, that time of the night, Sunday evening, when there was no one there,' and he said, 'Well,' he thought 'maybe it did look rather unusual, but he had a toothache and wanted to see a dentist to have his tooth treated.'" Nothing was missing from the office, but after appellant left with the officers, Dr. Griffin found that gold that was "in several different places" in his laboratory "had been disturbed," and "part of it had been piled together in one little box."

Two police officers questioned appellant on January 9, 1933, at the jail "and he was sick, * * * too sick to talk." A doctor was called and "said he was a narcotic addict" and "was sick from narcotics." Before defendant was locked up he asked the officer "to look for his car," "a Buick 1926 coach, in the vicinity of where he was arrested," which had his bluish gray overcoat in it. On January 10th the officers found appellant's car in the Classic Garage, at Lexington and Vine streets. Appellant went with the officers to the car, "produced a pink slip to the Buick automobile, and stated the car and overcoat was his." In the car the officers also found "flashlight batteries for a small vest-pocket flashlight, several pieces of gold, and gold solder, gold solder inlays, crowns and bridge-work." This scrap gold and dental work was identified by Dr. Wilkins as his. He testified that he left his office on Friday night and, except for a few minutes on Sunday afternoon, was not there until Monday morning, at which time he missed such scrap gold, etc. The officers, in searching appellant, found among other things "a couple of passkeys" and "four bindles of morphine" sewed "in the seam of" the right-hand upper coat pocket.

This morphine was the basis of the alleged violation of the state Narcotic and Drug Act.

Appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to support the judgment.

[1] There would seem to be no question about the sufficiency of such evidence to support the judgment as to count 1 involving the entering of Dr. Griffin's office. Patients seeking to have an aching tooth treated do not search for a dentist in the laboratory of a dark office on Sunday evening, with a flashlight. The fact that the gold scrap was partly piled in a small box in the laboratory from which appellant came when he was disturbed speaks volumes as to his intent.

As to the second count, appellant contends that the mere fact that the gold taken from Dr. Wilkins' office was found in his car two days after the burglary does not justify the inference that he entered Dr. Wilkins' office with intent to commit theft therein. Undoubtedly these facts standing alone would not justify the inference that must have been drawn by the court to justify the finding of guilt. People v. Hurley, 60 Cal. 74, 44 Am. Rep. 55. Regardless of where the car was found, the evidence clearly justified the inference that appellant left it near Dr. Griffin's office, where he was arrested and where he was caught under circumstances justifying the conclusion that he was after the same kind of booty, in the same kind of an office, on a day when the dentist conducting such an office is not apt to be in. In other words, the evidence under count 1 of the information charging burglary, in connection with the fact that similar gold stolen from a similar office was found in defendant's car which was used by him in an evident attempt to get more of the same kind, justifies the inference that the gold so found was obtained in the same way, and indicates that the offense charged in the second count was also the act of appellant.

[2, 3] The evidence shows that four bindles of morphine were found sewed in the lining of appellant's coat. Appellant denies having any knowledge of its presence in his coat and claimed to have purchased the coat second hand in some place on Main street some time before. The act makes it unlawful for any person to have in his possession any opium, excepting upon the written order or prescription of a physician, dentist, or veterinary surgeon, licensed to practice in this state. Stats. 1929, p. 380, as amended by Stats. 1931, p. 1496; vol. 2 Deering's Gen. Laws 1931, p. 3007, Act 5323. Such defense merely created a conflict with the prima facie case made out by the people showing that such morphine was in plaintiff's possession. Neither intent nor knowledge is an element of this offense. The mere possession is a violation of the act.

People v. Le Baron, 92 Cal. App. 550, 268 P. 651, 269 P. 476. The only perfect defense is a valid prescription under the act. Any other defense is for the consideration of the judge or jury, as the case may be; and the defense made having been rejected by the trial court, nothing remains to be considered on appeal in view of the fact of possession which the court must have found.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiffs sued for an injunction and to cancel an assessment for improvements of a public street, from a judgment denying them relief, they have appealed upon typewritten transcripts.

Proceeding under the Street Improvement Act of 1913 (Deering's Gen. Laws 1931, Act No. 8205), the city of Los Angeles took the necessary steps for the formation of an assessment district to provide sufficient funds for the improvement of Cabrillo avenue, and to that end assessed the benefits to each piece of property within the district and determined the damages and the incidental expenses to be paid on account of the proposed improvement. Certain property owners having refused to accept the damages awarded to them by the city council, eminent domain proceedings were commenced in the name of the city, and judgments were entered against the city fixing the damages to these property owners at approximately $30,000 more than the sums fixed by the council. Prior to the entry of these judgments, the assessments theretofore levied had been collected and the proceeds thereof had been paid into a special fund known as the street improvement assessment fund. After the entry of the judgments, the city council directed the transfer from the general fund of the city to the special street assessment fund of sufficient moneys to pay the damages awarded in the court proceedings, and directed that a supplemental assessment be levied upon the property in the improvement district, the proceeds thereof to be used in replacing in the general fund the moneys transferred therefrom for the benefit of the district. Due notice of the supplemental assessment was given, and some of the plaintiffs protested on the sole ground that they believed the excess damages should be paid from the city's general fund. These protests were overruled, and the supplemental assessment was thereafter levied and partially collected.

On this appeal the appellants state their principal point to be that, after the city had paid the damages out of its general fund, it had no legal authority to make a supplemental assessment. Four "secondary" points are listed which may all be considered under the single question, Did the city have jurisdiction to levy the supplemental assessment?

[1] To understand the first question, a brief reference to the statute will suffice. Section 18 of the 1913 act provides: "To expedite the making of any such improvement the legislative body may at any time transfer into said special fund out of any money in the general fund such sums as it may deem necessary, and the sums so transferred shall be deemed a loan to such special fund. * * *

The "special fund" mentioned is the fund created for the particular street improvement. Section 22 provides that, if the funds raised under these proceedings are insufficient, the council "may pay the deficit, out of the general fund, or may order a supplemental assessment to raise such deficit. * * *" It is the position of appellants that, if the council pays the deficit out of the general fund, it cannot thereafter order a supplemental assessment under this section. With this there seems to be no quarrel, but the respondents insist that the record here discloses no payment from the general fund, but merely a loan made under the express provisions of section 18 of the act. The trial court so found, and there is ample evidence to support the finding. In fact, all the evidence, oral and documentary, shows that nothing but a loan from the general fund was intended at any stage of the proceedings. Every resolution, recommendation, and report of the council and subordinate officials discloses a well-defined purpose to loan the money from the general fund to be returned from the proceeds of a supplemental assessment. In any event, what was done was a question of fact to be determined by the trial court, and the appellants have not advanced any reason why the finding on this issue of fact should be disturbed.

[2-5] Appellants' criticism of the proceedings leading to the supplemental assessment are not sound. The council obtained jurisdiction when the proceedings were instituted, and this included jurisdiction to levy a supplemental assessment. No additional notice of the proposed improvement or of the formation of the special assessment district was necessary after those acts had both been accomplished pursuant to the statutory notice. When it was determined that a supplemental assessment would be necessary, notice thereof was given in full conformity with the act. In response thereto, some of the appellants appeared and filed protests upon the sole ground that they believed the money should be paid by the city out of its general fund. To this branch of the appeal there are two answers: First, as to those appellants who filed no protest, they are deemed to have waived all objections to the supplemental assessment and cannot attack it in this proceeding (Farley v. Reindollar, 174 Cal. 703, 707, 165 P. 19); second, as to those who filed protests, they are limited here to the grounds assigned in their protests—that the deficit should be paid out of the general fund (Blake v. City of Eureka, 201 Cal. 643, 648, 258 P. 945). The question raised by these protests was one of policy only, which the council must decide. Such decision is final. Duncan

July 6, 1933.

1. Habeas corpus ☞55.

Habeas corpus petition alleging petitioner's detention under warrant issued on complaint charging violation of allegedly unconstitutional ordinance held insufficient where copy of neither ordinance nor complaint accompanied petition.

2. Habeas corpus ☞11.

Person allegedly violating ordinance and released on his own recognizance cannot on habeas corpus test validity of subsequent restraint invited for such purpose only.

Such person will not be permitted on habeas corpus to test validity of his subsequent restraint where such restraint is invited and voluntarily submitted to before trial for that purpose only, and where his nominal restraint remains such only so long as it is necessary to file petition and procure order for writ.

Petition by Harry G. Henderson for a writ of habeas corpus against the Chief of Police of the City and County of San Francisco.

Writ denied.

Harry G. Henderson, of San Francisco (H. H. McPike of San Francisco, of counsel), for petitioner.

PER CURIAM.

[1] Petitioner has applied for a writ of habeas corpus, alleging that he is unlawfully detained and restrained of his liberty by the chief of police of the city and county of San Francisco under the authority of a warrant of arrest issued out of the municipal court of said city and county upon the filing of a complaint therein on March 18, 1933, charging petitioner with having violated the provisions of a municipal ordinance. The ground urged for the issuance of the writ is that the ordinance is unconstitutional. Neither a copy of the ordinance nor of the complaint is presented as a part of or with the petition, and for that reason the petition is legally insufficient to authorize the issuance of the writ. In re Crowley, 171 Cal. 58, 151 P. 739.

[2] Moreover, as held in Re Gow, 139 Cal. 242, 73 P. 145, when a person accused of violating an ordinance has been allowed to go at large on his own recognizance he will not be permitted to test the validity of his subsequent restraint on habeas corpus, where such restraint is invited and voluntarily submitted to before trial for that purpose only, and his nominal restraint remains such only so long as it is necessary to file a petition and procure an order for the writ. To the same effect is In re Bocci, 84 Cal. App. 269, 257 P. 888. In the present case, it appears from the statements made in applying for the writ, that after the criminal proceeding was instituted petitioner was released and has since been at liberty on his own recognizance, and that his present restraint was invited and submitted to voluntarily for the purpose of testing the constitutionality of said ordinance before trial on habeas corpus. Upon that ground, too, therefore, the writ should be denied. It is so ordered.

This is an appeal from an order vacating the levy of an execution and quashing the writ. The record presented is most deficient.

There is no judgment roll, reporter's transcript, nor bill of exceptions. The record consists of copies of the order appealed from and the notice of appeal and various orders, minute orders, and affidavits. The clerk certified that they were true and correct copies of the originals on file in his office. There is no certificate of the judge contained in the record. In cases of this kind counsel should have a bill of exceptions settled.

As the record before us is not authenticated in the manner required by law and is totally deficient, we cannot consider it. Section 951, Code Civ. Proc.; Guyot v. Cassab, 118 Cal. App. 742, 5 P.(2d) 912; Salinas v. Riverside Finance Co., 126 Cal. App. 675, 14 P.(2d) 1025.

Assignments ⇨ 13.

Assignment by husband to wife of portion of earnings from writing, not based upon present employment or existing contract, held void (Civ. Code, § 1045).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. C. Needham, Judge.

Action by Vera Orkow against B. Harrison Orkow. From a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, the defendant appeals.

Judgment reversed.

Golden & Kaufman by Arthur V. Kaufman, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Philip Cohen, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiff sued for an accounting under a written assignment. From a judgment in her favor the defendant has appealed upon type-written transcripts.

Plaintiff and defendant were husband and wife. On September 1, 1926, while living together in the state of New York, the defendant executed and delivered to the plaintiff an assignment in these words:

"In consideration of moneys advanced to me by my wife Vera I hereby assign to her thirty-three and a third (33⅓%) per cent. in all plays, novels, motion picture scenarios and stories now and hereafter written by me and any and all returns or money received by me.

"It is understood that this assignment is free of all considerations or differences or eventualities that may arise between the parties hereto in the event of separation.

"I do this that her future may be happier than her past and secure.

"[Signed] B. Harrison Orkow
"This makes any and all previous assignments invalid.
B. H. O."

Thereafter the plaintiff sued in the state of New York for a divorce. She prayed for alimony, but the decree which was in her favor, did not award alimony and did not refer to the assignment. On August 11, 1930, plaintiff commenced this action in Los Angeles county. She alleged the execution of the agreement and that defendant had obtained considerable sums of money from the sale of plays, novels, motion picture scenarios and stories. On the trial the execution of the contract was proved along with the fact that for twenty-eight weeks defendant had been employed by Warner Brothers at a salary of $400 a week. The character of his employment was not shown, and when he offered to prove that none of these earnings came from writing under the terms of the assignment his offer was rejected; the trial court ruling that the assignment covered all earnings from whatever source and for all future time.

The judgment must be reversed. So far as the assignment purported to transfer a portion of earnings not based upon present employment or an existing contract it was void. Civ. Code, § 1045; 5 C. J., p. 871; 2 R. C. L. pp. 603-604; Walker v. Rich, 79 Cal. App. 139, 144, 249 P. 56; Metcalf v. Kincaid, 87 Iowa, 443, 54 N. W. 867, 869, 43 Am. St. Rep. 391; Billings v. O'Brien, 45 How. Prac. (N. Y.) 392, 401; Rodijkait v. Andrews, 74 Ohio St. 104, 77 N. E. 747, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) pages 564, 567, 6 Ann. Cas. 761.

The distinction between the two classes of cases and the elements necessary to support such an assignment are pointed out in Metcalf v. Kincaid, supra: "In the one an attempt is made to assign something which exists in expectancy only. In such a case it is apparent that there is nothing to assign. The expectancy may never become a reality. The earning of wages or the accumulation of property in such a case will depend on the ability of the assignor to procure employment in the future. There is no present employment which may reasonably be expected to result in the earning of wages. In the other class of cases one has entered into a contract or upon an employment whereby, in the ordinary course of events, wages will be earned or property acquired as the direct result of the contract, employment, or engagement. The true rule is that an assignment of wages to be earned is good if accepted, and if at the time it is made there is an existing engagement or employment by virtue of which wages are being, and in future may reasonably be expected to be, earned, even though there is no contract or fixed time of employment."

We have found no departure from this general rule in any of the cases from New York. Cases cited by respondent involving assignments of proceeds from existing contracts or interests in claims to specific property are not helpful. The New York statutes do not touch upon the subject and, in the absence of any decision to the contrary, we may assume that the general rule was applicable in that state, when the contract was made.

Such evidence as was received indicates that after the divorce the defendant came to California and entered an employment different from that in which he was engaged in New York; that his former efforts in writing had been unsuccessful and had brought him no returns after the assignment was made. The judgment carries a charge upon "wages" earned under a specific employment differing from that contemplated at the time the assignment was made, and apparently not in existence at that time. The plaintiff failed to prove a case under the assignment.

The judgment is reversed.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

June 29, 1933.

1. Guardian and ward ☞8.

Juvenile court of Santa Clara county held without jurisdiction of petition for guardianship alleging that minor children were in Richmond with mother whose place of residence was Richmond (Gen. Laws 1931, Act 3966, § 3).

2. Evidence ☞10(2).

Court of Appeal takes judicial notice that city of Richmond is located in Contra Costa county.

3. Domicile ☞5.

Residence of minor children followed that of divorced mother entitled to their custody (Civ. Code, § 213).

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; F. B. Brown, Judge.

Petition for the guardianship of Mildred and Perina Casella, minors, by Paul Casella, opposed by Mary Casella. From an order of the Juvenile Court of Santa Clara County, adjudging the minors to be wards of the court, the opponent appeals.

Reversed.

Owen D. Richardson, of San Jose, for appellant.

A. G. Shoup, of San Jose, for respondent.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

This is an appeal from an order of the juvenile court sitting in Santa Clara county adjudging two unmarried minor children to be wards of that court.

[1, 2] The order must be reversed because it was outside the jurisdiction of that court. Such jurisdiction is limited to minors found "within the county, or residing therein." Section 3, Juvenile Court Act, Deering's Gen. Laws 1931, Act No. 3966. The petition filed in the juvenile court alleged that the two minors "are with their mother in Richmond" and that the mother's "place of residence" is Richmond. We may take judicial notice that the city of Richmond is located in Contra Costa county.

Upon the face of the petition it appears that the minors were not "within the county" of Santa Clara when the petition was filed there and the trial judge found in accordance with the allegations of the petition.

[3] The matter of residence appears from the undisputed evidence upon which the court failed to make any finding. The father and mother of the minors had been divorced and the custody of both minors had been awarded to the mother. She took the children to Contra Costa county, where she established her residence. The residence of the minor children thus followed that of the mother. Section 213, Civ. Code; Cole v. Superior Ct., 28 Cal. App. 1, 6, 151 P. 169; Hunt v. Hunt, 94 Ga. 257, 21 S. E. 515; 53 A. L. R. note, pages 1160, 1164. As the minors were actually living in Contra Costa county and, as their legal residence was in that county while their mother resided there, both essentials of jurisdiction of the person of the minors placed that jurisdiction in the juvenile court of Contra Costa county and withheld it from the court of Santa Clara county.

The order is reversed.

TYLER, Presiding Justice.

Appellant Hall, alias E. C. Rice, was jointly tried and convicted with Thomas J. Lewis, alias Leo A. De Grasse, of the crimes of attempt to commit grand theft and conspiracy to commit the same. This appeal is from the final judgment of conviction and from orders denying each of defendants a motion for a new trial. As one of the points relied upon for a reversal is that there was no proof of falsity of alleged representations, a somewhat extensive review of the evidence becomes necessary.

[1] Defendant Lewis, operating under the assumed name of Leo A. De Grasse, introduced himself to one Frank W. Stine and his wife, who were traveling in their automobile across the continent. Lewis presented his card, which indicated he was a director of the Fox Film Company. Upon arriving in Oakland, Lewis suggested that they all stop at a certain hotel. This they did. Shortly thereafter, while Stine and his wife were sitting in the lobby talking to Lewis, appellant Hall appeared and was introduced to the Stines as a betting commissioner for a rich man. Lewis and Hall, in the presence of Stine and his wife, then began talking about betting on horse racing. Hall stated that he had been in the business for thirty-one years and had never lost a bet, as the people he worked for had a private wire whereby they knew ten minutes before each race the horses on which to bet. Lewis asked Hall if he could give him a tip on a race or make a bet for him so that he might make some money. Hall explained that he was not permitted to make any wagers for himself, but that, if Lewis wished to bet, he (Hall) would advise him which horse would win. Thereupon Lewis was informed what horse would win a certain race, and Hall gave him his supposed membership card so that Lewis might enter the "Exchange" and make his bet. Lewis took the card and disappeared. He returned in a few minutes and stated he had made his bet, and later showed a sum of money which purported to be the amount he had won. Another bet was made and won, and then Hall stated that the people operating the "Exchange" were reluctant to take bets as small as $1,500, and that he was going to make a larger one. Hall thereupon handed Lewis what purported to be a credit slip for $50,000, together with the amount of their previous purported winnings, and told Lewis to bet the amount on a certain horse. Lewis returned and stated he had made the bet. Hall then left and shortly afterward returned with the information that they had won $103,300. The membership card was

PEOPLE v. HALL et al.

Cr. 1707.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

June 28, 1933.

1. Conspiracy ⇨47.

False pretenses ⇨49(1).

In prosecution for attempt and conspiracy to commit grand theft, evidence established falsity of defendants' representations, including representation of large winnings on horse races.

2. Conspiracy ⇨38.

False pretenses ⇨22.

That prosecuting witness in prosecution for attempt and conspiracy to commit grand theft expected share of defendants' fictitious winnings on horse races held no defense.

3. Criminal law ⇨37.

Where prosecuting witness in prosecution for attempt and conspiracy to commit grand theft, having agreed to advance certain sum to enable defendants to collect ostensible winnings on horse races, became suspicious and offered money with police concealed nearby, no entrapment existed.

It was contended that offering of money with request that defendants accept it was by consent, and hence such attempted entrapment terminated conspiracy, but it appeared that crimes originated in minds of defendants and were practically consummated when arrest was made.

4. Criminal law ⇨37.

Entrapment constitutes defense only when criminal intent originates in entraper's mind and defendant is lured into committing offense in order to prosecute him.

then given to Lewis with instructions to collect the winnings, together with the amount bet, or $153,300 in all. Upon his return, Lewis produced a draft for $153,300, which he claimed the "Exchange" issued to him, and informed Hall and the Stines that the people at the "Exchange" demanded, before cashing the draft, that the winner would have to produce $50,000 in money in order to prove that this sum could be collected by the "Exchange" if the horse they bet on had lost. Hall then stated that he could easily produce the sum, stating he had a rich uncle in the East who would advance him the money. He then left, ostensibly to telegraph this uncle. Upon his return he stated that his relation had left on a vacation and could not be located. He produced certain telegrams in support of his statement. At this time a third man, representing himself as the manager of the "Exchange," appeared upon the scene with a brief case, supposed to contain money, and stated that, if Hall would sign the credit slip, he would pay the bet. Hall refused, giving as a reason that he did not want his employer to know he was betting on his own account. Later Hall suggested to Lewis and the Stines, who had been present during all of these supposed transactions, that they raise the money between themselves. The Stines were asked what amount they could supply, and they stated $10,000. Hall replied that this amount would be sufficient, as he and Lewis could raise the balance. It was agreed that, by reason of this arrangement, each party was to receive one-fourth of the profits. It was then suggested that Stine leave by airplane for his home in Massachusetts and return with the money. Stine left, and upon arriving at his destination he related the transaction to his brother-in-law. Becoming suspicious, he visited New York City and ascertained from the Fox movie people that Lewis had no connection with the company. Certain other inquiries were made by him which confirmed his suspicion that the transaction was a fraudulent scheme. On his way back to Oakland Stine informed the police authorities at Chicago of the facts and they telegraphed to the police department at Oakland. Upon arriving in Oakland, Stine was met by Hall and Lewis. Stine informed them he had the money, and offered what purported to be the amount he was to furnish. They refused to take it until such time as they could produce the amounts they were to raise under the arrangement. The police, who had secreted themselves in the hotel, then arrested appellants. When searched, there were found on the person of Lewis cards bearing the name of Leo De Grasse which indicated he was a director of the Fox Picture Corporation. In searching Hall's room at a different hotel, where he was registered as E. R. Hill, the officers found his grips packed, indicating that he was about to depart. They found the black grip that the supposed manager of the "Exchange" had used, and also blank credit slips of the same character as the one used by appellants to represent the $50,000 credit. Other documents of an incriminating nature were also found, among which were the purported telegrams and the answers thereto which Hall had used in his pretended endeavor to get in touch with his uncle. These telegrams were proved by officers of the telegraph companies not to have been sent or received by their companies. A check protector that had been used on the draft of $153,300 was found and also a typewriter upon which the various documents had been prepared. At the trial, for the purpose of proving guilty intent, it was shown that Lewis had fraudulently obtained the sum of $12,000 from a victim of his operations, which sum was procured by him under precisely the same circumstances herein involved. We think sufficient of the facts are related to show the character of the misrepresentations.

Appellants first urge as ground for reversal that there was no proof of the falsity of the alleged representations. In support of this contention, it is claimed that the offense was built around the statements to Stine that there was a turf exchange in Oakland, in which and through which one of the defendants operated, so that he could place bets with certainty of winning, and there was no proof indicating there was not such an exchange or that defendant Hall did not obtain and receive advance information of fixed horse racing precisely as he had represented. The contention is without merit. The existence or nonexistence of the "Exchange" was but one of the representations made by appellants. Moreover, the finding of the membership card and the draft for $153,300, which was supposed to have been issued by the "Exchange," the $50,000 credit slip supposed to have been deposited with the "Exchange," and which it was represented had to be made good, together with other documents all proved to have been written by Hall himself to accomplish the fraudulent scheme, were sufficient to raise the inference that no such institution as the "Exchange" existed; that it was a fictitious entity existing only in the minds of Hall and Lewis.

[2] It is next contended that the indictment was insufficient for the reason that it was not directed against innocent parties. In support of this contention we are cited to cases to the effect that neither the law nor public policy designs the protection of rogues in their dealings with each other in dishonest practices; the policy being to protect those who for some honest purpose are induced, upon false and fraudulent representations, to give credit or part with their property to another, and not to protect those who for unworthy or illegal purposes part with their goods. McCord v. People, 46 N. Y. 470. The doctrine announced in the case cited has been expressly rejected by our Supreme Court in the case of People v. Martin, 102 Cal. 558, 36 P. 952. It is there declared that, if the party defrauded is also guilty of a violation of the law, he too should be prosecuted rather than his offense should serve as a shield to another's crime. The offense is committed against the public and not against the individual. There is no principle of law that will bar the state from prosecuting a criminal because some other person is a particeps criminis. Moreover, Stine did not and could not under the circumstances commit any offense, whatever his intent might have been. The entire representations were false, and no bets were ever made; the "Exchange" being a fictitious entity. People v. Martin, supra.

[3, 4] The final contention is made that the attempted entrapment by the prosecuting witness and the police officers, by aiding and urging the commission of crime, terminated the conspiracy, because the offering of the money, with the request that appellants accept the same, was by consent. The crimes for which appellants were tried and convicted were that of an attempt to commit grand theft and conspiracy to commit the same. The crimes originated in the minds of defendants, and they were practically consummated when the arrest was made. It is only when the criminal intent originates in the mind of the entrapping person, and the accused is lured into the commission of the offense in order to prosecute him, that the entrapment will constitute a defense. Here, as shown by the evidence, the conspiracy originated in the minds of appellants and the acts of the officers merely amounted to apprehension of appellants, and did not constitute such an entrapment as is prohibited. People v. Malone, 117 Cal. App. 629, 4 P. (2d) 287, In re Wong Poy, 113 Cal. App. 677, 293 P. 1029.

1. Attachment ⇨137.

Superior court has jurisdiction and power to increase amount of undertaking on attachment.

2. Mandamus ⇨28.

Mandamus will not issue to control exercise of discretionary power, or to review conclusion reached by fact-finding body, after discretionary power has been exercised, notwithstanding erroneous conclusion.

3. Mandamus ⇨28.

In cases of palpable abuse of discretionary power, and where act is purely ministerial and duty becomes absolute, mandamus may issue.

4. Mandamus ⇨53.

Plaintiff in action wherein attachment was levied, held not entitled to mandamus to compel trial judge to set aside discretionary order increasing amount of undertaking.

Original application by Thomas H. Greene for a writ of mandate prayed to be directed to the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, Edward P. Shortall, Judge, to require respondent to set aside an order fixing amount of undertaking on attachment.

Writ of mandate denied.

Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Waldo F. Postel, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KNIGHT, Justice.

Pursuant to a motion made by one of several defendants in an action pending before the respondent court, and after a full hearing on the merits of said motion, the court made an order directing that the amount of an undertaking on attachment be increased from $4,000 to $25,000. Shortly afterwards petitioner as plaintiff in the action moved the court to set aside said order, and after hearing the motion the court indicated, so petitioner alleges, that the same would be denied. Without waiting further action in the matter, petitioner instituted this proceeding in mandamus to compel the respondent court to grant his motion. We find no legal ground upon which the writ may issue.

The action was filed in July, 1932, by petitioner, an attorney in New York City, against Nathan, Abe, and Jack Scharlin, First and Second Doe, and Scharlin Bros., a copartnership, to recover the sum of $113,617 claimed to be due for legal services; and an order was issued for the publication of summons based upon an affidavit averring that Nathan and Abe Scharlin were nonresidents of this state, and that Jack Scharlin was a resident of this state but was concealing himself to avoid service of summons. Up to the time the present proceeding was instituted there had been no publication of the summons, nor had personal service thereof been made on the nonresident defendants. About four months after the action was filed, upon furnishing an undertaking in the sum of $4,000 and an affidavit which contained the averment also that Jack Scharlin was concealing himself for the purpose of avoiding service of summons, petitioner obtained a writ of attachment which he caused to be levied on numerous bank deposits in San Francisco, aggregating $13,000, all of which stood in the name of Lucy Scharlin, the wife of Jack Scharlin. She served upon the sheriff a third party claim thereto, and in order to prevent the release of the attachment, petitioner furnished the sheriff with an indemnifying bond in the sum of $26,000. Thereupon, petitioner caused said writ to be levied on several parcels of real estate situate in the city and county of San Francisco and in the counties of Lake and San Mateo, of the estimated value of $57,500, the record title to which stood also in the name of Lucy Scharlin, the same having been conveyed to her by her husband about a year prior to the date of said levy; and she made third party claim thereto. In January, 1933, Jack Scharlin, appearing through his attorney, presented a motion to discharge the attachment upon the ground that his whereabouts were not concealed and that summons could be easily served upon him. The motion was denied and during the following month, February, 1933, he appeared in the action and presented the motion above mentioned to increase the amount of the undertaking on attachment upon the ground that the amount of the original undertaking was inadequate. As stated, the motion was heard on the merits and granted; and petitioner's motion to set aside said order followed.

[1] As will be seen, the determinative question presented by the pending proceeding is one of jurisdiction, that is, whether a superior court is vested with jurisdiction and power to order an increase in the amount of the undertaking on attachment. The decisions of this state hold uniformly that it is—that such jurisdiction and power is incidental to the provisional remedy of the attachment (see Francis v. Superior Court, 58 Cal. App. 618, 209 P. 80, and cases cited therein; also American, etc., Co. v. Superior Court, 19 Cal. App. 497, 126 P. 497), and petitioner expressly so concedes, but contends that “in this particular instance in view of the particular showing, or rather lack of showing, made by the defendant that the present undertaking was inadequate security as to him,” the respondent court “was not authorized or justified in, and was powerless to, order the undertaking on attachment increased.” This contention is based upon defendant's failure to refute certain averments set forth in two affidavits filed on behalf of petitioner at the time of the hearing of said motions, to the effect that said defendant had at all times disclaimed any interest in or to the properties concerning which the levies were made, and had at all times asserted that his wife was and is the sole owner thereof. One of said affidavits was filed in opposition to the motion to increase the amount of the undertaking and the other in support of petitioner's motion to set aside the order made in that behalf.

[2-4] It is evident that the foregoing contention is entirely foreign to the jurisdictional issue, that is, as to whether the court had the power to entertain and decide said motion to increase the amount of the undertaking, and that it relates exclusively to the question of the weight of evidence, that is, as to whether the court properly exercised its discretionary power in granting said motion upon the evidence then before it; and in this latter respect it is well settled that a mandamus proceeding may not be used for the purpose of controlling the exercise of discretionary power, nor of reviewing the conclusion reached by the fact-finding body, after the discretionary power has been exercised, however erroneous such conclusion may be. Kerr v. Superior Court, 130 Cal. 183, 62 P. 479; Spivalo v. Bryan, 102 Cal. 403, 36 P. 780; Gammon v. McKevitt, 50 Cal. App. 656, 195 P. 726; Richards v. Superior Court, 145 Cal. 38, 78 P. 244; Realty, etc., Mtg. Co. v. Title, etc., Co., 165 Cal. 543, 132 P. 1048; Fairbank v. Superior Court, 34 Cal. App. 66, 166 P. 864; Los Angeles A. T. Co. v. Superior Court, 94 Cal. App. 433, 271 P. 363. True, in exceptional cases of palpable abuse, “where the discretion ceases, and the act to be done is purely ministerial, [and] the duty becomes absolute,” it has been held that mandamus may be invoked. Pacific Palisades Ass'n v. City of Huntington Beach, 196 Cal. 211, 237 P. 538, 40 A. L. R. 782; Alexander v. Superior Court, 91 Cal. App. 312, 266 P. 993. But we have no such case here. In causing the real property to be attached, and thereafter in insisting upon maintaining the levy against the third party claim, petitioner was compelled necessarily to take the definite position that defendant was and is the owner of said property or of some substantial interest therein which was subject to attachment; and since the title thereto had not been adjudicated at the time of the hearing of defendant's motion to increase the amount of the undertaking, a question of pure fact was presented to the trial court to determine whether the amount of the original undertaking adequately protected whatever interest the court believed from all the circumstances before it the defendant possessed in said property, and if not to what extent the amount thereof should be increased; and the fact that defendant may have failed to refute the averments of petitioner's affidavits did not operate to deprive the court of the right to exercise its discretionary power in either granting or denying the motion for the reason that the filing of the motion by the defendant for such increase in itself may have been considered as an assertion of title on his part to some interest in the property; or, as the trier of the facts, the trial court may have refused to accept as true those particular averments of petitioner's affidavits which defendant did not see fit to deny. The trial court may have taken into consideration also, in deciding the matter, petitioner's apparently contradictory position in seeking to maintain the attachment against said third party claim upon the ground that the property belonged to the defendant and not to the third party, and at the same time seeking to defeat defendant's motion to increase the amount of the undertaking upon the ground that the property belonged to the third party and not to the defendant. Without going into further details, we believe that the circumstances above stated sufficiently show that the trial court was confronted with a situation calling for the exercise of a discretionary power, and therefore, under the decisions above cited, mandamus will not lie to review the manner in which it was exercised, even though it be conceded that the conclusions reached were erroneous. Lapique v. Superior Court, 24 Cal. App. 313, 141 P. 223; First National Bank v. Superior Court, 71 Cal. App. 64, 234 P. 420.

Moreover, section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure affords a right of appeal from an order dissolving an attachment, which the trial court would inevitably grant if petitioner declined to furnish the undertaking in the increased amount; and for that reason it would seem that petitioner is not entitled to the issuance of a writ herein. However, since it is clear that the writ must be denied upon the ground first mentioned, it is unnecessary to inquire into the merits of this latter point.

The writ is denied.

ANDREWS, Justice pro tem.

This appeal is from a judgment quieting title of defendants, involving the division line between lands of the parties.

[1] 1. The principal question argued in the briefs is whether the evidence given at the trial supports the findings and judgment. Plaintiff discusses at length the facts developed at the trial bearing upon the location of different fences and landmarks and the question of the true line between the lands of the parties and whether some different line than the original dividing line should be established, due to adverse possession. The transcript discloses that much evidence was introduced upon both sides upon all the bearings relating to the proper dividing line to be established and the holdings of land to be settled with reference thereto, and the case comes undoubtedly within the often-repeated rule that there is substantial evidence supporting the finding of the trial court.

[2] 2. The other question adverted to very briefly in the briefs submitted is the legality of the certificate of title issued in proceedings instituted under the Land Title Act (St. 1915, p. 1932) and the question as to whether the court had jurisdiction to make such certificate valid. The only evidence which appears in the transcript or which is before this court is this certificate, there being no judgment roll or other record of the proceedings out of which the certificate was issued. The transcript indicates that the judgment roll was offered in evidence, indeed all the proceedings were offered in evidence, and were to be passed upon as to what part of the record could be admitted as judgment roll, but whatever was finally considered by the court in arriving at its conclusion was not made a part of the return to this court. That issue, then, rests upon the certificate alone, and, being the result of a final adjudication of a court of general jurisdiction, the proceedings and jurisdiction upon which the Judgment and certificate would depend will be presumed to be sufficient and a part of the record. This makes it necessary to affirm the judgment of the trial court upon this issue.

These being the only two issues involved, the judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

ANDREWS, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal from a judgment entered upon a demurrer to plaintiff's second amended complaint without leave to amend.

1. This action was brought for the purpose of canceling a certificate of title issued under the Land Title Act (St. 1915, p. 1932) on lands of defendant on the 23d day of May, 1917, and the action which was first filed to call in question the validity of this certificate on the part of plaintiff was on the 17th day of July, 1930.

Either the three-year statute of limitation or that provision of the Land Title Act which makes the certificates of registration final, unless attacked within one year after the registration of the land, would prevent the bringing of, or maintaining of, this action, unless it is shown in the complaint that there is a legal justification for the delay of thirteen years which is the outstanding feature of this complaint. The complaint does undertake to show that the service on plaintiff in the land registration proceedings of a copy of the notice issued in such proceedings was made by a son of defendants, who undertook to assure plaintiff that the proceedings would not affect the title to her land. The complaint also alleges that after the granting of the certificate the plaintiff for about ten years continued to use the land covered by the certificate adjoining the boundary line of plaintiff's land as a turning row, as did also the defendants. The complaint further alleges that the plaintiff cultivated the strip of land in dispute yearly and continuously during the time from the issuing of the certificate until about March 1, 1927; that during that time plaintiff was unaware of the existence of the record of the proceedings out of which the certificate was issued; and that plaintiff did not understand the significance of the notice served upon her in said land registration proceedings. The plaintiff also claims in her complaint that as she was known to be in possession and to be a claimant to the lands in dispute, such facts should have been set forth in the petition, that under the Land Title Act she should have been served with a copy of the petition as well as a copy of the notice issued in the proceedings, and that failure to do so was a fraud upon the court and the plaintiff which invalidated the proceedings. In the petition she was in fact alleged to be an adjoining owner and was served with the notice issued in the proceedings. In the steps taken under this act, the petition roughly corresponds to the complaint in a civil action and the notice to the summons in such actions.

[1] The act requires that the petition must contain a statement of whether the land described therein is occupied, the name and address of the occupants, the interest each has or claims in the land, any other person who claims an interest, the name and address of such person, and the names and addresses of owners of adjoining lands. The law provides that the notice must contain the name of the court, names of applicants, description of lands involved and notice that the parties served must answer or that a decree will be granted and that persons served will be forever barred from all interest in the property. Plaintiff having been served with notice on the theory of being an adjoining owner, that service was fraught with legal significance and required plaintiff to take notice of its source and its purpose.

[2-6] The statement of the person serving the notice that it would not affect plaintiff's rights affords no legal justification for ignoring and failing to act upon the information furnished by the notice itself. That notice contained all the information which the petition would have disclosed had it also been served, and plaintiff could only ignore the service of this notice at her peril. Pursuing the knowledge which the notice imparted, as it was the duty of plaintiff to do, would have led to an examination of all the records of that proceeding, including the petition, and plaintiff must therefore be charged with the knowledge which her investigations would have disclosed and that discovery she was required to make promptly. The use of the land subsequent to the issuance of the certificate would in no way bear upon the jurisdiction of the court or affect the validity of the judgment and certificate. Plaintiff cannot be permitted to defeat a judgment upon the ground that she did not understand the legal effect of the notice served upon her, as to permit such a questioning of the binding force of legal proceedings, where the notices required by law have been given, would make every judgment uncertain and unsettled. The delay shown upon the face of the complaint constitutes a bar to this action, and justifies the sustaining of the demurrer without leave to amend.

The judgment of the trial court is sustained.

MARKS, Justice.

This is an original proceeding seeking a peremptory writ of mandate requiring respondents, as all of the members of the board of directors of the Imperial irrigation district, to call a special election to determine whether or not director Burleigh E. Adams shall be recalled and his successor elected. All of the respondents were served, but directors Hewes and Young have not appeared. The other directors have demurred and answered to the petition. The answer controverts some of the material allegations of the petition, but from the view we take of the cause it will not be necessary to have these controversial facts settled before we proceed to a determination of the merits of the case.

The Imperial irrigation district was organized under the California Irrigation District Act. (St. 1897, p. 254, as amended.) Burleigh E. Adams had served as a director of the district from division No. 4 for more than six months prior to February 21, 1933. On that day a petition for his recall and the election of a successor, containing sixteen signatures, was filed with F. H. McIver as secretary of the board of directors of the district. This petition was certified insufficient by McIver on February 25, 1933. Thirteen additional sections of the petition were filed on March 6, 1933. He examined the records of registration of Imperial county and determined that the petitions were then signed by registered voters in number more than "twenty-five per cent of the highest vote cast within such district for candidates for the office, the incumbent of which is sought to be removed, at the last general election in such district at which an incumbent of such office was elected." Section 28½, California Irrigation District Act, as added by St. 1911 (Ex. Sess.) p. 135. Subsequent to this examination and prior to March 14, 1933, eleven sections of the supplementing petitions were surreptitiously removed (probably stolen) from his office. They have not been recovered. The secretary had made and still retains copies of the names signed on all of the sections of the petition. He certified to these facts and attached his certificate to the sections of the petition remaining in his possession preparatory to delivering them to the board of directors.

On, or immediately after, March 16, 1933, two electors, Box and Martin, residents and taxpayers of the district, instituted an action in the superior court of Imperial county seeking to enjoin McIver from certifying to the petitions and delivering them to the directors, and the directors from calling an election.

Directors Hewes and Young filed answers which in effect joined in the prayer of the complaint. McIver answered denying many of the allegations of the complaint and setting forth the facts already mentioned concerning the filing of the recall petitions, his examination of the signatures and comparison with the registration records, his finding the petitions sufficient, the loss of part of them, and his execution of his certificate for delivery to the board of directors. Directors Rose, Aten, and Adams answered, denying numerous allegations of the complaint, and made allegations similar to those in the McIver answer, which we have summarized. By failing to deny certain allegations of the complaint, they admitted they would call the recall election if not enjoined. The plaintiffs and defendant directors Hewes and Young moved for judgment on the pleadings. This motion was granted and judgment entered in accordance with the prayer of the complaint on April 17, 1933. An appeal from this judgment, by McIver and directors Adams, Rose, and Aten, is now pending in the Supreme Court.

On May 8, 1933, a second petition for the recall of Adams was filed with McIver. Immediately thereafter a second suit was filed against McIver and others seeking to restrain McIver from examining and certifying this petition, and the board of directors from receiving and acting upon it. A temporary injunction was refused and McIver certified to the sufficiency of the second petition.

On May 31, 1933, a petition was filed here asking a peremptory writ of mandate to compel the directors to meet and call the recall election. It is alleged that Adams, Rose, and Aten have conspired and agreed together to stay away and are staying away from directors' meetings so that a quorum will not be present and the election cannot be called.

It is not necessary for us to consider the objection of the answering directors that this proceeding was brought prematurely, twenty-three days after the second recall petition was filed and thirteen days after the expiration of the ten days during which McIver should have certified to the sufficiency of the second petition. It has been stipulated that on June 13, 1933, there was a meeting of the board of directors at which all members were present; that McIver submitted the second petition with his certificate of its sufficiency; that action upon it was deferred until the regular meeting to be held on July 11, 1933.

While neither of the petitions are before us, it seems to be conceded by counsel, for the purpose of this proceeding, that both were sufficient in all respects. We will, therefore, assume this to be true and that, considering the sufficiency of the petitions alone, the secretary should have certified them and the board of directors should have called the recall election.

[1] The last sentence of section 28½ of the California Irrigation District Act provides as follows: "If the vote at any such recall election shall not recall the officer, no further petition for the recall of such officer shall be filed before the expiration of six months from the date of such first recall election." As this section prohibits the filing of a recall petition for a period of six months after the failure to recall an officer at an election, it would seem to us that it was the intention of the Legislature to prevent the harassing of an official with proceedings which might result in holding two recall elections within six months.

[2] It seems to be evident from the provisions of section 28½ of the California Irrigation District Act that if a recall petition is sufficient in form and is signed by the requisite number of registered electors, it is the duty of the secretary of the board of directors to certify to its sufficiency and to deliver the petition and certificate to the board of directors. It is also clear that it is the duty of the board of directors to call the election upon receipt of the petition and the certificate of its sufficiency, in the absence of fraud as that term is used in the decisions upon this subject. City of Watts v. Superior Court, 36 Cal. App. 692, 173 P. 183; Koehler v. Board of Trustees, 83 Cal. App. 648, 257 P. 187; Martin v. Board of Trustees, 96 Cal. App. 705, 274 P. 1015.

[3] Petitioner urges that we cannot decide the case of Box et al. v. McIver et al., now pending on appeal in the Supreme Court. This is quite true. As the judgment in that case is not final, we cannot overlook the possibility of a reversal and the possible ultimate success of the defendants in that action. If the defendants should prevail, it would then become the duty of the board of directors to call a recall election under the first petition filed. Martin v. Board of Trustees, supra. If that should happen and we should order respondents to call and hold the election under the second petition, it would result in the holding of two recall elections against the same official on petitions filed within less than three months of each other. We think this contrary to the intent of the Legislature as expressed in the last sentence of section 28½ of the California Irrigation District Act, which we have already quoted.

Peremptory writ of mandate denied and the alternative writ is discharged.

J. I. CASE CO. v. REDFERN.
Civ. 4789.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.
July 5, 1933.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 1, 1933.

I. Principal and agent ⇨14(3).

Machinery company's salesman paid flat salary and devoting all his time to interests of company held company's agent in fraudulently obtaining dealer's signature as guarantor to buyer's notes, though agreement appointing dealer provided that company's employees were dealer's employees while assisting dealer in procuring sales.

2 Guaranty ⇨25(3).

Evidence in action against machinery dealer as guarantor on notes sustained finding that machinery company's agent fraudulently induced dealer to sign buyer's notes as guarantor on representation he was signing as witness.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; H. S. Schaffer, Judge.

Action by the J. I. Case Company against F. E. Redfern. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Dunn, White & Aiken and Hamilton Wright, all of Oakland, for appellant.

L. M. Linneman, of Dos Palos, and F. W. Docker and Claude Minard, both of Fresno, for respondent.

Mr. Presiding Justice PULLEN delivered the opinion of the court.

This action was commenced against I. R. Stevens and A. R. Van Antwerp, as the makers of seven promissory notes given in part payment of certain farm machinery purchased from appellant; respondent being made a party in the action as guarantor of each of the notes. The makers defaulting, judgment was entered against them, and the trial proceeded against Redfern as guarantor. At the conclusion of the trial judgment was entered in favor of defendant Redfern, and this is an appeal therefrom.

Appellant was engaged in the business of selling farm machinery through local dealers, of whom respondent was one, and also by salesmen employed directly by the company operating out of its various branch offices.

Here, a salesman, James K. Hopkins, acting through a dealer, sold certain farm machinery to defendants Van Antwerp and Stevens. These buyers lived in Dos Palos, within the territory of Redfern, and, in accordance with his agreement, he demanded that he be given credit for the sale.

At that time the machinery had all been delivered to the purchasers and all the papers evidencing the deal had been executed, but through an error the proper forms had not been used, and it was necessary to re-execute them, which was done at the time appellant recognized the right of respondent to a commission in the deal.

The question here involved is whether or not Redfern guaranteed the second set of notes which were executed. The corrected forms were sent by the company to its agent, Hopkins, who, in company with Stevens, one of the purchasers, went to Dos Palos, where Hopkins informed Stevens and Redfern that new forms had been sent by the company and had to be re-executed. It is admitted by the pleadings that respondent actually signed his name to a guaranty clause on each note in question. The entire disagreement is as to whether his signature was so placed as the result of fraudulent representations on the part of Hopkins, and if he was entitled to rely upon these representations, and, finally, whether or not Hopkins was at the time of making the representations an agent of the appellant company.

The trial court found that respondent subscribed his signature to each of the agreements of guaranty upon the notes, but signed the same without the knowledge he was thereby agreeing to become guarantor, and that his signature was obtained under the direction of James K. Hopkins, and that Hopkins did then and there fraudulently and with intent to deceive defendant, represent that said signatures of defendant were subscribed solely for the purpose of witnessing the signatures of the makers thereof, and would impose no obligation upon him.

The appeal is based upon the insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings. Appellant recognizes the rule that, when there is a substantial conflict in the evidence as to a material fact, the findings of the trial court cannot be disturbed, and that it is also the duty of the trial court to decide which witness has told the truth when there is a conflict in the testimony, but appellant contends that, after all of the conflicts are resolved in favor of respondent, nevertheless the facts here in evidence are wholly insufficient to support the judgment.

[1] The first question to determine is the status of Hopkins to the parties involved. In the agreement entered into between appellant company and respondent wherein respondent was appointed a dealer, appears the provision that the company's branch managers or other employees who assist the dealer in soliciting sales, etc., do so as his employees for the time they are so working. It is the contention of appellant that under the foregoing provision Hopkins was the employee of respondent and not of the Case Company at the time of the execution of the notes, and therefore any representation by Hopkins to respondent as to the nature of the document for the purpose of obtaining his signature thereto was not binding upon appellant.

At the time of the transaction in question, Hopkins was a regular salesman for the company, devoting all of his time exclusively to their interest, paid a flat salary therefor rather than commissions. The contract forms for this deal were made out by the company and sent to him. He was authorized to collect payments on behalf of the company, and did so collect payments made on account of these transactions in question, and, after the notes were signed, accepted them, and forwarded the same to the branch office of the appellant. At all times Hopkins acted as the representative of the company, and the courts so found, and it is clear that he was so acting in obtaining the signature of the parties to the notes. Should Hopkins have failed to account to the company for the money paid in closing the transaction, under no theory could the dealer have been responsible, or, should the salesman have been injured in the course of closing the deal, we doubt if the company would have escaped an employer's liability by virtue of the terms of the agreement referred to.

Therefore, accepting the findings of the court that Hopkins was the agent of the company, let us examine the evidence to ascertain what representations were made to respondent and whether they were true or false.

[2] Respondent testified that upon the day the notes were signed by him he was met by Hopkins, who told him the original papers were not upon the forms prescribed by the company, and said: "You will have to sign this. * * * You are supposed to sign as a witness." Thereupon, as respondent testified, believing that he was signing as a witness and not otherwise, and having had dealings with appellant and always having found it reliable, he signed.

One of the witnesses to the transaction testified that, after he had signed, "the notes were shoved over to Mr. Redfern to sign it and it was all done in a hurry—it was all done quick, you know."

Respondent was a rancher in the Dos Palos section and not engaged in the sale of farming equipment except as local agent for appellant, and had acted for appellant in that capacity only about a year and a half, during which time three sales were involved, all of which sales were closed by a salaried employee of appellant. His relations with the company had been cordial, and he knew Hopkins as a representative of the company and relied upon him as such.

The following from Thomas v. Whitney, 186 Ill. 225, 57 N. E. 808, is quoted with approval in Hemenway v. Abbott, 8 Cal. App. 450, 97 P. 190, 195: "The relation exists and relief is granted in all cases in which influence has been acquired and abused in which confidence has been reposed and betrayed. The origin of the confidence and the source of the influence are immaterial. The rule embraces both technical fiduciary relations, and those informal relations which exist wherever one man trusts in and relies on another."

It is argued by appellant that the facts proved were not sufficient to constitute fraud, but after a conflict of testimony the trial court found that fraudulent representations were made and were relied upon by respondent. They were made knowingly by appellant, and we have found nothing that will justify disturbing the finding in this respect.

It is apparent that the facts material to the validity of the judgment were fully found and established by the evidence, and judgment should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

In action to cancel deeds constituting part payment on bungalow court, evidence sustained finding that no misrepresentations regarding bungalow court were made or relied on.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Charles L. Allison, Judge.

Action by Morris Bernstein and another against Henry D. Timmerman and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

Charles E. Hobart, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Duckworth & Harrison, of San Bernardino, for respondents.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

This action grew out of a real estate transaction in which the plaintiffs agreed to purchase from the defendants Timmerman a bungalow court in the city of San Bernardino, giving in part payment therefor several parcels of real and personal property. The various instruments and papers involved were placed in escrow with a title company, and later delivered to the respective parties in accordance with the terms of the escrow. This action was brought against the Timmermans and against the real estate agents concerned in the deal, for the purpose of canceling the deeds and assignments by which the several properties of the plaintiffs had been conveyed to the defendants. While the complaint contains a number of causes of action, the essence of the action is that the delivery of the instruments sought to be canceled constituted a conversion of the properties represented thereby, since a rescission had been mutually agreed upon by the parties before delivery, and that the transaction should be set aside because of fraudulent representations alleged to have been made by the defendants Timmerman. The trial court found for the defendants on every material issue and entered a judgment in their favor, from which this appeal is taken.

The only point raised is that the evidence does not sustain certain of the findings. While the appellants concede that there is a conflict in the evidence on most of the issues, they insist that there is no real conflict with respect to certain matters, this contention being based largely on the argument that the entire evidence discloses that the testimony of the principal defendant was not worthy of belief.

[1] With respect to the first contention, that there was a mutual rescission and that the papers in question should not have been delivered, the following appears: On June 7, 1929, deeds and assignments covering all of the properties concerned were placed in escrow with instructions, signed by all the parties, authorizing the title company to bring down the titles, record the papers, and complete the transaction. According to these escrow instructions and the papers deposited, the Timmermans were to receive the conveyances of the Bernstein properties, and the appellants were to receive a deed to the bungalow court property, giving back a trust deed thereon securing a note representing the balance of the purchase price. Later, the appellants notified the respondents that they would not go on with the deal and on June 10, 1929, all of the parties met for a conference. At this time the appellants stated that they were fearful they could not make the payments; that if there should be any large number of vacancies they would be unable to do so; and that they did not like to assume the responsibility of taking care of the incumbrances against the bungalow court. The defendants suggested handling the matter on a contract of sale instead of by a deed. There is evidence that for the reasons named the parties agreed to make this change and also agreed that the monthly payments were to be materially reduced and that the Timmermans would lease one unit of the property for a substantial amount. In accordance with this agreement the parties met at the escrow office the next day, at which time an agreement of sale was drawn and signed by the parties and left in escrow to be substituted therein for the deed. The escrow agent was instructed to use the deeds and assignments previously deposited with it by the appellants as the down payment on the contract and not to deliver the contract to the appellants until the title to the Bernstein properties was found to be satisfactory. At the same time the escrow agent told all the parties that the deal was now closed and there could be no backing out. On June 20, 1929, the respondent H. D. Timmerman complained to the appellants concerning the title to one parcel of property he was to receive and stated that they must either put up cash for that or give him other security of equal value. The appellants admit that there is a conflict in the testimony as to what occurred at this conversation. While they testified that Timmerman told them that the deal was off, this is flatly denied by him. Mr. Timmerman and another witness testified that he then told the appellants that the deal had gone too far to stop and would have to be completed. On June 30, 1929, Mr. Timmerman told the appellants he was ready to accept the title to the lot about which he had previously complained. There is a conflict as to what was said at this time, the appellants having testified that they stated they would go on with the deal only on certain named contingencies, while Timmerman and one of the real estate agents testified to the contrary. The latter parties also testified that at that time the appellants agreed to come to the bungalow court on July 2, 1929, and take possession of the property. On July 2, 1929, the parties met at the bungalow court and, on being told that several other vacancies had occurred through parties moving out, refused to go on with the deal. There is evidence that the appellants at that time stated that they had no complaint in so far as the court or its equipment were concerned, but that they were afraid of the vacancies. Shortly thereafter, the escrow agent delivered the papers to the respective parties and this action followed.

It is appellants' contention that the evidence shows a mutual agreement of rescission and that the escrow should not have been closed and the papers delivered until they took possession of the property. While they notified the escrow agent not to deliver the papers before the same were delivered, under the view of the evidence taken by the trial court, they had no right to then prevent the transfer. Under the instructions the papers were to be delivered when certain titles were found satisfactory, and no such condition as taking possession appears therein. The court's finding that there was no mutual agreement to rescind is sustained by the evidence. The appellants contend that this rescission took place on June 20th and at the same time admit that there is a conflict in the evidence with respect thereto. Two witnesses testified that while the appellants mentioned canceling the exchange, at that time, the respondents told the appellants that the same could not be canceled or abandoned. There is also evidence that on June 30th, when the respondents told the appellants they were satisfied with the other title, the parties arranged a day on which the appellants were to take possession of the property, and that they were in the act of taking possession when they became alarmed at being told of some vacancies that had occurred in the meantime.

[2] The appellants contend that the respondents falsely represented the value of the property; the amount of the monthly income and rental when the apartments were full; the amount of the income and rental then being received; that it was completely furnished and equipped; the cost of the furnishings; that during the period of one year the proportion of vacancies had not amounted to more than 10 per cent.; and that a certain man took care of the property in return for the right to occupy a small house situated thereon. The respondents denied making any misrepresentations, although they admitted an error of $5 in stating the amount of monthly rental then being received from one apartment, with an explanation of how the same came to be made. The court found that a mistake had been made in this respect; that the same was made in error and that there was no intent to defraud; and that the same was not relied upon. This matter is not material, being only incidental to the claim of misrepresentation in regard to the income of the entire property, and the entire evidence fully sustains the court's finding in that regard. The court found that no misrepresentations were made, and further, that none were relied upon. In regard to the latter finding, there not only was evidence that the appellants made their own investigation, but that they refused an opportunity to examine respondents' books showing the income from the apartments, saying that "anyone could fix up the books." It appears that appellants had been in the business of buying and selling apartment houses and running them. It would serve no useful purpose to set forth the evidence relating to the various misrepresentations claimed, but the same supports the findings made, and the attack upon the weight of the testimony of one of the respondents has no place here.

While considerable evidence was introduced which would have justified findings favorable to the appellants, no more appears than a conflict in the evidence upon certain issues, in every one of which the trial court has found the other way.

The judgment is affirmed.

LIAL v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR MERCED COUNTY et al.

Civ. 4962.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,

June 27, 1933.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1195(1).

Opinion rendered by District Court of Appeal on appeal established law of case.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1207(1).

When appellate court passes on merits and directs trial court to render particular judgment, there is no authority to permit amendment of pleading, change issues, or try cause de novo.

3. Appeal and error ⇨1207(1).

Reversal of judgment on appeal with direction to trial court to enter specific judgment determines merits as effectively as though judgment were affirmed.

4. Appeal and error ⇨1216.

Trial court's setting aside judgment rendered under direction of District Court of Appeal to enter specific judgment that plaintiff take nothing held unauthorized.

5. Prohibition ⇨5(2).

Where trial court improperly set aside judgment entered in conformity with directions of appellate court, writ of prohibition should issue enjoining court from permitting filing of amended plea and from retrying cause.

Petition by Joao Lial, also known as Joao Leal, also known as John Leal, against the Superior Court in and for Merced County, Hon. E. N. Rector, as Judge thereof, for writ of prohibition.

Writ issued.

C. Ray Robinson and James D. Garibaldi, both of Merced, for petitioner.

F. M. Ostrander and G. P. Ross, both of Merced, for respondents.

Mr. Justice R. L. THOMPSON delivered the opinion of the court.

This is a petition for a writ of prohibition to restrain the retrial of a cause of action in which the judgment was reversed on appeal by this court, with specific directions for the court to enter a judgment that plaintiffs take nothing by their action.

A suit in assumpsit was commenced in the superior court of Merced county based upon an alleged contract for the purchase price of certain cattle. As security for the satisfaction of whatever judgment the plaintiffs might recover, an attachment was levied upon the cattle under the provisions of section 537 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and they were seized and held by the sheriff pending the determination of the suit. Issues were joined, and the cause was tried. Findings were adopted, and a judgment was entered, in which it was determined that the contract upon which the plaintiffs relied was void for lack of mutual understanding of the terms. Thereupon the court held that plaintiffs were not entitled to recover judgment upon the contract, but, upon the contrary, did determine that the cattle should be returned to the defendants only on condition that they pay to the plaintiffs the sheriff's costs as keeper of the cattle. Unless this were done within five days, the sheriff was directed to sell the cattle in the manner provided by statute for an execution sale of property. Upon appeal from that judgment, this court held the trial court was unauthorized to make the conditional order for the return of the cattle to the defendant. Young v. Lial (Cal. App.) 17 P.(2d) 170. That was a simple suit for a money judgment based upon a contract which the court held was void. It was not a possessory action. There were no equitable issues in the case. Under the provisions of section 1024 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the defendant was entitled to his costs as of course. The court was powerless to assess the costs, or any part thereof, against the defendant in whose favor the judgment was rendered. Upon appeal this court so held. The cause was not remanded for a new trial. Upon the contrary, on the record presented to this court, the trial court was directed to enter judgment to the effect that the plaintiffs take nothing by their suit. Upon receipt of the remittitur, the court did enter judgment that the plaintiffs take nothing, as directed by this court. A motion for a new trial was subsequently made by the plaintiffs and granted.

The petition for a writ of prohibition alleges that unless it is restrained the lower court will proceed to permit the filing of amended pleadings so as to raise new issues and retry the cause in disregard of the directions of this court. In granting a new trial after rendering the judgment directed by this court, the trial judge said: "There is only one ground upon which this court can consistently at this time order a new trial, and that is with the direct end in view of having the pleadings amended so as to admit of the introduction of evidence" concerning the equities of the case.

[1] The opinion which was rendered by this court in the case of Young v. Lial, established the law of the case. After the issues of a case have been established and a judgment has been passed upon on appeal, it is ordinarily too late to amend the pleadings so as to change the nature of the cause.

Such applications should be looked upon with suspicion. They tend to encourage fabrications of the issues. Dressler v. Johnston (Cal. App.) 21 P.(2d) 969. There is nothing in this case for the court to retry. It is said in 2 Freeman on Judgments (5th Ed.) 1345, § 639: "The judgments of appellate courts are as conclusive as those of any other court. They not only establish the facts, but also settle the law, so that the law as decided upon any appeal must be applied in all the subsequent stages of the cause, and they are res judicata in other cases as to every matter adjudicated."

[2, 3] It is a well-established principle which has been frequently announced by the courts that, when an appellate court has passed upon the merits of a cause on appeal and has directed the trial court to render a particular judgment or decree, there is no authority to permit amendments to the pleadings, change the issues which were determined, or try the cause de novo. Under such circumstances the trial court is without jurisdiction to enter any judgment at variance with the directions of the appellate court. Keller v. Lewis, 56 Cal. 466; Heinlen v. Martin, 59 Cal. 181; Cowdery v. London & San Francisco Bank, Ltd., 139 Cal. 298, 307, 73 P. 196, 96 Am. St. Rep. 115; Argenti v. Sawyer, 32 Cal. 414; Chafoin v. Rich, 92 Cal. 471, 28 P. 488; Todd v. Bettingen, 102 Minn. 260, 113 N. W. 906, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 263, note. The reversal of a judgment on appeal with directions to the trial court to enter a specific judgment, determine the merits of the cause just as effectively as though the judgment were affirmed on appeal. In the case of Keller v. Lewis, supra, the syllabus clearly expresses the holding of the Supreme Court as follows: "The opinion of this Court, on a former appeal, and its direction that the Court below render judgment in accordance with the views therein expressed, became the law of the case; that the Court below had but to follow the direction thus given; and that it had no authority to open the case for the purpose of permitting supplemental pleadings to be filed."

In the case of Heinlen v. Martin, supra, on a second appeal it was contended the trial court erred in refusing to permit amended pleadings to be filed and a retrial of the cause to be had. The Supreme Court said: "But no new trial was ordered, and none was necessary; for the Supreme Court had determined the rights of the parties, and that determination was a final adjudication of the case, itself, which only required to be embodied in form by the entry of a proper judgment in the lower Court, to make it enforceable. The entry of such a judgment was the only duty devolved upon the Court, under the mandate of the Supreme Court.

(Keller v. Lewis, 56 Cal. 466.) If upon the going down of the remittitur from the Supreme Court the lower Court had retried the case, and upon such new trial had rendered a judgment, it would have been void. (Argenti v. San Francisco, 30 Cal. 460.)"

[4] In the present case, since the appellate court passed upon the merits of the cause and directed the trial court to enter a specific judgment "that the plaintiffs take nothing by their action," it follows that the setting aside of the judgment which was subsequently rendered in conformity with the directions of the appellate court, was unauthorized and void. The avowed intention of the court to permit the filing of new pleadings which will have the effect of changing the issues which have been finally determined, and try the cause de novo is in conflict with the clear mandate of the appellate court, and is unauthorized.

[5] The writ of prohibition should therefore issue enjoining the court from permitting the filing of amended pleadings and from proceeding to retry the cause. It is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. MAAS.

Cr. 86.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

June 30, 1933.

Obstructing justice ☞16.

In prosecution for removing motorist involved in automobile accident with intent to obstruct officer from discharging his duty, evidence held insufficient to sustain conviction (Pen. Code, § 148; St. 1923, p. 563, § 142, as amended by St. 1931, p. 2130, § 56).

Evidence disclosed that motorist had visited accused, and shortly thereafter accused found motorist unconscious on highway and took him to motorist's home, and summoned physician; that officer whom he was charged with obstructing in performance of duties had not arrived on scene of accident until after parties left; that accused did not know nature of injuries of parties involved in accident, nor that officer was summoned.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; G. K. Scovel, Judge.

Arthur D. Maas was convicted of removing from scene of an automobile accident the driver of one of cars involved therein, with intent of obstructing a certain officer of California highway patrol from discharging the duties of his office, and he appeals.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

The defendant was accused of violating section 148 of the Penal Code, it being charged that he removed from the scene of an automobile accident the driver of one of the cars involved therein, with the intent of obstructing a certain officer of the California highway patrol from discharging the duties of his office. This appeal is from a judgment after the conviction of the defendant by the court sitting without a jury, and the only question presented is as to the sufficiency of the evidence.

The only evidence before the court was a stipulation, which is as follows:

"* * * It is stipulated by and between counsel in this proceeding that on or about the 21st day of October, 1932, there was an automobile accident on North Main Street of Santa Ana or South Main Street of Orange, in which accident one Rolf Von Eckhartsberg was the driver of an automobile which collided with an automobile on said highway; that immediately following the said collision there were three children killed outright. The said Rolf Von Eckhartsberg was rendered unconscious thereby and that at the time and immediately before said collision said Rolf Von Eckhartsberg had been at the home of the defendant, Arthur B. Maas; that said Rolf Von Eckhartsberg was proceeding from the home of the said defendant, Arthur B. Maas, in a general northerly direction on said highway and was so proceeding at the time of said collision; that immediately following said collision, said defendant, Arthur B. Maas, proceeded in the same direction, stopped his automobile in the immediate vicinity of said automobile accident and took the said Rolf Von Eckhartsberg from the scene of the accident and placed him in the defendant's automobile and took him to the home of the said Rolf Von Eckhartsberg in Glendale, California. Whereupon the defendant, Arthur B. Maas, called a physician where medical aid was rendered the said Rolf Von Eckhartsberg, the driver of the automobile in question; that at the time of said automobile accident there was riding with the said Rolf Von Eckhartsberg a man by the name of Curtis and another man by the name of Griffen, who received some injuries in the accident; that the said highway heretofore referred to in this stipulation was located in Orange county, California, and was a public highway in Orange county, California; that immediately following the collision between the automobiles heretofore referred to, one Vernon Barnhill, as a member of the California highway patrol, received a call and arrived at the scene of the automobile accident for the purpose of making an investigation pursuant to the provisions of the California Motor Vehicle Act, the time being about three or four minutes after the said defendant, Arthur B. Maas, had left the scene of the accident with said Rolf Von Eckhartsberg; that at all times mentioned in the information said Vernon Barnhill was a state traffic officer of the California highway patrol, being clothed with full power to perform all of the duties of the office to which he had been appointed by the director of the department of public works and chief of the division of motor vehicles, pursuant to the California Motor Vehicle Act and the Political Code of the state of California and, in order that this stipulation may be broad enough, that he was at all times a duly qualified and acting traffic officer of the California highway patrol and was on duty at that time and attempting to discharge the duties of such office, being stationed at Santa Ana, in Orange county, California; that at the time of the taking away of the said Rolf Von Eckhartsberg by the defendant, Arthur B. Maas, said Arthur B. Maas made no investigation with respect to the extent of the injuries sustained by the three children who were killed by the said accident, and, therefore, had no knowledge about the nature and extent of the injuries of the occupants of the Ford automobile, being the automobile in which the three deceased children were riding at the time of the accident and that said Arthur B. Maas did know, of his own knowledge, that the said Curtis and Griffen, being passengers in the automobile operated by Rolf Von Eckhartsberg, had received personal injuries, and that the said Ford automobile, being the automobile in which the three high school children heretofore referred to were riding, was at the time of the arrival of the said Arthur B. Maas, on its side of said highway."

From these facts it appears that Rolf Von Eckhartsberg had visited the appellant; that shortly thereafter the appellant found him unconscious on the highway, took him to his home, and summoned a physician to care for him; that the officer, whom he is charged with obstructing in the performance of his duties, had not arrived on the scene of the accident until after these parties had left; and that the appellant did not know the nature or extent of the injuries suffered by the occupants of the car with which the automobile driven by Von Eckhartsberg had collided.

While it appears that the appellant knew that two other occupants of the car which had been driven by Von Eckhartsberg had received personal injuries, it neither appears that these injuries were such that these parties needed aid or attention nor that the appellant knew that an officer had been summoned or was coming.

It may first be observed that while it was Von Eckhartsberg's duty, under section 142 of the California Vehicle Act (as amended by St. 1931, p. 2130, § 56), to report this accident to the office of the highway patrol or to the police department, he had twenty-four hours within which to do this and we know of no law that required him to remain on the scene of the accident. This being true, we are unable to see how any duty rested upon the appellant to refrain from removing him, especially in view of the fact that he was unconscious and in need of a doctor's care. The act of taking him away, in itself, was not criminal. To compel the leaving of injured persons on the scene of an accident until the arrival of an officer might, in many cases, cause unnecessary suffering and death.

The respondent relies entirely upon the proposition that the appellant took this person away with the intent or purpose of concealing him and preventing the officer from obtaining information from him. The only evidence relied upon to support this is the fact that this injured man was taken to his own home at Glendale instead of being taken to a hospital nearer at hand. If judicial notice may be taken of the fact that there were hospitals nearer at hand, it does not follow that there might not be many good reasons for preferring to take such a person to his own home and to summon doctors chosen by himself or his family. If it can be said that the one fact that this injured party was taken to his home instead of to a hospital justifies a possible inference that there was an intent to spirit him away and conceal him from the officers, it certainly cannot be said that this inference is sufficient to establish such an intent beyond a reasonable doubt. Apparently, the car driven by Von Eckhartsberg remained at the scene of the accident, presumably the registration slip therein disclosed his name and address, and in any event his two companions were still there when he was taken away. There appears to have been no difficulty in establishing his identity. We can see in the facts stipulated, at most, nothing more than grounds for suspicion that the appellant might be guilty of the offense with which he was charged.

In our opinion, the fact that the appellant, at a time when no officer was present, took an unconscious man to his home and there called a physician, instead of taking him to a hospital, is not sufficient to sustain a judgment based upon the theory that he obstructed an officer in the performance of his duties, in the absence of any other proof of concealment or intentional prevention of any proper questioning on the part of the officer.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed.

FRED C. SILVERTHORN & SONS v. PACIFIC FINANCE CORPORATION et al.

Civ. 1023.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

July 3, 1933.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 31, 1933.

1. Chattel mortgages ⇨152, 197(2).

Subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers are protected against prior deficient chattel mortgage only when they take conveyance for value and without actual notice of prior mortgage, while as to creditors such good faith is not essential (Civ. Code, § 2957).

2. Chattel mortgages ⇨182.

General creditor of mortgagor cannot set aside deficient chattel mortgage until creditor has acquired special interest in or claim on particular property involved (Civ. Code, § 2957).

3. Chattel mortgages ⇨182.

Claim on property enabling general creditor to successfully attack prior deficient chattel mortgage must be one arising from legal proceeding or one in nature of process authorizing immediate seizure of property (Civ. Code, § 2957).

4. Chattel mortgages ⇨155.

Subsequent chattel mortgage is "incumbrance" and, when taken with notice, mortgagee acquires no rights as against prior deficient mortgage (Civ. Code, § 2957).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Incumber; Incumbrance," see Words & Phrases.]

5. Chattel mortgages ⇨155.

General creditor, although not losing rights as such by taking chattel mortgage, could not, by taking chattel mortgage with notice, attack prior deficient mortgages (Civ. Code, § 2957).

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Clarence Harden, Judge.

Action by Fred C. Silverthorn & Sons against Pacific Finance Corporation and an other. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Liggett & Liggett, of San Diego, for appellant.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

The Pacific Finance Corporation took two chattel mortgages upon a dairy herd owned by one Raymond, the first of which was dated December 19, 1929, and the second April 21, 1930. Neither mortgage contained an affidavit of good faith on the part of the mortgagor, as required by section 2957 of the Civil Code. On those dates and for some years prior thereto the mortgagor was indebted to this plaintiff on account of hay and grain sold and purchased. This indebtedness to plaintiff gradually increased until February 27, 1931, at which time Raymond executed and delivered to the plaintiff a note secured by a chattel mortgage covering the same herd of cattle. It is conceded that the plaintiff had actual notice of the existence of these prior mortgages for some sixty or ninety days before taking its mortgage. All three mortgages were recorded immediately after their execution. Before the plaintiff's mortgage became due, the Pacific Finance Corporation commenced foreclosure of its mortgages by reason of defaults in payments and also commenced an action in claim and delivery and took possession of the dairy herd in question. The cattle were sold at a mortgage sale for their reasonable value and the proceeds applied upon the two mortgages first referred to. This action in conversion was then begun and from a judgment in favor of the defendants, the plaintiff has appealed.

The appellant contends that such a defective chattel mortgage is void as against creditors of the mortgagor, even though such a creditor has full knowledge of the existence of the mortgage; that while, under the decisions, such a creditor must have or secure a specific interest in or a lien of some kind upon the mortgaged property, such interest or lien may be one other than that of an attachment or execution; that the appellant secured such a special interest or lien when it obtained its chattel mortgage; and that it did not waive its status as a creditor by accepting the chattel mortgage security.

[1, 2] It has been pointed out in Cardenas v. Miller, 108 Cal. 250, 39 P. 783, 41 P. 472, 49 Am. St. Rep. 84, that the statute makes a plain distinction between creditors on the one hand and subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers on the other, the latter being protected against a prior deficient mortgage only when they take their conveyances for value and without actual notice of the prior mortgage, while as to the former such good faith is not essential. It has been thoroughly settled, however, that a general creditor of the mortgagor cannot set aside such a deficient mortgage until he has himself acquired a specific interest in or claim upon the particular property involved. Lemon v. Wolff, 121 Cal. 272, 53 P. 801; Ruggles v. Cannedy, 127 Cal. 290, 53 P. 911, 915, 59 P. 827, 46 L. R. A. 371; Wolpert v. Gripton, 213 Cal. 474, 2 P.(2d) 767, 769. In Wolpert v. Gripton, the court said: "Only a creditor who has acquired a lien upon the mortgaged property by virtue of some legal proceeding, or who is armed with some process authorizing seizure of the property, can question its compliance with the formalities prescribed by the Code."

In Ruggles v. Cannedy, it is said: "Of course, it is true in general that a creditor at large of the mortgagor cannot set aside a mortgage for lack of recordation, any more than can such a creditor set aside a sale void for want of immediate delivery. He must come first with his judgment lien, execution levy, attachment, or some other process or right by which he has acquired a specific interest in or claim upon the particular property."

[3] The essential question here presented is whether a party having a chattel mortgage, who is not an incumbrancer in good faith within the meaning of section 2957 of the Civil Code, having taken the same with actual knowledge of the existence of a prior defectively executed mortgage, has such an interest in or lien upon the mortgaged property as gives him, as a creditor, a priority over the holder of the former mortgage.

The language used in the cases above cited would indicate that the interest in or claim upon the property involved which must be acquired by a general creditor in order to enable him to successfully attack a prior mortgage not executed in full conformity with the statutes must be one arising from some legal proceeding or one in the nature of some process authorizing an immediate seizure of the property, and that something more is required than the lien of a subsequent mortgage securing a note not yet due which is taken with notice.

[4, 5] Even if the lien of such a new mortgage were, in itself, sufficient to give the specific interest required under the decisions, the subsequent mortgage is an incumbrance and, under the terms of the statute, when the same is taken with notice the incumbrancer acquires no rights as against the first mortgagee. The statutory restriction applies to the entire mortgage, including any lien in connection therewith. While, as argued, a creditor does not lose his rights as such by taking a chattel mortgage to secure his debt, it is equally true that he gains nothing as against the prior mortgage, by becoming an incumbrancer with notice. The statute makes a distinction between a creditor and an incumbrancer, in so far as the matter of notice is concerned, but it makes no distinction between an incumbrancer who with notice enters into a new transaction and one who with notice relies upon and takes security for a prior obligation. In either case the new mortgagee is an incumbrancer and is bound by the provisions of the statute.

The case of Harms v. Silva, 91 Cal. 636, 27 P. 1088, was one where a mortgage did not contain the proper certificate, and where another party took a subsequent mortgage to secure a debt due him with full knowledge of the prior mortgage. It was there held that the second mortgagee was an incumbrancer within the meaning of section 2957 of the Civil Code; that he was not an incumbrancer in good faith, since he took with knowledge; and that it made no difference that the second mortgagee was a creditor of the mortgagor, since he was relying upon his mortgage and was, in fact, a subsequent incumbrancer within the meaning of the statute.

We conclude that the appellant is in the position of a general creditor who, within the meaning of the statute and the decisions, has acquired no lien on the mortgaged property by virtue of a legal proceeding and who is not armed with any process authorizing the seizure of the property.

The judgment is affirmed.

PIGOTT v. CLARK.

Civ. 7650.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California.

June 28, 1933.

1. Appeal and error ☞1011(1).

Trial court's finding on conflicting testimony, that seller made no express warranty that tubing purchased was steel, held conclusive.

2. Sales ☞288(2).

Use of tubing for almost a year after its purchase held to preclude buyer from claiming it was not of character expressly warranted by seller.

Action by Lydia Pigott against L. G. Clark, wherein defendant filed a counterclaim. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Bernard Potter, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Raphael Dechter and Wendell Mackay, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

DESMOND, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff recovered judgment in the sum of $1,652.48 which the trial court found to be the balance due on certain promissory notes which had been transferred by one Mitchell to the plaintiff, the judgment also carrying costs.

The defendant appeals, not questioning the correctness of the amount which the court found was unpaid, but contending that no part of it is due or owing, claiming specifically that there is insufficient evidence to justify the decision, or particularly one of the findings numbered XIII, which is hereinafter set forth.

The defendant, a veterinarian by profession, was the owner of an oil well in the Alamos Heights field. His superintendent, Howard Murchie, an oil man of many years' experience, purchased in December, 1927, some 2½-inch upset tubing from Alfred W. Mitchell, doing business as Coast Supply Company. Mitchell had a 5-acre lot on which he kept pipe, tubing, and other supplies. The tubing was kept in piles and the particular lot in question was selected by Murchie. It appeared at the trial that various kinds of tubing are used in oil operations, among them "Reading," "D B X," and seamless steel tubing. "Reading" is an iron tubing, but, according to the testimony, the difference between iron and steel would not be discernible unless the tubing were cleaned and wiped off. The bill of exceptions before us does not indicate that Murchie appeared as a witness at the trial. Mitchell testified that Murchie selected the tubing after he examined it in the pile where it was placed on the Mitchell lot and accepted it, about a month before Dr. Clark called at the Coast Supply office and made settlement for the tubing by giving his promissory notes. It appears that no trouble was experienced with any of the tubing until October or November of 1928, almost a year after its purchase. At that time the tubing was "pulled" from the well and, according to defendant's testimony, it was found then that the tubing that had been delivered was of two kinds, "Reading" and seamless steel. During the year 1929 the tubing was pulled approximately a dozen times. Whenever the tubing was pulled, it was found that joints of "Reading" had split, but the seamless steel tubing was intact. Finally, all the "Reading" tubing was replaced with seamless steel, no further trouble developing thereafter. Defendant set up a counterclaim by way of an affirmative defense claiming reimbursement in the sum of $526.51 for the replacement of the "Reading" joints and $1,000 for lost production resulting from delay and inability to pump the well while the pulling operations were under way. Dr. Clark testified that when he signed the notes he said to Mr. Mitchell: "That tubing is supposed to be real good used tubing, isn't it, steel seamless tubing?" And that Mitchell answered, "Yes." Further conversation according to Dr. Clark was as follows: "You know I don't know anything about this oil business, and my superintendent tells me it is good stuff, and I am asking you if it is good stuff." To which Mitchell replied: "It is absolutely as good stuff as I ever saw; steel seamless tubing." Mr. Mitchell, on the other hand, said on the witness stand: "Dr. Clark wanted to give notes for it. Not a word was said about seamless tubing to my recollection. Not a word was said about tubing." Mitchell also testified that "the average length of life for tubing, in wells in the Alamitos Heights is six months to twelve months, some of them longer"; saying also that there would be less wear on the tubing by friction of the rods in a straight hole than in a crooked well. It also appeared from testimony of one of the plaintiff's witnesses, B. H. Graham, a dealer in oil well supplies for twelve or fourteen years, that the average life of new tubing in the Alamitos Heights field is approximately a year. This witness testified that "Reading" tubing is not used any more in the present day deep wells, "unless there were certain water conditions that would warrant them using it." This "because they have seamless tubing now that we didn't have four or five years ago." There was evidence that "Reading" tubing is used in preference to steel where subterranean acid conditions prevail, and that it commands a price about 20 per cent. higher than steel tubing. As will be seen from the above-quoted portion of Dr. Clark's testimony, the tubing purchased by his superintendent Murchie from Mitchell was not new, but used tubing. In regard to it Mitchell testified as follows, according to the bill of exceptions: "If we got a string of tubing we thought was good we put it in a good pile and sold it. I didn't know whether that was Reading or steel tubing when it was sold. Maybe I would not know, maybe I would, but I don't remember now. Mr. Murchie is an old time oil man, the same as myself." He also testified: "Reading has lettering on the side, D B X has it on the collar, and seamless has it on the side. It is easy to distinguish it if you wash it off and look for it."

Finding XIII to which appellant excepts reads as follows: "That all and singular the allegations of the first and separate affirmative and distinct defense and counterclaim are untrue, and the court specifically finds that there was no valid agreement extending the time of payment of the promissory notes as alleged in said answer; that court further specifically finds that no representations were made at the time of the purchase of the tubing in the counterclaim set forth of any kind whatsoever and that said tubing was purchased through the superintendent of the defendant, who was duly authorized by said defendant to make said purchase; that said tubing was examined by said superintendent of defendant and defendant accepted and used said tubing after an inspection and acceptance by the defendant through his superintendent."

This finding effectively disposes of the defendant's counterclaim and on the facts disclosed by the transcript some of which are recited above, properly so, in our opinion. Defendant had abundant opportunity to examine the tubing, for it was used in his well, placed there joint by joint by his superintendent. If there were any question in the mind of the superintendent as to whether any particular joint were iron or steel it could have been answered very easily by washing the pipe. It appears quite definitely that Mr. Murchie either knew that some of the tubing was "Reading" and was satisfied to use it, or that he considered the character of the tubing of so little consequence that he didn't even have the joints cleaned to determine whether they were iron or steel. It may be noted also that at least some of the iron joints lasted for almost a year and further that, according to Mr. Mitchell, "Dr. Clark never complained about the character of the tubing until a week ago when we had this suit, when I read the complaint. That was the first time I ever knew there was any complaint about the tubing."

In support of this appeal, defendant cites section 1767 of the Civil Code as it was in effect at the date of this transaction, reading thus: "One who sells or agrees to sell personal property, knowing that the buyer relies upon his advice or judgment, thereby warrants to the buyer that neither the seller, nor any agent employed by him in the transaction, knows the existence of any fact concerning the thing sold which would, to his knowledge, destroy the buyer's inducement to buy."

A mere reading of this section demonstrates that it is inapplicable to the present situation for there was no evidence that at the time the tubing was purchased the buyer relied upon Mr. Mitchell's advice or judgment; as a matter of fact, he undoubtedly relied upon the advice and judgment of his own superintendent.

[1, 2] The allegation of the express warranty as to the character of the tubing set up in the affirmative defense was effectively refuted in the opinion of the trial court by the testimony of the witness Mitchell, directly conflicting with Dr. Clark's testimony on that subject. This is a finding upon a question of fact which under the Constitution we have no power, and under the circumstances of this case, no inclination to disturb. There is no testimony in this case as to any representation or undertaking by the seller of the tubing at the time Murchie, the superintendent, purchased it. We know nothing about that transaction beyond the fact that he bought a certain amount of pipe from a pile which he examined and accepted as satisfactory for his own purpose. There is no testimony even of any statement being made as to the use to which it was to be put. Let us here consider the law as expounded in the syllabus of Jackson v. Porter Land & Water Co., 151 Cal. 32, 90 P. 122: "When personal property is tendered or delivered to a purchaser in fulfillment of a contract for the purchase thereof, the duty devolves upon him to make an examination of it for the purpose of determining whether it fills the contract, and if from such examination he finds it does not, he must promptly reject it. This duty of inspection for the purpose of determining whether the property complies with the contract must be exercised within a reasonable time, and what is a reasonable time depends upon the circumstances of each particular case. In the present case, the use by the purchaser for a period of almost two months of an engine which did not have the capacity contracted for, he during all of that period knowing of its want of capacity, and not objecting to it on that ground, operated as an election to accept the engine, and precluded him from claiming that it was not of the character provided for in the contract."

Judgment affirmed.

KASPARIAN (KASPARIAN et al., Interveners) v. KASPARIAN et al.

Civ. 1221.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

June 23, 1933.

1. Executors and administrators ⚡269.

Probate court's order authorizing executrix to compromise widow's suit against estate and another for sum paid solely to widow, pursuant to stipulation, held not to release estate's claim against executrix' codefendant, though obscure sentence so provided.

2. Judgment ⚡386(7).

Fraud in having judgment entered adjudicating that realty was not community property, where stipulation in widow's suit against executrix and decedent's father authorized only judgment for defendants, held "extrinsic fraud" as to decedent's minor children, not parties to suit, who could set aside judgment on motion within reasonable time, regardless of limitation in statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

"Intrinsic fraud" is something that occurs in the course of an adversary proceeding, such as the production of perjured testimony or forged documents where adversary party has opportunity to make truth appear, whereas "extrinsic fraud" is where successful party prevents by fraud and deception unsuccessful party from fully exhibiting his case, as by keeping him away from court by false promise of a compromise, or where defendant never had knowledge of the suit, so that there was no real contest in the trial or hearing of the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Extrinsic or Collateral Fraud" and "Intrinsic Fraud," see Words & Phrases.]

3. Judgment ⚡375.

Judgment that realty was not community property held properly set aside on motion of decedent's minor children, not parties to widow's suit against executrix and decedent's father, where stipulation authorized only judgment for defendants, and probate court authorizing executrix to settle litigation was not advised of minors' pending suit to have property declared community property.

4. Appeal and error ⚡1011(1).

Trial court's decision on conflicting evidence is conclusive.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; Frank Lamberson, Judge.

Action by Satenig Kasparian against Garabed M. Kasparian, also known as G. M. Kasparian, and another, where, after entry of judgment, in excess of stipulation for judgment for defendants, Nevart Kasparian and Grace Kasparian, minors, by Satenig Kasparian, guardian ad litem, intervened and moved to set aside such judgment. From an order setting aside such judgment, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Farnsworth, Burke & Maddox, of Visalia, and K. Ohanian, of Fresno (James K. Abercrombie, of Visalia, of counsel), for appellant Garabed M. Kasparian.

Karl A. Machetanz, of Exeter, for appellant Lilly Andrews.

Harris & Hayhurst, K. Kuyumjian, and Rue C. Gibson, all of Fresno, for respondents.

MARKS, Justice.

M. G. Kasparian was the husband of Sate-nig Kasparian and the father of Nevart Kasparian and Grace Kasparian, the interveners, and a third child, Deran, who does not appear in this action, all minors. He was the son of Garabed M. Kasparian and the brother of Lilly Andrews, the appellants. He died testate on November 1, 1930, naming Lilly Andrews as the executrix of his will, which was admitted to probate on December 8, 1930. By this will he recognized that plaintiff would succeed to one-half of the community property and bequeathed her $1. He bequeathed all the remaining community property to his three children and his separate property to his sister, Lilly Andrews.

After the will was admitted to probate in Tulare county, two inventories were returned showing one parcel of real property of the value of $2,000 in the city of Fresno, and personal property of the value of $1,108.47. During the course of the administration of the estate, the plaintiff commenced two actions in the superior court of Tulare county, one against the Missouri State Life Insurance Company, Lilly Andrews, as executrix, and Garabed M. Kasparian, in which she sought to recover an undivided one-half interest in all moneys due under a life insurance policy upon the life of M. G. Kasparian, upon the theory that the premiums on the policy had been paid out of the community funds of herself and her deceased husband. The second action was against Garabed M. Kasparian and Lilly Andrews as executrix. Four causes of action were stated. In the first it was alleged that a parcel of real property in Tulare county was the community property of herself and her deceased husband with the record title standing in the name of the latter; that her husband had represented to her that it was necessary to secure a loan, using this property as security in a mortgage or deed of trust; that he presented an instrument to her which he represented was either a mortgage or deed of trust and which she signed without reading, relying solely upon his representations; that in fact it was a grant deed purporting to convey the property to Garabed M. Kasparian; that she did not discover the fraud until on or after November 20, 1930; that this conveyance was without consideration. The other causes of action alleged that her deceased husband had purchased three parcels of real property with community funds and that each parcel had been deeded to Garabed M. Kasparian without her knowledge and without his paying any consideration for any of them. The plaintiff sought a decree of court establishing the fact that the four parcels of land were community property; that the first deed be set aside and that Garabed M. Kasparian be required to reconvey the property described in the first cause of action to the executrix of her husband's estate and to the plaintiff; that the other parcels of real estate be adjudged to be community property of deceased and the plaintiff and that Garabed M. Kasparian be required to reconvey a one-half interest therein to the estate and the remaining one-half to the plaintiff; that Garabed M. Kasparian be required to account for all the rents, issues, and profits he had received from the four parcels of real property.

The defendants appeared separately in the action. Garabed M. Kasparian denied all of the material allegations of the complaint and alleged that he had actually furnished all of the money to purchase all of the real property in question, and that it was at all times his separate estate. Lilly Andrews as executrix alleged that she had no knowledge or belief as to the material allegations of the complaint concerning the title to the various parcels of real estate, and denied all of such allegations. She alleged upon information and belief that the real estate had all been purchased with money which belonged to Garabed M. Kasparian, and that the deceased and plaintiff had never had any right, title, or interest in any of it.

The two actions were commenced on January 2, 1931, and negotiations followed for their settlement which resulted in the filing of two written stipulations signed by the attorneys for the respective parties. The stipulation filed in the case against the insurance company bears the numbers of both actions, and reads as follows: "It is hereby stipulated by and between the attorneys for the respective parties hereto, that the first entitled action (the insurance case) shall be and is hereby settled by the entry of a judgment and decree herein which shall provide as follows: First: Plaintiff shall have and recover judgment for nineteen thousand dollars ($19,000.00) payable on the entry of the judgment. Second: In all other respects judgment in this action, and in the action to recover a certain interest in certain real estate, and which action is numbered 22090 on the records of the above named superior court shall be rendered in favor of the defendants and each of them. Third: Each party to the above entitled litigation and the action concerning the real estate shall bear his or her own costs. Fourth: The respective parties to said actions agree to sign, execute and deliver any and all papers, documents, releases, deeds, and conveyances and other instruments necessary to effectuate the purposes of this agreement in all respects. Dated: March 9th, 1931."

The following stipulation was filed in the other action: "It is hereby stipulated and agreed by and between the plaintiff above named and the defendants above named, that judgment in the above entitled action may be entered in favor of the said defendants, and against said plaintiff. Each party to pay his own costs. Dated: March 13, 1931."

Lilly Andrews filed her petition for authority to compromise the two actions brought by Satenig Kasparian against Garabed M. Kasparian and herself as executrix, praying for leave to compromise the cases in accordance with the stipulations already referred to. This petition was heard the same day in the probate court, and an order was signed authorizing the settlement.

[1] Counsel for Lilly Andrews calls our attention to the fact that it is stated in the petition to compromise that "Satenig Kasparian, the widow of said M. G. Kasparian, deceased, received for herself and as representative for the estate of M. G. Kasparian, deceased, the sum of nineteen thousand ($19,000.00) dollars in cash as a compromise." He also refers to an obscure sentence in the long order authorizing the compromise "wherein the said plaintiff, Satenig Kasparian, received the sum of nineteen thousand ($19,000.00) dollars cash in settlement of any and all claims which she might have, or the estate of M. G. Kasparian, deceased, might have, against any of the property of G. M. Kasparian, also known as Garabed M. Kasparian, be and the same is hereby approved." He now urges that the payment of $19,000 to Satenig Kasparian was in full settlement of not only her claim against Garabed M. Kasparian, but also in full settlement of any claim of the estate in and to the property involved in the action. If the clause just quoted was ever particularly called to the attention of the probate judge, we are of the opinion that, in so far as it attempted to authorize a release of any claim which the estate had against Garabed M. Kasparian was beyond the power of the probate court to make in such a proceeding. It should be observed that the money was paid in its entirety to Satenig Kasparian. No part of it was paid to the estate. We know of no rule of law in California permitting a probate court to authorize an executrix to divest the estate of any interest in real property in any such proceeding and without any consideration therefor flowing to the estate. The last paragraph of the order authorizing the compromise rather conclusively rebuts the contention of the executrix. This paragraph is as follows: "It is further ordered and decreed that the act of said Lilly Andrews as executrix of the last will and testament of M. G. Kasparian deceased, in entering into and agreeing to said compromise and settlement of both of said actions Nos. 22089 and 22090 respectively be, and the same is hereby approved and confirmed, and that all of the acts and proceedings of said executrix as set forth in her said petition are hereby approved and confirmed; and said executrix and her said attorneys are hereby authorized to consent in accordance with the said stipulations in said actions that said judgment be made and entered in said action No. 22090 in accordance with the stipulation therein." This clearly shows that the probate judge intended to authorize the compromise set forth in the stipulations and no other. This stipulation provided that judgment should be entered against the plaintiff and in favor of the defendants. It did not purport to attempt to authorize any settlement of any controversy between Garabed M. Kasparian and the estate of M. G. Kasparian. We are of the opinion that the order authorized a compromise of the claim of Satenig Kasparian only.

On May 18, 1931, a judgment was entered in the suit brought by Satenig Kasparian which affected the title to the real property in question. This judgment recited that the plaintiff was neither present nor represented by counsel. It set forth the second stipulation which we have quoted, and based the judgment upon its terms. The judgment, however, went far beyond the language of this stipulation, and decreed that the plaintiff had no interest in the property; that the property had not been purchased with any of the community funds of M. G. Kasparian, deceased, and plaintiff, but was purchased with the separate funds of Garabed M. Kasparian, who owned it free of any claim of the plaintiff and the estate upon it. It effectually established title in Garabed M. Kasparian and divested the estate of any interest in the property.

On November 17, 1931, the interveners by their guardian ad litem served and filed in the respondent court a notice of motion to set aside and vacate this judgment upon the following grounds: "(1) That said judgment was taken against movants through their inadvertence, surprise and excusable neglect. (2) That said judgment was obtained through the fraud and collusion of said defendant Lilly Andrews, executrix of the last will of M. G. Kasparian, deceased, and G. M. Kasparian. (3) That said G. M. Kasparian and Lilly Andrews, as executrix of the last will and testament of M. G. Kasparian, deceased, conspired and colluded together for the purpose of having said judgment entered and for the purpose of defrauding and depriving these movants of their interests in the real property described in said judgment. (4) That said judgment was and is void on the ground that the same was entered and based upon a stipulation incorporated in said judgment and that the said judgment so far as it affects the movants and their interests in the real property described in said judgment is not in accordance with, but goes beyond the terms of said stipulation. (5) That said Lilly Andrews, as executrix of the last will and testament of M. G. Kasparian, deceased, never obtained any authority from the probate court in the matter of the estate of M. G. Kasparian, deceased, to enter into said or any stipulation upon which said judgment was based. (6) That these movants at the time of the commencement of said action were, and ever since have been, minors; and said minors have not nor has either of them during any of said time had any guardian legally appointed by deed, will or otherwise; and said minors were not nor were either of them during any of said time represented in said action by any guardian ad litem. (7) That neither of said movants, to-wit, said minors, were ever served with summons or appeared in said action; that they were not nor were either of them present when said stipulation was signed or when said judgment was entered, and neither of them at any time had any knowledge of the making of said or any stipulation and/or the making of said or any judgment based thereon. (8) That the said Satenig Kasparian, the plaintiff in said action, was ignorant of the fact that said stipulation had been signed or made by her attorneys in said action and that said attorneys had never received any authority from said Satenig Kasparian or from any one else to make or enter into said stipulation or to allow or to permit or consent to the entry of said judgment in accordance with said stipulation or in accordance with the terms of said judgment as entered. (9) That said judgment is void in that it purports to determine and adjudicate that the estate of M. G. Kasparian, deceased, and those interested therein, including Lilly Andrews, as executrix of said estate and these movants, have no right, title or interest in and to the real property described in said judgment, and that portion of said judgment is not in accordance with said stipulation and is not within or supported by any of the issues tendered by any of the pleadings in said action."

This motion to vacate the judgment was made on December 7, 1931, and was granted on February 4, 1932, in so far as the judgment related to the executrix and to the minors. Attached to the notice of motion is a copy of a deed from Satenig Kasparian to Garabed M. Kasparian and Vartoohi Kasparian, his wife, quitclaiming all the interest of the grantor in the insurance policy and the real property; also the supporting affidavit of Satenig Kasparian and a complaint in intervention by the interveners in this action, by Satenig Kasparian their guardian ad litem. In the order of February 4, 1932, "it was further ordered that the motion of said minors to intervene in said action be and the same is hereby granted."

While appellants have filed separate briefs, they urge the same grounds for a reversal of the order. First, "that the action of the trial court was not properly invoked. In other words, respondents should have attacked this judgment by an independent action in equity and not by mere motion, and the trial court had no jurisdiction to hear or decide such motion. Second, that even admitting the procedure followed to have been proper, said order was without any support or justification in the evidence." We will consider these contentions in the order stated.

[2] Appellants urge that the fraud, if any, was first intrinsic; and, second, that, as the motion was made more than six months after the entry of the judgment sought to be set aside, the trial judge had no authority to vacate it under the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Extrinsic fraud has been defined in the case of McGuinness v. Superior Court, 196 Cal. 222, 237 P. 42, 45, 40 A. L. R. 1110, as follows: "In each of the three former cases [People v. Mooney, 178 Cal. 525, 174 P. 325; Pico v. Cohn, 91 Cal. 129, 25 P. 970, 27 P. 537, 13 L. R. A. 336, 25 Am. St. Rep. 159; Flood v. Templeton, 152 Cal. 148, 92 P. 78, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 579] the fraud which was held to be or defined as intrinsic fraud was such as occurred in the course of an adversary proceeding; such as the production of perjured testimony or forged documents during a trial wherein the adversary party had the opportunity to make the truth appear. In the case of United States v. Throckmorton [98 U. S. 61, 25 L. Ed. 93], supra, the Supreme Court of the United States, after instancing situations in which the fraud practiced upon the adversary party or the court would be intrinsic fraud, points out the line of demarcation between these instances and those wherein by reason of something done by the successful party to a suit there was in fact no adversary trial or decision of the issue in the case, as 'where the unsuccessful party has been prevented from fully exhibiting his case by fraud or deception practiced upon him by his opponent, as by keeping him away from court by a false promise of a compromise; or where the defendant never had knowledge of the suit, * * * these and similar cases which show that there has never been a real contest in the trial or hearing of the case'; such are, in the view of that tribunal, instances of extrinsic fraud. In the recent case of Simonton v. Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank, 192 Cal. 651, 221 P. 368, it was held by this court that the fraudulent concealment or omission through mistake of an executrix to account for personal property belonging to the estate of the decedent with the result that such property was appropriated by such executrix for her own personal use and benefit constituted extrinsic fraud, and this court in that case cited numerous other cases in this and other courts supporting the principle illustrated in the Throckmorton Case. It seems to us that the facts of this case bring it by clear analogy within the doctrines thus laid down defining cases of extrinsic fraud. In the case in hand there was no adversary proceeding attending or embracing the action of the court in the divorce action at the time of the application for and entry of the final decree." We think that under this definition the fraud here disclosed must be held to be extrinsic. It did not occur in the course of an adversary proceeding at which the plaintiff was either present or represented. At the time the judgment in question was entered, neither the plaintiff nor her attorneys were present, and the minors were not present nor represented either by a general guardian or guardian ad litem. In fact there is no showing that they had either at that time, and, in the absence of such showing, we are authorized to assume that they had neither. The judgment which purported to have been entered upon and in accordance with the terms of a written stipulation went far beyond the terms authorized by it. Under these circumstances the definition which we have quoted applies to the facts before us. The fraud was extrinsic, and, being such, the trial court had authority to set aside and vacate the judgment within a reasonable time regardless of the limitation contained in section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. McGuinness v. Superior Court, supra.

The case of Sharp v. Eagle Lake Lumber Co., 60 Cal. App. 386, 212 P. 933, also supports this position. It holds that a motion to vacate and set aside a judgment is a direct and not a collateral attack upon it. It is also authority for the conclusion that, where the summons in an action has been served upon the vice president of a defunct corporation and a judgment thereafter entered, a stockholder of the defunct corporation may move to set aside the judgment after the expiration of six months from its rendition even though it should be held that the limitations of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure should apply.

If we assume the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure apply here, the case of In re Mercereau, 126 Cal. App. 590, 14 P.(2d) 1019, is authority for our holding that the motion of the minors to vacate the judgment was made in time; it being made within one year from the entry of the questioned judgment. In the Mercereau Case the petitioners sought to have land registered under the Land Title Law adopted by the people on November 3, 1914. William C. La Berge was named a defendant, and was served by mail. The decree was entered April 25, 1929. On April 11, 1930, Ora E. La Berge, wife of William, moved the court to vacate the decree in so far as it affected her interest in the land. Her motion was granted, and this court affirmed the order. A hearing was denied in the Supreme Court. The record indicated that Mrs. La Berge claimed an interest in the property; that she was not named as a defendant and was not notified and did not know of the pendency of the proceeding. This case is authority for the rule that, when a person claims an interest in real property, is not named as a defendant, and is not served with process, and does not know of the pendency of the action, such person may move, within one year under the provision of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to vacate a judgment which purports to defeat the claim of interest in such property.

The foregoing case is authority for our holding that, as the minors who are intervening here were not parties to the action and were not served with any summons, and as the judgment deprived them through the estate of their deceased father of any interest in the real property in question and any right to claim such interest, they could move to set aside the judgment at any time within one year from its rendition, under the limitation contained in section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Nevart Kasparian and Grace Kasparian, by their guardian ad litem, filed an action in the superior court of Tulare county against Garabed M. Kasparian, Vartoohi Kasparian, his wife, and Lilly Andrews as executrix. The complaint contained allegations similar to those set forth in the complaint of their mother. Summons in this action was served on Garabed M. Kasparian in Fresno county on April 23, 1931, and on Lilly Andrews in the same county on May 5, 1931.

[3,4] We have studied the record carefully, and have concluded that it furnishes ample evidence supporting the order of the trial court vacating and setting aside a portion of the judgment. The affidavit of Satenig Kasparian sets forth all of the facts which we have outlined, together with those set forth in the complaint in intervention which stated facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. In addition it was made to appear that appellants were both served with the copy of the summons and complaint in the action by the minors to have the property in question declared the community property of their parents, M. G. Kasparian, deceased, and Satenig Kasparian. This fact was not disclosed to the probate court at the time it made the order authorizing the compromise. The evidence offered by interveners supporting the order was contradicted. This created a conflict which was addressed to the trial judge. His decision on conflicting evidence is final in this court.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

1. Clubs ⇨ 13½.

Evidence in minority stockholders' action to set aside incorporated social club's transfer of assets to defendant corporation held not to show inadequate consideration for merger agreement.

2. Corporations ⇨ 182.

Majority stockholders owe minority stockholders duty to exercise good faith, care, and diligence to make corporation's property produce largest possible amount, protect minority stockholders' interests, and secure and deliver to them their just proportion of income and proceeds of property.

3. Clubs ⇨ 13½.

Evidence in minority stockholders' action to set aside incorporated social club's transfer of assets to defendant corporation held to show that codefendant directors and majority stockholders did not benefit themselves at minority stockholders' expense.

4. Trial ⇨ 139(1).

Court may grant motion for nonsuit when evidence on plaintiff's direct or cross-examination so conclusively establishes defense that court might properly grant new trial after verdict for plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. H. Dehy, Judge.

Action by Stewart L. Crebs and others against the Uplifters Country Home, a corporation, and others. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

Hunsaker & Cosgrove and William A. Barnhill, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

STURTEVANT, Justice.

The plaintiffs, minority stockholders, commenced an action in behalf of themselves and all other interested persons against the defendant corporation and the directors thereof to obtain a judgment setting aside a written transfer and to obtain an accounting. At the end of the plaintiffs' case the trial court ordered a nonsuit. From the judgment entered thereon, the plaintiffs have appealed.

In their complaint the plaintiffs did not plead actual fraud and on the trial they did not introduce evidence proving or tending to prove actual fraud. However, it was the theory of their case that the transaction complained of constituted constructive fraud.

In 1920 a number of men residing in Los Angeles were invited to attend an outing given by the Family Club of San Francisco. They were so pleased with the entertainment, accommodations, surroundings, etc., that they commenced to discuss the formation of a club of their own. The result of those discussions led to the formation of a club named "The Uplifters." Soon after the club was organized it became advisable to consider the matter of incorporating. At that time the provisions of the federal statutes were such that admission fees to a club were taxed. For the purpose of avoiding the taxation burdens two separate corporations were formed. The club was formed as a nonstock, nonprofit, social organization under the name of "The Uplifters." Members of the club formed at the same time a stock corporation under the name of "Uplifters Country Home." At the time the latter corporation was formed the articles provided for a capital stock of $150,000 divided into 600 shares of the par value of $250 each. The first subscribers, those named in the articles of incorporation, were all members of the club. The directors of the two corporations were identical or nearly identical at the time of the formation of the two corporations and from time to time thereafter. Shares in the stock corporation were sold only to members of the club. Soon after the stock corporation was formed, it purchased a tract of real estate in Rustic canyon near the city of Santa Monica, in Los Angeles county, and commenced to improve it by building thereon and making other improvements. It built and furnished a clubhouse and many other buildings; it laid out and equipped a polo field, and in short did many things to make the property a country place of recreation. Many members of the club, acting as individuals and for their individual use, constructed buildings on the property so owned by the Uplifters Country Home.

In June, 1921, the Uplifters Country Home and the Uplifters executed a lease for the term of fifty years. By its provisions Uplifters Country Home leased to the Uplifters all of the real estate it then owned together with the improvements thereon. It also agreed to buy additional lands and to erect such other improvements as the lessee might desire in a sum not to exceed $250,000. It agreed not to lease, or purchase, or acquire any interest in any other real property except on the written permission of the lessee. Any additional property purchased it agreed to lease to the lessee without any additional charge. The expenditures on any of said property were to be made under the supervision of the lessee and for such things as the lessee might request. The consideration for said lease was $10 per annum and a covenant that the lessee would pay all taxes, liens, assessments, and claims assessed against the property leased or thereafter acquired by the lessor. That item is stated as amounting to $18,000 annually. Both parties agreed that the lessor would not sell any of its stock except to members of the lessee. The lessor further agreed that the members of the lessee might remove any buildings they had built on the lessor's land. Having acquired some additional lands on the 13th day of April, 1927, the same lessor leased to the same lessee for the term of ten years all of the lands so acquired. The covenants contained in the lease are similar to those recited in the first lease. The plaintiffs pleaded one lease and the defendants pleaded the other. The genuineness and due execution of each was admitted by the pleadings. Rosenthal v. Merced Bank, 110 Cal. 198, 203, 42 P. 640. On the 26th day of January, 1929, the Uplifters Country Home and the Uplifters executed a written contract which is the object of attack by the plaintiffs in this case. By the terms of that instrument the Uplifters sold and assigned to Uplifters Country Home all of its interests in both of the leases. It also sold and assigned to that company all of its personal property, accounts, and other assets. The purchaser assumed the debts of the seller. Both parties assert the instrument was an agreement whereby the Uplifters was merged in the Uplifters Country Home.

In their complaint the plaintiffs did not plead the contract in hæc verba, but they alleged that it was neither executed for an adequate consideration nor any consideration whatever. That allegation was denied by the defendants. On the opening of the trial the plaintiffs made an extended statement showing in detail the facts on which they based their allegations. The defendants made an extended reply. The two statements showed that the parties did not disagree as to the probative facts but did disagree as to the ultimate facts and the conclusions of law to be drawn therefrom. Thereupon the plaintiffs called the officers of the defendant corporation and other witnesses and introduced evidence in minute detail which they claimed supported their allegations. They produced the ex-secretary and one of defendants' attorneys. They introduced the books, copies of accounts, minutes, and correspondence of the defendant corporation and its officers. Few objections were made and none was sustained so far as counsel have noted in their briefs. In presenting their case the plaintiffs claimed the right to introduce proof on every issue made by the pleadings. They proceeded accordingly. When the plaintiff rested, every single material fact had apparently been examined into. Thereupon the defendants made a motion for a nonsuit, which was granted, and, as recited above, the plaintiffs have appealed from the judgment entered thereon.

[1, 2] It is first contended that the consideration for the merger agreement was inadequate. The point involves the accounts as of the date of the merger agreement. The plaintiffs introduced balance sheets dated August 31, 1928. They take their figures from those sheets. The Uplifters Country Home so kept its books as to show a charge against the Uplifters for depreciation in the sum of $50,034.88. The plaintiffs have not quoted any facts and have not cited any authorities showing that said charge was a legal charge against the Uplifters. They intimate that the "Saddle Club" was indebted to the Uplifters Country Home. Be that as it may, the accounts of the Saddle Club were included in those of the Uplifters as shown by the balance sheet. That sheet showed a debt, cash advanced to the Uplifters by the Uplifters Country Home, $84,506.54. It also showed accounts payable, $15,347.59. The sum of those two items is $99,854.13. But, as shown above, that computation is of the date of August 31, 1928. In payment of said amount the Uplifters assigned its personal property and accounts receivable. As shown by the same sheet those items were of the value of $53,133.72. It also transferred to the Uplifters Country Home a membership list showing monthly payments in dues of $4,605, or the total sum of $55,260 annually. Furthermore, it assigned the two leases which it held on the lands owned by the Uplifters Country Home. Those lands and improvements the plaintiffs claim were of the value of $1,500,000. The value of the leasehold, it was testified, was from $50,000 to $75,000 per annum. All of the foregoing facts had been developed without conflict when the plaintiffs rested. No witness testified how the accounts stood as of the date of the merger. Mr. Paine, president of Uplifters Country Home, issued a financial statement as of date September 30, 1929, in which he stated many facts regarding the relations of the two corporations. Among others, he stated: "This would reduce the actual indebtedness from the social club to the corporation as of October 1, 1928, to $29,735.96. It is stated by Mr. Murphy that the assets of the social club other than its lease were of the actual value of approximately $50,000. This sum more than offsets the liabilities that were canceled." Adding together the values of the things transferred and comparing the total of that sum with the total amount of the sums paid therefor, it may not be said that the consideration was inadequate. If the balance leaned in favor of either side, it was in favor of the minority stockholders. The plaintiffs quote the rule as follows: " * * * A majority of the holders of stock owe to the minority the duty to exercise good faith, care, and diligence to make the property of the corporation in their charge produce the largest possible amount, to protect the interests of the holders of the minority of the stock, and to secure and deliver to them their just proportion of the income and of the proceeds of the property." Union Pac. R. Co. v. Frank (C. C. A.) 226 F. 906, 920. The rule as stated is clearly the law. But the record before us shows the defendants performed every one of those duties and violated no one of them.

[3] But, the plaintiffs argue, there are other facts on which they rely. They say: "Before we consider the effect of the agreement—what it accomplished—we wish to make it clear that we make no point whatever that these five directors were interested directors within the settled rule. Necessarily they were, under the mechanics of the by-law of the land corporation we have discussed above, and in such a way that appellants cannot complain on that score. Under that by-law, which was, and is, binding on appellants, every act of the directors of the land corporation was necessarily, at least, theoretically, the act of interested directors, and to this appellants as stockholders impliedly consent. But we do invoke the rule—thereafter discussed—that these directors, even though interested in such a way as to occasion no complaint of their acts as such, are forbidden to use their position to benefit themselves and the majority, of whom they are a part, to the detriment of the minority stockholders." (Italics by plaintiffs.) They then quote as follows: "Where the majority of a company propose to benefit themselves at the expense of the minority, the court may interfere to protect the minority." Menier v. Hooper's Telegraph Works, 9 Ch. App. Cas. 350. In what we said in discussing the last point, it is at once apparent that the defendants did not "benefit themselves" at the expense of the minority. As the record stands, it would appear the minority got more than it was entitled to.

Preceding the annual meeting of October 27, 1928, the matter of the merger was discussed among some of the stockholders. That discussion was given the widest publicity. When the meeting convened, more than two-thirds of the stockholders gave their consent to the merger after the subject had been fully discussed. At that same meeting a new board of directors was chosen for the purpose of adopting and formulating a plan. The meeting then adjourned to reconvene on the last Saturday in January, 1929. On that date the agreement was presented, approved, and signed by authority of the board of directors and on the same date it was presented to an adjourned meeting of stockholders and was ratified by a vote of more than a majority of them. Some dissenting voices having been heard, the matter was brought up at the stockholders' meeting in October, 1929, and was again ratified by stockholders representing 1,298 shares voting in the affirmative out of a number holding 1,431 shares out of a total authorized issue of 1,692 shares. Stockholders representing 147 shares only voted in the negative. The defendants claim these ratifications constitute defenses. If one corporation was suing the other, the contention would be sound. San Diego, O. T. & P. B. R. Co. v. Pacific Beach Co., 112 Cal. 53, 44 P. 333, 33 L. R. A. 788. But in the instant case the plaintiffs stand as minority stockholders claiming that the contract was fraudulent. As we understand them, it is their contention that the so-called ratifications were but the consents of the stockholders, without which the instrument would not have constituted a contract. Section 361a, Civ. Code, Stats. 1903, p. 396. Continuing, they claim that although a purported contract is ratified by the majority stockholders, nevertheless the minority may come into a court of equity and ask for a cancellation if they can show that the purported contract had the result of dividing the assets, more or less, between the majority stockholders to the exclusion of the minority. Colgate v. United States Leather Co., 73 N. J. Eq. 72, 67 A. 657, 663, is an authority to the contrary. It was reversed on other grounds. We have not had called to our attention any other authority that is directly in point. For these reasons we do not feel called upon to decide the question.

It is said the contract of merger was written in secrecy. That statement rests on the fact that the attorneys who wrote it did not, prior to the meeting of the board of directors at which it was adopted, advise Mr. Lawler that they were writing the instrument. Such fact did not prove nor tend to prove any issue made by the pleadings.

[4] It is intimated that the accounts receivable which were assigned by the Uplifters were not collectible. However, there was no evidence what accounts were receivable or were assigned by the Uplifters. Accounts held in August, 1928, may have been paid prior to January 26, 1929. As to whether they were paid or were not paid, as to whether they were disputed or undisputed, and as to whether the debtors were solvent or insolvent, no evidence was introduced. The plaintiffs contend the evidence which they had introduced was such that the motion for a nonsuit should have been denied. 9 Cal. Jur. 551. In view of the facts to which we have referred we think the plaintiffs are mistaken and that their case is governed by that portion of the text that appears in 9 California Jurisprudence, page 559. It is there said: "In accordance with the foregoing rules, a court may grant a motion for nonsuit whenever the evidence brought out upon the direct or cross-examination of the plaintiff so conclusively establishes a defense as that the court might properly grant a new trial in case of a verdict in his favor upon like evidence." Conceding for the purposes of this decision that in the instant case the defendants were bound to show that the contract was just, fair, and reasonable, it is apparent from what we have said that the plaintiffs' evidence relieved the defendants of that burden—the plaintiffs made the showing for the defendants.

After an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, this court is wholly unable to form the opinion that the order granting a nonsuit has resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

CARDOZA et al. v. WHITE et al.*
Civ. 4878.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

July 1, 1933.

Rehearing Denied July 31, 1933.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Aug. 28, 1933.

1. Mortgages ⇨32(3), 137.

Where grantor conveyed land to creditor for sole purpose of securing loan of money, deed was "mortgage" and conveyed no title to fee in land (Civ. Code, § 2924).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Mortgage," see Words & Phrases.]

2. Mortgages ⇨137.

In California, mortgage on real property does not vest in mortgagee any estate in land either before or after breach of conditions, but creates mere security operating on property as lien or incumbrance.

3. Mortgages ⇨137.

Where mortgagor and daughter paid mortgage indebtedness and mortgagee at mortgagor's request conveyed property to mortgagor's daughter, mortgagee's deed to daughter was mere release of mortgage, and title to land remained in mortgagor, daughter acquiring neither legal nor equitable title.

4. Mortgages ⇨137.

Mere request of mortgagor that mortgagee transfer title to mortgaged property to third party conveys no fee in land.

5. Adverse possession ⇨41.

One claiming under deed from mortgagee acquired no title to land by adverse possession where she held deed only three years and paid taxes only three years.

6. Adverse possession ⇨13.

Title by "adverse possession" is acquired by actual, open, and notorious occupancy of land, by conduct hostile to real owner's title, by open and notorious claim of title, by continuous occupancy, accompanied by acts and claim of title adverse to real owner for five years, and payment of taxes during five years.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Adverse Possession," see Words & Phrases.]

7. Judgment ⇨572(2).

Judgment entered against assignee of judgment for failure to amend complaint after demurrer sustained in suit to declare void deed to judgment debtor's daughter, did not render question of validity of such deed res judicata in suit to quiet title.

8. Quieting title ⇨10(1).

In suit to quiet title, plaintiff must recover on strength of his own title and not on weakness of defendant's claim.

9. Judgment ⇨589(1).

Right to levy execution on judgment, which existed when suit to set aside deed to judgment debtor's daughter was instituted, was remedy conferred by statute, not affected by suit to cancel deed in which judgment was entered against judgment creditor (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 687, 688).

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; H. S. Shaffer, Judge.

Action by Lucy Cardoza and another against W. T. White, as sheriff of the county of Merced, state of California, and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal.

Reversed.

Ernest S. Leslie and E. H. Christian, both of Oakland, for appellants.

Whitehurst & Logan, of Patterson, for respondents.

Mr. Justice R. L. THOMPSON delivered the opinion of the court.

The defendants have appealed from a judgment quieting title to real property and enjoining the sheriff from selling the lots under execution sale to satisfy a judgment which was assigned to the defendant Christian.

Antonio B. Nunes owned lots 5 and 6 of Miller & Lux subdivision of section 18, and a part of section 7, township 10 south, range 10, east, M. D. M., in Merced county. He is the father of the plaintiff Lucy Cardoza. J. H. Callaghan was the manager of the First National Bank of Livermore, which was afterwards consolidated with the American Trust Bank. Nunes borrowed $2,600 from the bank. To secure this loan he executed a deed to these lots to Callaghan on September 27, 1924. He delivered this deed with the statement that it was to be held by the grantee to secure the loan and with a request that it be conveyed to his daughter, Mrs. Cardoza, in the event of his death. Mr. Callaghan testified in that regard: "His request to me was, should anything happen to himself, that this property was Mrs. Cardoza's." This deed was, in effect, a mere mortgage between the parties thereto. Nunes did not die. The condition upon which the property was to be conveyed to his daughter therefore never occurred. On May 12, 1926, Nunes and his daughter went to the grantee and paid the balance of the indebtedness to the bank. Mrs. Cardoza contributed $900 of the indebtedness which was then paid. At that time Nunes requested Callaghan to deed the property to his daughter. This was done. Callaghan testified in that regard: "When the bank was paid in full, I had no further interest in it whatsoever, and Mr. Nunes requested that I turn it over immediately to Mrs. Cardoza."

In the meantime Frank Rodrigues obtained a judgment in Alameda county of $1,222.86 against Nunes in a suit on a promissory note. This judgment was rendered July 10, 1925. Upon this judgment an execution was subsequently issued against Nunes, which was returned unsatisfied. A garnishment was later served on the bank to satisfy the judgment. The sum of $300 was thus recovered from the bank, which was credited to the judgment, leaving an unpaid balance of $992.23. On February 18, 1927, this unsatisfied judgment against Nunes was assigned to the defendant Christian, who promptly secured the issuance of an execution, which was placed in the hands of the sheriff of Merced county, where the real property which is involved in this suit is situated. This execution was returned unsatisfied. The defendant Christian then instituted supplemental proceedings against Nunes, in the course of which he discovered the situation with relation to the conveyance to Lucy Cardoza and title to the lots which are involved in this suit.

December 3, 1928, Christian, the assignee of the judgment creditor Rodrigues, brought suit in the superior court of Merced county against Antonio Nunes and his daughter Lucy Cardoza, to set aside the deed of conveyance from Callaghan to Cardoza. A demurrer to this complaint was sustained. Christian failed to amend his complaint and judgment was rendered against him in that action to the effect that he take nothing by his suit. No appeal was taken from that judgment, which thereupon became final.

An alias execution was then procured by Christian in the suit in which Rodrigues secured the $1,222.86 judgment against Nunes, pursuant to sections 687 and 688 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which was placed in the hands of the sheriff of Merced county with directions to levy upon the real property and sell it to satisfy the judgment. An abstract of the proceedings was recorded in Merced county. The sheriff proceeded to give the required notice and sell the land in the manner provided by law.

This suit to quiet title was then instituted. Issues were joined. Findings of the court were adopted favorable to the plaintiffs, in which it was found that the plaintiff Lucy Cardoza is the owner in fee of the land in question. A judgment was rendered accordingly. The defendants were enjoined from proceeding to sell the land under execution and from otherwise interfering with the owner's title and right to the possession. From this judgment the defendants have appealed.

The court adopted findings in this case to the effect that: "Plaintiff, Lucy Cardoza, is and at all times since the 12th day of May, 1926 [at which date Callaghan, at the request of Nunes, conveyed the property to her], has been the owner" of the land in dispute. The court further found: "Nunes conveyed said premises to H. J. Callaghan on or about September 27, 1924, and said H. J. Callaghan and Rose Callaghan, his wife, conveyed same to said plaintiff on or about May 12, 1926."

[1-3] The finding that Lucy Cardoza is and at all times since the 12th day of May, 1926, has been the owner of the land, is not supported by the evidence. The undisputed record is just the contrary. The evidence conclusively shows that there is a lapse of the chain of title from Nunes to his daughter. It appears without dispute that Nunes conveyed the land to Callaghan for the sole purpose of securing a loan of money. The deed to Callaghan was therefore a mere mortgage and conveyed no title to the fee in the land. Section 2924, Civ. Code; 17 Cal. Jur. 800, § 97; McGuigan v. Millar, 117 Cal. App. 739, 4 P.(2d) 607; 19 R. C. L. 261, § 29. No title to land passes to a mortgagee by the mere execution of a mortgage. The common-law doctrine of mortgages does not prevail in California, the courts having uniformly held that the equitable doctrine with respect to mortgages is the true one to apply. In California a mortgage on real property is not regarded as a conveyance vesting in the mortgagee any estate in the land either before or after the breach of conditions of the instrument. On the contrary, a mortgage is intended by the parties and is deemed by law to create a mere security operating upon the property as a lien or encumbrance. 17 Cal. Jur. 705, § 12. Since Callaghan held no title to the property except that of a mere mortgagee, he could not convey a fee to Lucy Cardoza. He could convey no greater title than that which he possessed. It follows that since the indebtedness which was secured by the mortgage was fully paid, Callaghan's deed to Lucy Cardoza amounted to nothing more than a release of the mortgage, and the title to the land still remains in Nunes.

[4] The respondent contends that Lucy Cardoza nevertheless holds the equitable title to the land by adverse title or otherwise, because she paid $900 toward the indebtedness of her father, to secure which the deed was made to Callaghan, and that her father personally requested the execution of the conveyance to her. This does not follow. Since Callaghan held a mere mortgage, his conveyance to Lucy Cardoza would at most amount to no more than an assignment of his mortgage to secure her payment of the sum contributed by her toward the payment of the indebtedness. The mere request of a mortgagor that a mortgagee transfer his title to the mortgaged property to a third party conveys no fee in the land.

[5, 6] It may not be said Lucy Cardoza acquired title to the land by adverse possession. She held the deed to the land only three years. The evidence is undisputed that she paid taxes on the property for only three years. To support a claim of title by adverse possession five elements must concur: (1) Actual, open, and notorious occupancy of the land by the claimant; (2) acts and conduct on her part hostile to the real owner's title; (3) open and notorious claim of title; (4) continuous and uninterrupted occupancy, accompanied by acts and a claim of title adverse to that of the real owner for the statutory period of five years; and (5) payment of all taxes levied or assessed against the land during the statutory period of five years. 1 Cal. Jur. 522, § 22; 1 R. C. L. 700, § 13; Scott v. Warden, 111 Cal. App. 587, 296 P. 95.

[7-9] Nor can it be said the judgment which was entered against the appellant Christian, in Merced county, December 3, 1928, for failure to amend his complaint in the suit which he brought to declare void the deed to Lucy Cardoza, renders the question of the validity of that deed res judicata in the present proceeding. In a suit to quiet title to real property it is a cardinal doctrine that the plaintiff must recover judgment upon the strength of his own title and not upon the weakness of defendant's claim. 22 Cal. Jur. 167, § 42. Moreover, it is apparent that the lien upon the land, which was acquired prior to the alleged conveyance to plaintiff by the securing of the personal judgment against Nunes in the suit upon the promissory note and the subsequent levying of the writ of execution upon the land for satisfaction of the judgment, is entirely independent of the default judgment and furnishes a separate and distinct remedy for the satisfaction of the assigned judgment. The right to levy an execution upon a valid subsisting and unsatisfied judgment which existed at the time the subsequent suit was instituted was a remedy conferred by statute, which was not involved in or affected by the suit for cancellation of the deed. That default judgment was therefore not res judicata of the issues which are involved in this case.

There is no escape from the inevitable conclusion that the deed from Nunes to Callaghan was a mere mortgage, and that the subsequent deed from Callaghan to Cardoza conveyed no title to the fee in the land. There is a clear lapse in the title to Cardoza. The undisputed record conclusively shows she holds neither the legal nor the equitable title to the land. It follows that the findings of court and the judgment to the effect that Lucy Cardoza is the owner in fee of the land in question is not supported by the evidence.

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. ARNEST et al.

Cr. 1261.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

June 30, 1933.

1. Indictment and Information ⇨161(7).

In prosecution for burglary and theft of property from railroad car on moving train, permitting amendment of information to show counties through which train was traveling held not error (Pen. Code §§ 783, 1008).

Permitting the amendment to the information was not error, since the amendment merely clarified the language used and more specifically identified the offense, so that defendants, if convicted, might not again be prosecuted for the same crime.

2. Criminal law ⇨1144(3).

Order refusing to set aside information on ground defendants had not been legally committed was presumed correct on appeal, in absence of record showing complaint filed before justice or testimony taken thereunder.

3. Criminal law $\Rightarrow$ 207(1).

Offense committed in car of railroad train in course of trip is, for purpose of holding preliminary examination, within jurisdiction of justice of every township through which car passed (Pen. Code $\S$ 783).

4. Criminal law $\Rightarrow$ 1186(4).

In prosecution for theft, instruction using word "possession" instead of "premises" or "presence," in statement that goods need not be removed from owner's possession, held harmless (Const. art. 6, $\S$ 4 $\frac{1}{2}$).

5. Criminal law $\Rightarrow$ 829(3).

Omission of word "feloniously" in defining larceny held not error, where that word was used in another part of instruction.

6. Indictment and information $\Rightarrow$ 114.

Information must charge that person convicted has served term for prior offense, to lay basis for imposition of additional sentence (Pen. Code $\S$ 666).

Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; J. B. Landis, Judge.

Chester Arnest and another were convicted of grand theft and second degree burglary, and they appeal.

Affirmed in part, and reversed in part.

K. D. Robinson and A. K. Robinson, both of Auburn, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen. and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

Mr. Justice PLUMMER delivered the opinion of the court.

The defendants were convicted of grand theft and of burglary in the second degree, upon an information in two counts charging them with the two offenses, in the following language, to wit: "That on or about the 30th day of August, 1932, in the county of Placer, state of California, they did then and there wilfully, unlawfully and feloniously steal and take the following described property, to-wit: 9 cases of cigarettes, of the reasonable and fair market value of $576.00, which said cases of cigarettes were then and there in the possession of the Southern Pacific Company, a corporation, as bailee, in a certain railroad car, Southern Pacific No. 25362, which car was in train No. 486, prosecuting its trip through the counties of Placer and Nevada, state of California; and which said cases of cigarettes were at the said time the personal property of another, and not the property of the defendants, with the felonious intent then and there to commit the crime of grand theft."

Count 2 of the information, in its charging part, reads as follows: "That on or about the 30th day of August, 1932, in the county of Placer, state of California, they did then and there wilfully, unlawfully and feloniously enter a certain railroad car, to-wit: Southern Pacific No. 25362, which said railroad car was then and there in train No. 486, and prosecuting its trip through the counties of Placer and Nevada, state of California, with the intent then and there to commit the crime of grand theft."

The defendant Worth was further charged with a prior offense, as follows: "That the defendant Alfred L. Worth, before the commission of the offenses charged in this information, was, in the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Tuolumne, convicted of the crime of petty theft."

Upon arraignment, the defendants demurred to the information on the ground that it did not conform to the requirements of sections 950, 951, and 952 of the Penal Code; that the court had no jurisdiction of the offense charged; that the facts stated do not constitute a public offense; and that more than one offense is charged other than as provided in section 954 of the Penal Code. At the same time the defendants moved to set aside the information on the following ground: That before the filing thereof, the defendants, nor either of them, had been legally committed by a magistrate. The demurrers were overruled, and the motion denied, whereupon the defendants entered a plea of not guilty.

[1] It appears that during the course of the trial the district attorney was permitted to amend the information by inserting the words "which said railroad car was then and there in train No. 486, and prosecuting its trip through the counties of Placer and Nevada, state of California."

The original information is not made a part of the record, but there appears to be no contention on the part of the respondent that the original information did not allege that the car was in a train prosecuting its trip through the counties referred to.

By section 783 of the Penal Code it is provided that, where an offense is committed in this state on a railroad train or car prosecuting its trip, the jurisdiction is in any county through which the train or car passes in the course of its trip, or in the county where the trip terminates. Under this section, it is legally correct to state that the offense was committed in the county of Placer, under the circumstances disclosed by the record in this case, and it shows that it was committed upon a car which was a part of the train prosecuting its trip through the counties of Placer and Nevada, on its way to Sparks, in the state of Nevada. Under such circumstances, as provided in section 1008 of the Penal Code, the amendment only clarified the language used, and more specifically identified the offense so that the defendants, if convicted, might not again be prosecuted for the same crimes. This question was before the court in the case of People v. Dougherty, 7 Cal. 395, and it is there said: "The extra territorial jurisdiction thus conferred [referring to section 89, page 434, Compiled Laws] upon the Courts of the various counties situated upon the navigable waters of the State, is special in its character, and in derogation of the common law rule upon this subject; and whenever it is invoked, the facts and circumstances should be set out fully in the indictment. In this respect, the Court may be considered as exercising a special and limited jurisdiction, and the facts which give jurisdiction must be clearly alleged and satisfactorily proved. There is great reason for this rule, for if these allegations can be dispensed with, then the defendant might be indicted, tried, and convicted, in every county through which a vessel might pass in making her voyage, and one conviction or acquittal would be no bar to another prosecution, as it would be impossible to determine that they were for one and the same offence."

At the time of the rendition of this decision, there was no provision in the Penal Code authorizing district attorneys to submit, and the court to allow, amendments as provided for in section 1008, supra. As now amended, that section, so far as material here, reads: "The court may order its amendment for any defect or insufficiency, at any stage of the proceedings; and the trial shall continue as if it had been originally filed as amended, unless the substantial rights of the defendant would be prejudiced thereby, in which event a reasonable continuance, not longer than the ends of justice require, may be granted."

It thus clearly appears from the case relied upon by the appellants from which we have just quoted that the amendment to the information was not to the prejudice of the defendants, but is an amendment which operates in their favor, for the simple reason that it estops further prosecution for the offenses charged in other counties through which the train passed in prosecuting its trip through the state of California.

The record further shows that no continuance was asked for; that the defendants stated they were content to rest upon their original plea, and the trial proceeded as though the information had originally read as it stood amended. Amendments to informations have been so frequently allowed where it appears that no prejudice has been suffered by the defendants that it seems to us unnecessary to incumber the record with citation of the cases where such amendments have been allowed.

One case, however, which permitted the addition of an allegation supplying a jurisdictional fact, may be referred to. In People v. Bonfanti, 40 Cal. App. 614, 181 P. 80 the information charged an assault with intent to commit rape, but failed to state that the victim was not the wife of the defendant. The proof establishing such fact, the amendment was allowed. The nature of the offense was not changed. Just as here, the nature of the offense, nor any of the conditions relating thereto, were unchanged by the amendment. The court had jurisdiction, the testimony established the fact of jurisdiction in showing that the burglary and larceny took place under such conditions as to give the court jurisdiction, and all that remained, assuming that the original information was defective, was the adding thereto such words as would prevent any other prosecution upon the charges contained in the information. The defendants were not faced with any different charge, nor did it necessitate on their part any additional effort to meet the allegations of the information. They were charged with burglarizing and committing larceny of a certain railroad car, etc. The only allegation in substance contained in the amendment to the information showed that the car was in motion or prosecuting a trip through the counties mentioned. We may also refer to the case of Johnson v. Johnson, 30 Colo. 402, 70 P. 692, where the Supreme Court of Colorado held that, where the testimony showed jurisdiction, the pleadings might very properly be amended to conform to the proof, and that they had found no well-considered case to the contrary. The facts of the case are as follows: The car upon which the burglary was committed and also in which the larceny was committed was in a train, as we have stated, being moved from Roseville, Cal., to Sparks, Nev., passing through Placer and Nevada counties. A watchman or railroad detective was stationed on a car two car lengths in the rear of the one burglarized. When the train stopped at Emigrant Gap, the seals on the burglarized car were then intact, or appeared to be intact, and the doors were closed. A short time after the train left Emigrant Gap, the railroad detective observed packages being thrown from the car in question. He immediately dismounted from the train, concealed himself in the weeds and grass along the right of way, and in a short time one of the defendants appeared and picked up one of the packages. Thereupon he was arrested by the detective. The detective waited until the second defendant came along carrying a sack and a rope ladder, whereupon he was also arrested.

The record shows that nine packages of cigarettes were recovered of those thrown from the train, although the testimony also shows that the eleven packages of cigarettes were thrown out of the car. The defendants were then arrested and taken to Auburn, where their preliminary examination was held. The testimony developed that the place where the packages of cigarettes were found was in the county of Nevada, and distant from the boundary line between the counties of Placer and Nevada about 2,900 feet.

[2] We may now consider the motion to set aside the information on the ground that the defendants had not been legally committed. A complete answer to the alleged error on the part of the court in denying this motion is in the entire want of the record to exhibit either the complaint filed before the justice of the peace in Auburn and the testimony there taken. All that the record shows is simply the motion.

In the case of People v. Williams, 84 Cal. 616, 24 P. 145, a somewhat similar question was presented as to the jurisdiction of the police judge conducting the preliminary examination. The court there said: "We must presume, in the absence of anything showing the contrary, in favor of the action of the court below, that some duly-qualified magistrate had, previous to the trial in the superior court, properly committed the defendant for such trial, but who he was does not appear; for it will not be taken for granted that the facts set up in the defendant's motion are true, without any proof as to the matter." This case was affirmed in People v. Hinshaw, 194 Cal. 1, 227 P. 156, where it is again held that proof must be made of whatever is set up in the motion, and that the motion itself does not constitute sufficient grounds setting aside the information.

For all that appears in the record, the facts giving the justice of the peace at Auburn jurisdiction appeared in the complaint and in the testimony, and, nothing appearing in the record to the contrary, we must presume that the trial court was justified by the showing made before it to deny the appellants' motion.

[3] Under section 783, supra, jurisdiction of the offenses shown in the record lay in both the counties of Placer and Nevada. The train on its way eastward passed through the township where the city of Auburn is situate. The offense, as shown by the record, was a continuing offense. It was, in view of the section of the Penal Code which we are considering, committed in every county of the state through which the car was being transported, and therefore it was committed within the territorial limits of every township through which it passed, giving jurisdiction to the justice of the peace of such township to hold a preliminary examination.

The appellants make the further objection that under the provisions of section 849 of the Penal Code which reads: "When an arrest is made without a warrant by a peace-officer or private person, the person arrested must, without unnecessary delay, be taken before the nearest or most accessible magistrate in the county in which the arrest is made," etc.; and that the arresting officer in this case should have taken the appellant before some magistrate in the county of Nevada.

So far as the record is concerned, it does not appear that this objection was raised, or any advantage taken of the provisions of this section prior to the beginning of the trial in the superior court. From what we have stated, it is evident that the justice of the peace at Auburn had jurisdiction to hear the preliminary examination of the defendants charged with the offenses alleged in the information. That the arresting officer may have committed a wrong against the appellants does not affect the jurisdiction of the justice of the peace at Auburn. If any injury was suffered by reason of the failure of the arresting officer to comply with section 849, supra, it is left undisclosed by the record, which is, as we have stated, entirely silent concerning proceedings had upon the preliminary examination of the appellants.

In addition to the testimony which we have stated with regard to the railroad detective seeing the packages of cigarettes thrown from the car, and the return of the defendants to pick up the cigarettes, we may refer to the testimony of the witness J. R. Martin. After testifying that the "railroad officer" came to the work car where he was with the two prisoners, and placing them in his charge while the officer went back with a hand car to pick up the packages of cigarettes, the following conversation took place between him and the defendant Worth, in the presence of the defendant Arnest: "The defendant Worth said to me: 'What kind of cigarettes do you smoke?' I said, 'Chesterfield's.' He said, 'They found nine cases of cigarettes. I threw out eleven cases. I don't think you will have to change the brand. After we start to Auburn, you go down and get the cigarettes.' The defendant Worth then asked Arnest if the officer caught him with the packages or cartons, it was, in his possession. Arnest says, 'Yes.' He says, 'You can't swear that he didn't.' Arnest says, 'No.' Worth says, 'You know what that means; that means five years if they prove that.' The witness further testified that that was the extent of the conversation; that the defendants were engaged in further conversation between themselves, but he did not hear it. This witness was an employee of the department of public works, division of highways.

As we read appellants' brief, no contention appears to be made that the testimony is insufficient to show the burglarizing of the car in question and the larceny of the cigarettes.

[4] It is further objected that the court erred in giving two instructions to the jury, the first of which reads as follows: "The jury is instructed that in order to constitute the crime of theft, the goods taken must be taken or severed from the possession or custody of the owner or the bailee, and be in the possession of the thief, although it be but for a moment; that they need not be retained in possession of the thief, nor removed from the owner's possession. Any removal, however slight, of the entire article, is sufficient to constitute the crime of theft." This instruction is not correctly worded. The word "possession" following the word "owner's" should have read "premises" or "presence." In this case the cigarettes were not removed from the owner's premises as they lay upon the railroad right of way where they were admittedly thrown by the defendants. Under the testimony which we have stated, and against which no objection is made by the appellants as not being sufficient to show both the burglary and the theft, we think that section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution applies. The jury was not misled. They had heard the testimony as to the cigarettes being thrown from the car in which they were being transported. That established the theft. The mere fact that the cigarettes were not removed from the premises belonging to the railroad company was an unnecessary element in the commission of the crime, and we cannot very readily conceive how the jury understood the instructions as meaning other than that the defendants, in the complete commission of the offense, were not required to take the cigarettes entirely off of the railroad right of way.

[5] It is further contended that the court erred in its instructions as to what constituted larceny, in that it omitted the word "feloniously." The whole instruction should be read together, which shows that the court charged the jury that they must be convinced to a moral certainty, and beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant Chester Arnest "did, on the 30th day of August, 1932, feloniously steal the personal property of another, as alleged in the information"; and then define "grand" and "petty theft" as given in the statute, which, of course, was neither misleading nor erroneous.

[6] The judgment in this case, however, is erroneous and unwarranted in one particular in so far as it adjudges the defendant Alfred L. Worth with a prior conviction, etc. The information, as we have stated, simply charges the defendant Worth with having been convicted of the crime of petty theft.

Section 666 of the Penal Code reads: "Every person who, having been convicted of petit larceny or petit theft and having served a term therefor in any penal institution, commits any crime after such conviction, is punishable therefor as follows." The defendant Worth simply pleaded guilty to the information, couched in the language which we have set forth. This of course is not sufficient compliance with the statute in order to lay a basis for the imposition of an additional sentence or an added length of time for which the defendant may be sentenced. The information must charge that the person convicted has served a term therefor, and, if it fails to do so, it fails to charge the facts necessary to constitute a judgment carrying a heavier sentence. This is definitely established by the decision in the case of People v. Dawson, 210 Cal. 366, 292 P. 267. This being true, that portion of the judgment relating to the prior conviction of the defendant Worth, and seeking to lay the basis for an addition to the sentence which may be imposed upon him, is reversed. In all other particulars the judgments and orders denying appellants' motion for a new trial are affirmed.

Action by Ellen Hutson against Joseph Gerson and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Modified as to defendant California Highway Indemnity Exchange, and affirmed as to other defendants.

Clarence A. Jones, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

DESMOND, Justice pro tem.

A jury awarded to the plaintiff judgment in the sum of $6,000 against all the defendants. They appeal from that judgment, and from an order of the trial court by which they were denied a new trial.

The plaintiff, as she was crossing Central avenue at or near the northerly line of Jefferson street, in the city of Los Angeles, between 7 and 8 p. m. of November 22, 1928, was struck, thrown to the ground, and injured by a taxicab. This vehicle was traveling south on Central avenue, and bore the license number 243516. It will be noted that the defendants comprise six individuals, namely, Gerson, Livingston, Calder, DeVoy, Van Elm, and S. G. Stephens; the California Highway Indemnity Exchange, a corporation; and S. G. Stephens sued also as doing business under the firm name and style of Crown Cab Company. For convenience the California Highway Indemnity Exchange will be hereinafter referred to as the exchange. The same attorneys who have at all times represented the exchange have at all times represented the other defendants, two identical answers being filed, one for the exchange and one for the other defendants as a group. Introduced in evidence was a policy, No. 5513, of the exchange dated December 15, 1927, in which defendants Gerson, DeVoy, and Livingston appear as the assured parties, described as doing business as the Crown Cab Company. Attached to this policy were many "endorsements," so-called, covering under the terms of the policy certain taxicabs in addition to the one described in the original. One of the endorsements, effective February 16, 1928, attached to and made part of policy No. 5513, included the taxicab involved in this case, the same being No. 135 in the fleet of taxis of the Crown Cab Company, covered by this insurance. In an indorsement effective May 31, 1928, the "name of the assured covered by the above mentioned policy is amended to read Jean A. Calder, and Joseph Gerson, d. b. a. (doing business as) Crown Cab Co." June 18, 1928, another indorsement amended the name "to read Crown Cab Co., H. J. Van Elm, President in lieu of Jean A. Calder and Joseph Gerson

d. b. a. Crown Cab Co." On September 21, 1928, another indorsement changed the name of the assured "to S. G. Stephens doing business as the Crown Cab Co., instead of as stated in the policy." The latest indorsement, effective May 23, 1929, eliminated from coverage of the policy thirteen taxicabs, not including cab No. 135. Nor was this cab eliminated by any other indorsement. The original policy No. 5513 carries a cancellation notice dated August 14, 1929, terminating liability on August 13, 1929, at the request of insured "to be replaced by policy No. 6034."

[1] Attached to policy No. 5513 is an indorsement dated December 8, 1927, containing the following language: "This policy is a continuing liability notwithstanding any action or recovery thereon," etc. We believe on the facts recited the jury was justified in finding that cab 135 of the Crown Cab Company was covered by this policy of insurance on the date of plaintiff's injury, November 22, 1929. A special agreement attached to the policy limited the exchange's liability to $5,000 for injury to or death of any one person, and $10,000 in case more than one person were killed or injured; also provided that "in addition to said limited sums the Exchange will pay the expense of litigation and all costs taxed against the subscriber in any legal proceedings defended by the Exchange, together with any interest accruing after entry of judgment upon such part of said judgment as shall not be in excess of the limits of the Exchange's liability herein expressed."

The only evidence offered by the defendant at the time of the trial was that of a physician who, at the request of counsel for the defendants, had examined the plaintiff a few weeks after the accident. A physician appointed by the court also testified. All the witnesses who testified as to the occurrences of November 22, 1927, were produced by the plaintiff. Among these was one named Nobles, who testified that immediately after the taxicab struck the plaintiff he jumped on the running board of the cab and asked the driver why he did not stop to try to give assistance, saying, "What do you mean to do? You had better go back and see how much damage you have done; what you have done to that woman." To the admission of this testimony defendant objected and now assigns the adverse ruling of the court upon that objection as error, on the ground that a proper foundation was not laid for the introduction in evidence of a conversation between this witness and the driver of the cab. It is also contended that the trial court erred in denying motion for a nonsuit and in giving two instructions which appellant claims were not justified by the evidence and as to one that it did not correctly state the law. The court's refusal to give a certain instruction requested by the defendant is also assigned as error.

[2] As to the first contention, objection to the portion of Nobles' testimony above referred to, counsel for respondent comments in his brief upon the fact that the conversation was all on the side of Nobles, for his remarks were the only ones reported to the jury. If the driver replied to Nobles, no one knows from the record in this case what he said. Perhaps he made no reply. At any rate there is no evidence that he said anything whatever to fix the blame for this accident on himself or any of the defendants. This, then, was evidence as to an immaterial matter, having nothing to do with the circumstances or cause of the accident, and therefore its admission does not warrant a reversal of the judgment.

[3-5] In arguing the point that a nonsuit should have been granted, appellants claim that there was in this case no proof of ownership of the cab and no proof that the driver was acting as agent for the owner or owners at the time of the accident. The driver of the cab was not a witness nor was he named as a defendant unless as A. Doe, a fictitious defendant never served. However, paragraph IV of plaintiff's complaint alleged that at the time plaintiff was injured the defendants named as composing the Crown Cab Company were using and operating the cab through their agent, servant, and employee. To these allegations the defendants have replied as follows: "Answering paragraph IV of said complaint, these answering defendants admit that the Crown Cab Company is a fictitious name, deny that said company is composed of the defendants named in plaintiff's complaint, or that said parties are copartners doing business under said fictitious name."

It will be seen that there is here no denial that the Crown Cab Company, or the individuals named as defendants, owned the cab in question or that at the time of plaintiff's injury it was being operated by the agent of that company or said individuals.

For more than fifty years section 437 of the Code of Civil Procedure has provided that "the answer of the defendant shall contain: 1. A general or specific denial of the material allegations of the complaint controverted by the defendant." (Code amendments 1873-74, p. 300.) When this section was amended in 1927 (St. 1927, p. 529), although a new method of entering a denial was provided, there was no change in the language above quoted and it remains the rule that a denial must be made. If not made, the allegations will be taken as true under section 462 of the Code of Civil Procedure. An evasive answer to the allegations can avail the defendant nothing (21 Cal. Jur., p. 153), and under the pleadings here the plaintiff was under no obligation to prove ownership or agency, both being admitted inferentially by the answer. As respondent points out in his brief, S. G. Stephens swore to the answer and answered for himself and his codefendants, including all the individuals named in the complaint. As to the responsibility of the owners for the act of their agent, we may say that where no testimony is adduced from which a jury may determine whether or not the agent was acting at the time of an accident within the general scope of his employment the presumption to the effect that he was so acting governs. That such presumption arises where the ownership and agency of the car is admitted appears from the decision in Wagnitz v. Scharetg, 89 Cal. App. 511, 517, 265 P. 318. That such a presumption is evidence appears from the decision in Grantham v. Ordway, 40 Cal. App. 758, 760, 182 P. 73. On this subject see, also, 1923 Cal. Jur. Perm. Supp. §§ 118, 119. In view of the foregoing we conclude that the learned judge of the trial court committed no error when he denied defendants' motion for a nonsuit.

In passing upon appellants' contention that two of plaintiff's requested instructions were erroneous because they permitted the jury to find a verdict of more than $5,000 against all defendants, whereas by the terms of the insurance policy liability was limited to $5,000 in the case of injury to one person, we find the point well taken so far as the defendant, the exchange, is concerned. However, the fault is remedied by a request made by respondent in her brief that the judgment be modified by reducing the amount from $6,000 to $5,000 as to said defendant.

[6] One of the instructions complained of reads as follows: "You are instructed that if you find from the evidence, oral and documentary, given and on file in this case that cab number 135 bearing license number 243516 was the automobile that struck the plaintiff in this action and that the policy issued by the California Highway Indemnity Exchange on file in this action covered damages to any person caused by the negligent operation and control of said automobile without contributory negligence on part of the plaintiff, then it will be your duty to bring in a verdict against the defendant, California Highway Indemnity Exchange, for damages against the defendant California Highway Indemnity Exchange in such sum as you see fit in view of the evidence that would compensate plaintiff for her pain and suffering necessarily resulting therefrom."

Standing alone, this instruction is open to serious objection. We note, however, as we read all the instructions in this case, that the jury received very complete and repeated instructions on the subjects of negligence, contributory negligence, and burden of proof. We note also that the verdict in this case is not against the exchange solely but lies against all the defendants. We must conclude, therefore, that the jury found negligence on the part of the driver of the cab acting as agent for the owner or owners, and no contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff. The jury knew from the facts in the case that the exchange was not an owner, but an insurer, and that under the terms of the policy liability of the insurer arose when injury occurred by reason of negligence on the part of the driver of the taxicab. We do not think the instruction in question misled the jury or that by reason of its being given the verdict against the exchange should be set aside, because if the driver was justly chargeable with the injury then the insurer should meet the liability that it assumed when the policy was written. Since, in our opinion, having reviewed all the evidence in this case, no miscarriage of justice resulted from the giving of this instruction, a new trial should not be ordered because of it under section 4½, article 6, of the Constitution.

[7] The remaining contention of the appellant is that the court erred in refusing to give an instruction bearing on agency and conditions under which an employer's liability arises. Since other instructions were given covering the same points in different language, we hold that this refusal does not constitute reversible error.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed as to all defendants except California Highway Indemnity Exchange, a corporation, and as to said last-named defendant is modified by reducing the amount thereof from $6,000 to $5,000.

PEOPLE v. VON ECKARTSBERG.
Cr. 83.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

June 24, 1933.

1. Criminal law ☞1023(10).

Attempted appeal from judgment of conviction held ineffective where no judgment was rendered on verdict.

2. Criminal law ☞977(3).

Accused waived pronouncement of judgment by making application for probation.

3. Criminal law ☞1023(12).

Where accused waived pronouncement of judgment by making application for probation, order granting probation was not "order made after judgment" and was therefore not "appealable order."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Appealable Order," see Words & Phrases.]

4. Criminal law ☞1023(13).

Order denying motion for new trial after verdict of conviction where no judgment was rendered, was "appealable order" (Pen. Code, § 1237).

5. Automobiles ☞355(13).

Evidence held to sustain conviction of manslaughter, on theory that accused was driving car on wrong side of street at time of collision of accused's automobile with another automobile approaching from opposite direction.

6. Criminal law ☞1172(2).

In prosecution for manslaughter, based on automobile collision resulting when accused was committing unlawful act, not a felony, instruction that court took judicial notice that on day of accident, sun set at 5:20 p. m., though superfluous, held harmless.

7. Criminal law ☞808½.

In manslaughter prosecution, based on theory that accused drove automobile on wrong side of street resulting in collision, reading to jury statute prohibiting, with certain exceptions, operation of automobiles in center lane of highway divided into three lanes, held not misleading, though street where accident occurred was divided into six lanes (St. 1923, p. 557, § 123, as amended by St. 1931, p. 2125, § 42).

8. Automobiles ☞344.

That accused at time of collision was operating automobile within legal speed limit would not be conclusive on question whether speed was excessive.

9. Automobiles ☞357.

Giving instructions relating to speed of accused's automobile in prosecution for manslaughter based on automobile collision, held not error under evidence, though no witness testified that speed exceeded legal limit.

10. Automobiles ☞357.

Giving instruction that contributory negligence is no defense to manslaughter prosecution if evidence shows consequences of collision were directly traceable to violation of law by accused not amounting to felony, or to accused's negligent, willful, reckless, and wanton misconduct, held not error under evidence.

11. Criminal law ☞761(16).

In prosecution for manslaughter based on automobile collision, instruction that unless defendant acted knowingly and willfully, he would not be guilty, and that defendant could urge that although he might have been guilty of technical violation of law, he was innocent of any guilty purpose, held under evidence, not erroneous as presupposing admission of guilt.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; James L. Allen, Judge.

Rolf Von Eckartsberg was convicted of manslaughter, and from an order denying his motion for new trial he appeals.

Affirmed.

Stanley Visel, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank Richards, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

JENNINGS, Justice.

[1-3] The defendant was charged by an information filed in the superior court of Orange county with the crime of manslaughter in that on or about October 21, 1932, he did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously, while in the commission of an unlawful act, not amounting to a felony, kill three designated human beings. Upon arraignment, the defendant entered a plea of not guilty and was tried before a jury which returned a verdict convicting him of the offense specified in the information. Thereafter, he presented to the court a motion for a new trial which motion was by the court denied. He thereupon made application to the court to be placed on probation which application was granted upon conditions specified in the court's order granting the application. Defendant then perfected this appeal from the order of the trial court denying his motion for a new trial. The notice of appeal states that the appeal is taken from the court's order denying defendant's motion for a new trial and "from the judgment rendered in this cause on the 20th day of January, 1933." The attempted appeal from a judgment rendered herein is entirely ineffective for the simple reason that no judgment was rendered. On January 20, 1933, the court made an order which is entitled "Probation Order" by which it granted the defendant's application for probation upon certain specified conditions. Presumably, the notice of appeal, so far as it mentions a judgment, refers to the aforesaid order. However, defendant waived pronouncement of judgment by making application for probation. People v. De Voe, 123 Cal. App. 233, 11 P.(2d) 26. The order granting probation was not, therefore, an order made after judgment and for this reason it is not an appealable order. People v. Patello, 125 Cal. App. 480, 13 P.(2d) 1068; People v. Noone (Cal. App.) 22 P.(2d) 284. The appeal from the court's order denying the motion for a new trial is, however, entitled to consideration since section 1237 of the Penal Code specifically permits an appeal from such an order. In considering the appeal from the court's order denying a new trial, a brief statement of the facts disclosed by the record will be conducive to a clearer understanding of the matters here presented.

The death of the three persons named in the information was caused by a collision between two automobiles which occurred at about 7:45 p. m. of October 21, 1932, on North Main street in the city of Santa Ana, Cal. North Main street at the point where the collision occurred is a paved street which is approximately 56 feet in width. It is divided into four traffic lanes each of which is 10 feet wide and two parking lanes, each of which is 8 feet wide. The lanes into which the street was divided were separated by black colored lines. The line which marked the center of the street was somewhat heavier than the other lines. The street extends in a general northerly southerly direction. The two automobiles which were involved in the collision were a Ford coupé and a Packard coupé. The former was being driven by Edwin Johnson and the latter by the defendant. Seated with Johnson on the front seat of the Ford was Dorothy Hill and in the rumble seat of the car two young men were seated. The defendant and two other men occupied the same seat in the inclosed part of the Packard automobile. The weight of the Packard was approximately 5,800 pounds and that of the Ford approximately 2,500 pounds.

The Ford was proceeding in a southerly direction and immediately prior to the collision it was being operated in the traffic lane immediately west of the center line of the street. It was moving at a speed of approximately 30 to 35 miles per hour. The Packard automobile was proceeding in a northerly direction at a speed between 35 and 45 miles per hour and in the traffic lane immediately east of the center line of the street. The legal speed limit at the place where the accident occurred was 45 miles per hour. The evidence indicated that the left front part of the Packard collided with the left front part of the Ford. The Ford automobile was turned over by the impact of the collision and lay on its side in the second traffic lane west of the center line of the street. It pointed in a general southeasterly direction. The Packard automobile was pointed in a northerly direction. Its right rear wheel rested about 18 inches east of the center line of the street. With the exception of the right rear wheel the Packard automobile was almost entirely to the west of the center line of the street. Oil, broken glass, and other debris were discovered in the street after the collision. The greater part of the oil, glass, and debris was west of the center line of the street. The distance between the front parts of the two automobiles after they came to rest following the collision was approximately 8 feet.

Appellant advances two contentions upon this appeal from the court's order denying his motion for a new trial. These contentions are first, that the verdict is not supported by the evidence produced at the trial, and, second, that the court misdirected the jury as to the law.

With respect to the first contention it is pointed out that there was no direct evidence tending to prove that appellant had committed an unlawful act. Careful consideration of the evidence indicates that there were three possible violations of traffic laws which appellant may have committed. These are, driving at a rate of speed in excess of that permitted by law, reckless driving, and driving on the wrong side of the street. It must be conceded that if the record contains any evidence tending to show that appellant was guilty of any one of the aforesaid violations of law this court may not declare that the trial court abused its discretion in refusing a new trial.

[4] Without considering whether the record contains any evidence tending to show that appellant operated his automobile at an excessive rate of speed or that he was guilty of reckless driving, we entertain the opinion that there was circumstantial evidence which tended to show that at the time the collision occurred appellant was operating the Packard automobile on the west side—his wrong side—of the street. The two circumstances which point strongly to this conclusion are first, the position of the two automobiles after the occurrence of the collision, and, second, the location of the oil, shattered glass, and other debris in the street. No useful purpose could be subserved by indulging in a prolonged analysis of the evidence by which these two circumstances were unmistakably developed. Perhaps even less benefit would be derived by a discussion of the value and weight of circumstantial evidence. Its limitations and its value are well recognized. We cannot say that we are impelled to declare that the court erred in refusing to appellant a new trial because a necessary element of the offense with which he was charged rested entirely upon circumstantial evidence.

[5-11] Appellant's second contention which is that the court misdirected the jury merits consideration. It may be conceded that one or two of the instructions of which he complains should not have been given. An example of this character of instruction is afforded by the instruction wherein the court advised the jury that it took judicial notice of the fact that on the day on which the accident occurred the sun set at 5:20 p. m. This instruction was undoubtedly superfluous.

Nevertheless, appellant has entirely failed to indicate that he was in the slightest degree prejudiced by the giving of it. Therefore, if it may be said that the court erred in giving the instruction, it was obviously harmless. Complaint is voiced that the court read to the jury the whole of section 123 of the California Vehicle Act (as amended by St. 1931, p. 2125, § 42), one subdivision of which prohibits, with certain specified exceptions, the operation of a motor vehicle in the center lane of a highway divided into three lanes. It is pointed out that the street on which the collision herein involved occurred was divided into six lanes and it is declared that the reading of that portion of the aforesaid section was therefore misleading. When, however, the whole instruction is examined, it is at once apparent that no one could have been misled by the inapplicability of that part of the aforesaid section which refers to highways divided into three lanes. Several instructions were given by the court dealing generally with the question of speed. It is urged that the giving of such instructions constituted prejudicial error since no witness testified that appellant drove his automobile at a rate of speed in excess of that permitted by law which was 45 miles per hour. It may be conceded that no evidence showing that appellant operated his automobile at a greater rate of speed than the legal speed limit was presented during the trial. However, the fact that appellant at the time of the collision was operating his automobile within the legal speed limit is not conclusive of the question. Circumstances sometimes make even a legal speed limit excessive. When it is remembered that appellant, immediately prior to the collision, was driving his automobile very near the center of the street at a speed which one witness testified was as fast as 45 miles per hour when he must have observed that another automobile was approaching him which was being driven to the west of, but also very near to the center line of the street, we think that it may not fairly be declared that the question of speed is entirely out of the case. Although the instructions relative to speed were unduly repetitious, we find ourselves unable to declare, first, that no instruction relating to the subject should have been given and, second, that appellant was prejudiced by the instructions which were given. Certain instructions were given which advised the jury that contributory negligence on the part of another person would not serve as a defense to appellant if the evidence showed that the injurious consequences of the collision were directly traceable to a violation of law by him which did not amount to a felony or that they were caused by his negligent, willful, reckless, and wanton misconduct. These instructions are criticized because it is said that thereby they injected into the case an entirely new theory totally lacking in evidentiary support. It may again be conceded that the court's instructions relative to contributory negligence were unnecessarily repetitious. Nevertheless, we cannot agree that the giving of them constituted so serious an error of law that we must declare that by reason thereof the court abused its discretion in denying appellant's motion for a new trial. There was evidence from which the jury might have inferred that the driver of the Ford automobile was negligent. It was not, therefore, error for the court to advise the jury that contributory negligence is not a defense in a proceeding of this character if the evidence showed that the injurious consequences of the collision were directly traceable to and caused by appellant's violation of law or by his reckless and wanton misconduct. Appellant further complains of the following instruction: "I have indicated that unless defendant acted 'knowingly' and 'wilfully' he is not guilty as charged, and in this connection it is to be noted that the defendant may urge that although he may have been guilty of a technical violation of the law, he was innocent of any guilty purpose in connection therewith."

It is urged that this instruction is fatally defective in that it presumes an admission of guilt by appellant and an attempt to excuse his guilt by a plea of lack of intent to violate the law. It is confidently asserted that no admission by appellant of even a technical violation of law was ever made or considered. It must, however, be observed that appellant testified that just prior to the collision some one in the automobile pushed his arm and that the crash occurred immediately thereafter; that he was rendered unconscious and remembered nothing further. He also testified on cross-examination that the three automobiles which he observed approaching him from the north "were on the other side of the road" and more particularly that the automobile with which he collided was on its right side of the street and that he could not state whether or not the Packard automobile swerved after his arm was pushed. The striking or pushing of appellant's arm by some other passenger in the Packard automobile was mentioned in the testimony of one other witness. We entertain the opinion that the aforementioned evidence justified the giving of the instruction under discussion.

With respect to the various instructions criticized by appellant, it may properly be observed that an examination of the entire record has produced the conviction that no miscarriage of justice resulted from the giving of them.

The order denying appellant's motion for a new trial is therefore affirmed.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiffs are twenty-four fire insurance companies who sued the defendant for loss by fire of a warehouse building and goods stored therein upon which the plaintiffs had satisfied claims for loss. The cause was tried to a jury, which returned a verdict for the defendant. From the judgment following the verdict, the plaintiffs have appealed upon typewritten transcripts.

On May 5, 1931, the warehouse and all its contents were totally destroyed by a fire of unknown origin. Stored therein at the time were 155 reels of copper wire owned by the defendant. All the property destroyed other than that owned by the defendant was insured by one or more of the plaintiff companies. The basis of their action is that for the purpose of saving its own property the defendant broke into the warehouse at a time when the plaintiffs claim that the fire was under control and confined to a small area, and that such entry caused the fire to flare up and pass beyond control. The defense is that, when the employees of the defendant entered the warehouse, the fire, which had been smouldering for approximately three hours, showed definite signs of being beyond control, and that these employees were then convinced that the fire was then incapable of being controlled, and that the property of the defendant would be destroyed unless removed from the warehouse.

The warehouse was located at the town of Irvington in Alameda county. The fire was discovered at the warehouse at about 4 a. m. The town of Irvington had no fire department, and calls were made on the adjoining towns of Centerville, Niles, and Mission San Jose. These responded with fire trucks and chemical tanks. The chief of the Centerville department, who was in charge of the operations, located the fire in a small area in the northeast portion of the warehouse where sacks of beet pulp were stored and in the wooden frame of the skylight immediately above the beet pulp. Firemen entered the building on the east side and opened the skylight for the purpose of throwing water upon the framework and upon the beet pulp underneath. The flame in this portion of the building was put out, but the fire continued to smoulder, filling the warehouse with smoke for a period of approximately two hours thereafter and until the entry of the defendant's employees as hereafter stated. During the course of the operations, the fire chief discovered that the water supply was insufficient, and ordered the laying of a pipe line to tap an additional water supply about a quarter of a mile away from the warehouse. While he was in charge of this work, the employees of the defendant discovered that the fire had broken out underneath the floor of the warehouse and was running into the northwest corner of the building, where defendant's cable was stored. They then asked permission of the owner of the warehouse to enter and remove their property. Some fifteen or thirty minutes after the fire was discovered burning underneath the floor defendant's employees made entry and then discovered it had moved from the beet pulp in the northeasterly corner of the building to the northwest corner, where their cable was stored, so that they were unable to remove the cable through the door by which they had entered. A portion of the wall of the warehouse was therefore removed and four of the 155 reels were rolled through this opening. Other reels had fallen through the burning floor, causing sparks to fly about the workmen, and this, together with the heat from the burning floor, prevented them from making further recovery of defendant's property.

There is no dispute as to the essential facts involved. Some of the witnesses differed in their opinion as to the question whether the fire was under control or could be controlled by the facilities at hand, but upon the main fact that the fire had extended from the beet pulp and was destroying the floor of the warehouse before defendants entered there is no substantial dispute. In plaintiffs' behalf their witnesses adopted the theory that, when defendant's employees opened the door on the northwest corner of the warehouse, they caused a draft through the building which fanned to flame the smouldering fire in the beet pulp, thus causing the total destruction of the building. On defendant's behalf, witnesses testified that the fire was completely out of control at the time they entered the building; that it had proceeded along the floor and underneath the building to such an extent that no further effort could save the building and the destruction of its contents. This opinion is based more or less upon the admitted fact that at all times there was an opening on the east wall of the building close to the place where the beet pulp was stored, an open skylight directly above the beet pulp, and an opening under the eaves three or four inches high all around the building. It was also undisputed that smoke was pouring out of all these openings from 4:00 a. m. until about 7:30 a. m., when defendant's employees entered the building.

[1] Disregarding the opinions and theories of the various witnesses and confining the case strictly to the undisputed evidence, the single question that was presented to the jury was whether the defendant, in its efforts to protect its own property, believed, and had reasonable grounds for believing, that its property was in danger of destruction unless removed and whether the acts of defendant's employees in this connection were reasonable and proper under the circumstances. On the issue of law involved, the briefs are singularly void in the citation of authority and long in the repetition of the testimony of witnesses. It should be unnecessary to say that this court cannot review this testimony for the purpose of passing on the credibility of the witnesses heard by the jury. Our only interest is to determine whether there is substantial evidence to support the verdict. The appellants do not claim that there is not substantial evidence for that purpose, and in view of the record this claim could not be made.

On the main issue, the rule is stated in 45 Corpus Juris, p. 712, that: "Where an emergency arises involving danger to one's property, he is justified in attempting to save the same, and if he acts with reasonable prudence in the endeavor to rescue or protect his property he is not liable for resulting injury to property of another." Owen v. Cook, 9 N. D. 134, 81 N. W. 285, 47 L. R. A. 646, is cited in support of the statement. That was a case where the defendants started a back fire to save their homes from destruction by an approaching prairie fire. The plaintiff claimed that the back fire spread beyond the main fire and caused the destruction of his property. The Supreme Court of North Dakota held that the acts of the defendants were not negligent, but that they had the right to take such steps for the protection of their own property as were reasonable and proper under the circumstances. Valentine v. Ry. Co., 155 Mich. 151, 118 N. W. 970, is cited by the appellants. In that case certain forest products of the plaintiff and freight cars of the defendant were on fire. The plaintiff owned other forest products which it claimed were safe from fire. The defendant moved one of its burning cars along its track where these products were located, and they were destroyed by a fire coming from this burning car of the defendant. The defendant did not justify its removal of the burning car for the purpose of saving its own property, but relied upon the defense that the property of the plaintiff would have been destroyed in any event. The real point of the Valentine Case is that upon the issues so formed it was a simple question for the jury to determine whether defendant's act in moving its burning car was reasonable and prudent and whether the defendant had sustained the burden of proof of its issue—that plaintiff's property would have been destroyed notwithstanding the acts of the defendant complained of. Latta v. New Orleans, etc., Ry. Co., 131 La. 272, 59 So. 250, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 983, also cited by appellants, is not helpful. There the court held that, in determining the liability of one who destroys the property of another to save his own, consideration should be given to the relative values and of the comparative ability of the sufferers to bear the loss. This is a doctrine to which we need not subscribe, as the case is to be controlled by other issues.

[2] Appellants complain of the following instruction: "If you find that defendant's employees believed and had reasonable grounds for believing that defendant's copper wire and reels were in danger of destruction if left in the warehouse here in question, then I instruct you that defendant's employees had the right to enter said warehouse and use all reasonable means to remove said wire and reels therefrom, and if you find that defendant's employees acted as ordinarily reasonable and careful men would act under such circumstances in endeavoring to remove said wire and reels from the warehouse, then I instruct you that the defendant was not negligent." It is argued that the instruction is erroneous because it excused respondent if the entry of the warehouse had been made after respondent's employees believed, and had reasonable grounds for believing that respondent's property was in danger of destruction unless removed. It is also argued that there is error in the instruction because it failed to note the provisions of the Penal Code preventing obstruction of firemen in their attempt to extinguish fires. We do not believe that the instruction is susceptible to either attack. We must bear in mind that the action is one for negligence and not one based upon acts of premeditation and formed intention. The jury was instructed that negligence is the omission to do something which an ordinary careful and prudent person would have done under the same or similar circumstances, or doing something which such a person would not have done in the same situation; that in determining whether one exercises ordinary care the jury should consider all the facts proved and all the surrounding circumstances and say whether the conduct of the defendant was that of a person of ordinary prudence and discretion under such circumstances. Having cast their case in negligence, the appellants committed to the jury the duty of determining whether under all the facts and surrounding circumstances the conduct of defendant's employees was that of persons of ordinary prudence and discretion, and this is all that the instruction complained of advises the jury to do. Manifestly, if respondent's employees did not believe that respondent's property was in danger of destruction, they had no right to enter the warehouse, because to do so under such circumstances would have been a trespass. The instruction does not nullify the provisions of Penal Code, § 385, as claimed by appellants. The giving of the chief's orders to keep the warehouse closed and the revocation of those orders was a question which was sharply disputed in the evidence. If the jury believed the testimony of respondent's witnesses on this point, and then found that in entering the warehouse respondent's employees "acted as ordinary reasonable and careful men would act under the circumstances," the jury would have found that the respondent was not negligent in that respect, and that was all that was covered by this instruction. If the appellants had desired an instruction on the Penal Code section, they should have requested it.

[3] Criticism is made of the instruction reading: "In order to find a verdict for plaintiffs you must find two separate facts; first, that defendant, in its endeavors to save its property was negligent and careless, and second you must also find that if defendant had not so endeavored to save its property then the building and its contents would not have been destroyed but would have been saved." It is argued that this instruction casts too great a burden upon the appellants; that the jury should have been instructed that it was necessary to find nothing more than that "the building might have been saved" if respondent's employees had not made the entry complained of. It is said that such an instruction would have permitted the jury to speculate, and thus to return a verdict for the appellants, if it believed that it was possible that the building might have been saved but for respondent's act. Houren v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 236 Ill. 620, 86 N. E. 611, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1110, 127 Am. St. Rep. 309, is cited to the point. That was a case where a railroad train had been left standing across a public highway; thereby preventing the fire department from approaching a fire burning on property on the other side of the track. Plaintiff was allowed recovery against the railroad company on the theory that the property might have been saved if the fire department had not been delayed by the standing train. We had occasion to consider a similar question in Hanlon D. & S. Co. v. S. P. Co., 92 Cal. App. 230, 234, 268 P. 385, where other cases to the same point are cited. The rule of these cases is that the unexplained blockading of the fire department and interference in its endeavors to control the fire makes a prima facie case of negligence in favor of the plaintiff whose property was destroyed by the fire. It is not the rule that damages may be awarded upon mere conjecture or surmise or that plaintiffs' burden of proving the actual damages sustained by the acts complained of is in anywise lessened.

Criticism is also made of the instruction covering the issue raised by respondent of contributory negligence on the part of the owner of the warehouse in whose behalf appellants sued. We are inclined to hold that the evidence offered in support of this plea was insufficient to charge contributory negligence, but we cannot perceive how this instruction could have prejudiced appellants. The evidence for the respondent is so clear and convincing that judgment should have gone for the respondent notwithstanding this plea.

[4, 5] Criticism is made of the rulings of the trial court in excluding testimony of witnesses as to what the fire chief told them relative to keeping the building closed. The rulings were made excluding testimony which would have been mere hearsay, but the appellants were not harmed because all the evidence which they sought to produce through these witnesses was properly tendered and received at other stages of the trial. Appellants complain of the ruling excluding the testimony of the fire chief as to his opinion whether the fire was under control "during the time that the pipe was being laid." The answer was properly excluded because the chief was shown to have been absent from the place of the fire during a large part of the time when this pipe was being laid. Another member of the fire department was asked if in his opinion the fire was under control. The court sustained the objection as to the form of the question, stating that the witness could tell what effect, if any, the opening of the wall by the respondent had upon the extension of the fire. There was no error in the ruling.

[6] In the cross-examination of an expert witness, called by the respondent, the appellants were unduly limited. The hypothetical question asked this witness did not state all the facts as they existed and upon which the direct examination of this witness was based. For this reason the trial court sustained respondent's objection to the question and limited appellants' cross-examination in that manner except for the sole purpose of determining the qualifications of the witness. The ruling would have been correct if the question had been asked on the direct examination of the witness, but no such limit is imposed upon cross-examination of an expert witness. Jones on Evidence, Civil Cases (3d Ed.) § 389.

Finally, it is argued that the trial court committed prejudicial error in the conduct of the trial of the case. Numerous instances are cited where the trial court interrupted counsel for the appellants and stated its understanding and interpretation of the testimony of the witnesses. It is not necessary to reprint the instances giving rise to these objections. Manifestly, the trial court gave appellants' counsel an uncomfortable experience in the trial of his case, and on numerous occasions unduly interfered with the orderly and judicious conduct of the trial. Appellants had a novel and difficult case to present to the jury, but one which the trial court apparently felt was without merit from the beginning of the trial. But the appellants elected to try their case to the jury, and this is a right which should not be curtailed by comments from the bench. We have read the record with extreme care because of the delicacy of the question presented, and, though we cannot approve the conduct of the trial, nevertheless we are unable to find where the acts complained of were of such a prejudicial nature as would justify a reversal of the judgment. Notwithstanding the handicaps placed in their paths, the appellants proved all that they sought to prove in support of the theory upon which their complaint was founded, and our judgment is that this proof was insufficient to support a verdict for the appellants if such a verdict had been rendered. For these reasons we cannot say that a "miscarriage of justice," within the meaning of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, has resulted from the errors complained of.

The judgment is affirmed.

BOLD v. BOARD OF MEDICAL EXAMINERS.
Civ. 7871.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.
June 26, 1933.

1. Limitation of actions ☞ 61.

Proceeding before board of medical examiners to revoke physician's license to practice medicine for procuring criminal abortion held not "civil action" or "special proceeding of civil nature" subject to statute of limitations since board is not a "court" though exercising power judicial in nature (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 312, 363, and § 339, subd. 1).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Civil Action—Case—Suit—etc.," "Court (of Justice)" and "Special Proceeding," see Words & Phrases.]

2. Physicians and surgeons ☞ 11(3).

Board of medical examiners exceeds its jurisdiction if it acts without competent evidence, and writ of certiorari may be used to determine whether board acted without competent evidence.

3. Physicians and surgeons ☞ 11(3).

Evidence in proceeding before board of medical examiners justified board's action in revoking physician's license to practice medicine, for procuring criminal abortion.

4. Physicians and surgeons ☞ 11(3).

In proceedings to review board of medical examiners' order revoking physician's license for procuring criminal abortion, excluding question to witness whether she had noticed physician's hands after anesthetic was administered and before she left table held not prejudicial.

5. Physicians and surgeons ☞ 11(3).

That board of medical examiners in proceeding to revoke physician's license for procuring criminal abortion ordered license revoked on former charge did not deprive it of jurisdiction to revoke license on second charge, since board had jurisdiction of both charges.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. Walter Hanby, Judge.

Petition by Francis James Bold for a writ of certiorari to review an order of the Board of Medical Examiners of the State of California. From a judgment affirming the action of the Board in revoking petitioner's license to practice medicine, petitioner appeals.

Affirmed.

W. T. Kendrick, Sr., and W. T. Kendrick, Jr., both of Los Angeles (Caryl Warner, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

Richard M. Lyman, Jr., of San Francisco, and Otto J. Emme, of Los Angeles (Bayard R. Rountree, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

ARCHBALD, Justice pro tem.

After a hearing before the board of medical examiners, appellant's license to practice medicine in the state of California was revoked. Thereafter a petition for a writ of certiorari to review the proceedings before said board was filed in the superior court of Los Angeles county, which court, upon the hearing of the issues raised by the petition, answer, and return made to the writ, rendered judgment affirming the action of said board and denying relief to petitioner. From such judgment, petitioner has appealed.

It is contended: (1) That the proceedings before the board were barred by the statute of limitations; (2) that the board had no jurisdiction to revoke such license, for the reason that the evidence taken fails to show that appellant procured an abortion upon a pregnant woman, as alleged; (3) that the board acted without having all "proper" evidence offered; and (4) that said board divested itself of jurisdiction over appellant by previously revoking the latter's license in a separate proceeding.

[1] (1) Appellant urges that the proceedings were barred by section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure, subdivision 1, in that the complaint before the board was filed March 28, 1930, and the alleged abortion is charged to have been performed March 30, 1927. He contends that the hearing before the board was a special proceeding of a civil nature, and an action within the meaning of section 363 of the Code of Civil Procedure. With such contention we cannot agree. The proceeding before the board is not a civil action (section 312, Code Civ. Proc.) which includes "a special proceeding of a civil nature" (section 363, Code Civ. Proc.), to the commencement of which the statute of limitations relates. Such provision in our opinion relates only to actions or special proceedings in courts, and not hearings before boards. In re Lowenthal, 78 Cal. 427, 21 P. 7; Ex parte Tyler, 107 Cal. 78, 40 P. 33. Respondent board is not a "court" (Suckow v. Alderson, 182 Cal. 247, 249, 187 P. 965), even though it exercises a power judicial in its nature. The purpose of the act under which the proceeding was instituted is to keep unqualified and undesirable individuals, or those guilty of unprofessional conduct, out of the medical profession, and the staleness of the charge would not necessarily make it reflect less upon the character of the person charged. In our opinion the effect of the staleness of such charge, if any, on such character, is a matter exclusively within the jurisdiction of the board, there being no statutory bar applicable. Assuming, without deciding, that it is within the province of the Legislature to say that unprofessional conduct, engaged in for a stated time prior to the bringing of a charge, shall not be considered by the board, it has not done so and we cannot.

[2, 3] (2) If a quasi judicial body such as the board of medical examiners acts without competent evidence, it exceeds its jurisdiction, and the writ of certiorari or review may be used to determine whether or not it has so acted. Osborne v. Baughman, 85 Cal. App. 224, 259 P. 70. The complaint filed with respondent for the revocation of his license charged unprofessional conduct on the part of appellant in that he did "procure, * * * attempt, agree and/or offer to procure a criminal abortion upon a pregnant woman, to-wit, Margaret de la Cuesta." Mrs. de la Cuesta testified that she was married, living and having marital relations with her husband; that she had passed her last monthly period and for at least a week "couldn't eat anything," was "very sick to my stomach," and "was dreadfully sick all over," but otherwise in normal health, and that from her own knowledge of her condition she believed she was pregnant. Two visits were made to appellant by

Mrs. de la Cuesta. At the first, the arrangement was made to have the operation performed. At the second, she passed through the reception room, into the operating room; and without going into the details of what was said and done, we are of the opinion that, considering all that was said on the first visit, together with the lack of conversation on the second, as well as the acts and circumstances surrounding the operation, there is ample evidence in the record to justify the action of respondent board.

[4] (3) The witness Edna Cook was asked as to a question put to her at the hearing in the superior court, to which objection was made and sustained. The question was in effect whether the witness noticed appellant's hands at any time after the anesthetic was administered and before she left the table and it appears that she had answered, "I did not; I did not take any particular notice of them." Later on she was asked the same question by appellant, to which she replied, "Yes, I saw them." Counsel for appellant then renewed his request for permission to ask as to the testimony given in the trial court in response to the same question. After some colloquy, the president of the board asked the witness: "Now did you see his hands?" to which she replied, "Yes. Q. Did you take any particular notice of his hands? A. I did not take any particular notice of them but I saw them." We fail to see where any prejudice could have resulted to appellant by reason of the ruling complained of.

[5] (4) It appears that during the same hearing evidence was taken tending to show that appellant performed a similar operation upon another woman. The board first acted upon such complaint by deciding that appellant's license should be revoked, and afterwards a vote was taken upon the charge here involved. Appellant contends that having already revoked his license the board lost jurisdiction to act on the evidence taken before it so acted, notwithstanding the fact that an appeal is still pending on such order, so far as the record discloses. We see no merit in the contention. Respondent had jurisdiction of both charges and jurisdiction to decide both charges and such decisions could not be made simultaneously but had to be made successively.

Judgment affirmed.

OXNARD SCHOOL DIST. v. PENN et al.
(BECKETT, Intervener).

Civ. 4890.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

June 23, 1933.

Assignments §50(1).

School contractor's order to school board's secretary, directing delivery, to lumber company, of warrant for balance due contractor and expressing readiness to indorse warrant over to lumber company, held good as equitable assignment, as against contractor's subsequent judgment creditor, though assignment was not for specific sum and board took no action thereon (Code Civ. Proc. § 710).

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Marshall F. McComb, Judge.

Action by the Oxnard School District against G. E. Penn and others to determine to whom the balance of a fund in possession of plaintiff should be paid, in which Jarrett Beckett intervened, and the People's Lumber Company filed a cross-complaint. Plaintiff deposited the money in court, and, from a judgment awarding a certain amount to the Woodhead Lumber Company and the balance to the cross-complainant, intervener appeals. Affirmed.

Jarrett Beckett, of Long Beach, and E. W. Howell, of Ventura, for appellant.

Blackstock & Rogers, of Ventura, for respondent.

Mr. Justice PLUMMER delivered the opinion of the court.

This action was begun by the Oxnard school district for the purpose of determining to whom the balance of a fund in its possession should be paid. The money on hand was deposited in court.

So far as this appeal is concerned, there is a controversy only between Jarrett Beckett, as appellant, and People's Lumber Company, a corporation, as respondent, and for purposes of convenience, Beckett will be referred to as the appellant, and the People's Lumber Company, a corporation, as respondent.

In April, 1929, G. E. Penn, a contractor, entered into a contract with the Oxnard school district of Ventura county, for the construction of a school building for the agreed price of $63,203.90. The contractor's bond was written by the Southern Surety Company under an arrangement with the People's Lumber Company whereby the latter agreed to save the surety harmless from any claims said lumber company might have for materials furnished in connection with the work. The contract was finished in September, 1929; notice of completion was filed on October 14 or 15, 1929. At that date all of the contract price had been paid save and except a balance of $15,871.72. On October 30, 1929, the defendant Woodhead Lumber Company, a judgment creditor of the contractor, filed with the auditor of Ventura county an affidavit and transcript of judgment showing a judgment against the contractor for the sum of $716.85. On October 31, 1929, G. E. Penn, the contractor, signed and delivered to R. B. Haydock, secretary to the board of the Oxnard school district, an order requesting the delivery of the warrant for the balance, due on account of the erection of the school building to the People's Lumber Company. The record shows that thereafter an order was given to the Bank of Italy of like import, this order being dated October 30, 1929; but it satisfactorily appears from the testimony set forth in the record that this order was signed at a later date than the one given to the People's Lumber Company, as, at the time of giving the order to the Bank of Italy, the president of the bank was informed of a previous order given to the People's Lumber Company, and that the People's Lumber Company had the sole right to the fund coming to the contractor after the payment of certain claims for labor. The judgment of the Woodhead Lumber Company having been filed as provided by law, at a date prior to the order given by Penn to the People's Lumber Company, the court awarded judgment to the Woodhead Lumber Company for the amount of its claim, and gave the People's Lumber Company judgment for the balance due on the contract price for the erection of the school building in the sum of $6,368.98.

On April 7, 1930, the appellant having obtained a judgment against Penn in the sum of $7,085.30, filed a transcript and affidavit under the provisions of section 710, Code of Civil Procedure, with the auditor of Ventura county. This suit having been begun by the Oxnard school district to determine to whom the fund should be paid, the appellant filed a complaint in intervention.

The court found that the order hereinafter set forth, given by G. E. Penn to the respondent, constituted an equitable assignment of the balance due, and awarded judgment accordingly. The right of the parties to the fund involved in this action depends upon whether the transaction set forth constituted an equitable assignment as found by the court. The instrument signed by G. E. Penn is in the following words and figures:

"October 31, 1929.

"Mr. R. B. Haydock, Oxnard, Cal.

"Dear Sir—When you secure a properly executed warrant for settlement of the balance due me on the Woodrow Wilson school job, deliver said warrant to the Peoples Lumber Co., Ventura, and I will endorse the same over to said Peoples Lumber Co. in payment for materials furnished.

"[Signed] G. E. Penn."

The testimony of R. B. Haydock, the superintendent of schools of Ventura county, who also acted as secretary for the clerk of the school board, is as follows: "I recall the order, 'Peoples Lumber Company exhibit 1.' Mr. Penn came into my office on October 31, 1929, with Mr. Cleale, and said he would like to write out an order for delivery of the balance due him on the contract to the Peoples Lumber Company. Mr. Cleale sat down at a desk and wrote the order out, and Mr. Penn signed it. The amount due the contractor at that time, under the contract, was the 25 per cent which is held back under the terms of the contract for 35 days after completion of the work. There were several stop notices filed in the auditor's office against the balance due. The order made out by Penn in favor of the Bank of Italy, and dated October 30, 1929, was received from the bank around November 16, 1929, through the mail. I acknowledged it on the 19th." The witness further testified that no official action was taken by the board in relation to the assignment.

The record further shows that the contractor made no further claim to the balance due on the contract after the delivery of the assignment to the People's Lumber Company. The record indicates that the Bank of Italy abandoned all claim to the fund.

The contractor, Penn, testified in relation to the order given the Bank of Italy as follows: "Lagomarsino, president of the bank, came to me with the order already written and said, 'Sign that, will you.' I said, 'Well, now, I don't know about this. The money that is left belongs to the Peoples Lumber Company. I will sign it but you will have to fight it out with the Peoples Lumber Company'—which, standing uncontradicted, shows that the Bank of Italy was advised that the fund had already been assigned to the People's Lumber Company, and that it acquired nothing by the transaction just set forth.

Upon this appeal it is contended that no equitable assignment is shown, principally by reason of the fact that the school board did not take any action in relation to the assignment, and that, the assignment being for the balance of the fund, instead of for a specific sum, cannot be given effect, and that it remained for the contractor to sign the warrant which he had directed to be delivered to the People's Lumber Company.

While a number of cases dealing with equitable assignments have to do with instances where the whole of the fund has been assigned, and language used which indicates that it is necessary that the assignment cover the whole fund, and that there be a specific mention of the amount of money assigned, such, however, does not appear to be the prevailing rule in this state.

In Baumgarten v. California Pacific Title & Trust Co., 16 P.(2d) 332, 335 (hearing denied by the Supreme Court), the District Court of Appeal for the First District, in a rather elaborate opinion dealing with a partial assignment of a fund, announced the rule in this state as follows: "The above order, being one for the payment to respondent of a part only of the whole fund due the drawer, and never having been accepted by the drawee, cannot be said to constitute a legal assignment, pro tanto, of the obligation due the Blackmore Investment Company or of any part thereof. [Citing a number of cases.] However, it has been repeatedly held that where an order, such as the one at bar, is given for a valuable and adequate consideration, and with the intent to effect an assignment, it will as between the payee and the drawer operate as an equitable assignment taking precedence over subsequent assignments and judgment liens. Wheatley v. Strobe & Wilcoxson, 12 Cal. 92, 73 Am. Dec. 522; Pierce v. Robinson, Adm'r, 13 Cal. 116; Pope v. Huth, 14 Cal. 403; Curtner v. Lyndon, 128 Cal. 35, 60 P. 462; McIntyre v. Hauser, 131 Cal. 11, 63 P. 69; Fidelity Sav., etc., Ass'n v. Rodgers, supra [180 Cal. 683, 182 P. 426]; Dunlap v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 50 Cal. App. 476, 195 P. 688."

In Wheatley v. Strobe, 12 Cal. 92, 73 Am. Dec. 522, the want of acceptance of the order by the drawee was held only to affect the form of the action that could be maintained by the payee, and, in doing so, used the following language: "The want of a written acceptance does not affect the right of Howell to the money due, but only the mode of enforcing it. With the acceptance he could have sustained an action upon the order; without it he must recover upon the original demand by force of the assignment. Under the old common law practice, the action could only be maintained in the name of the assignor for the benefit of the assignee, but under our system it may be brought in the name of the assignee as the party beneficially interested. Courts of law, equally with Courts of equity, gave effect to assignments, like the one under consideration, by controlling the proceeds of the judgments recovered for the benefit of the assignee." (Citing cases.)

In Goldman v. Murray, 164 Cal. 419, 129 P. 462, 463, the court had before it the question of an equitable assignment of a part of a debt and ruled as follows: "In order to constitute an equitable assignment of a debt, no express words to that effect are necessary. If from the entire transaction it clearly appears that the intention of the parties was to pass title to the chose in action, then an assignment will be held to have taken place." And then the distinction between the right of action where there has been an acceptance and a nonacceptance is clearly set forth: "The holder of the bill or order cannot sue the drawee-at-law in his own name, as he would thus divide the cause of action and leave a balance due the creditor. He cannot sue in the creditor's name, except by his consent, as, at best, he is only entitled to a part of the debt due him. But it has been held in numerous cases, and we think should now be regarded as law, that a nonnegotiable order for part of a fund operates as an equitable assignment pro tanto. Clearly this is the case when it has been accepted, or assented to by the drawee. And when it has not been accepted, our own view is this: That a nonnegotiable order for part of a fund does operate as an equitable assignment pro tanto as between the drawer and payee, because obviously so intended."

See, also, 3 California Jurisprudence, 274, where the text, supported by numerous authorities, is as follows: "While the rule is well settled that a creditor cannot split his claim against a debtor, and by assignment of a portion thereof impose upon the debtor, without his consent, the legal obligation to pay the same, courts of equity, however, have long been accustomed to recognize and enforce the rights of partial assignees of choses in action although the debtor has not consented to the assignment. In such a case the partial assignee has the right to bring all the parties before the court and have his rights under the assignment determined. And so, as between the parties to the assignment a nonnegotiable order for part of a particular fund or debt operates as an equitable assignment pro tanto, and the consent of the debtor is not necessary to the validity of such an assignment."

See, also, Title Insurance & Trust Co., a corporation, v. Williamson, 18 Cal. App. 324, 123 P. 245, 247, where the question of an equitable assignment was involved, and the rules of law set forth as we have stated herein, and further holding that no particular form of words are necessary to constitute an equitable assignment if the intent of the parties to that effect is clearly shown.

In Los Angeles City School District v. Tucker, 99 Cal. App. 390, 278 P. 507, 508, this court had before it for consideration an order held to constitute an equitable assignment in view of the intention of the parties shown by the record, and in considering the question, held that the form of the order was immaterial if the intention of the parties was satisfactorily shown by the record. The notice or order in the case just referred to is strikingly similar to the order in the instant case, as will be readily seen as we consider its terms, which are as follows:

"Los Angeles, Cal., May 20th, 1925.

"Mr. C. F. Lenz, Auditor L. A. Board of Education.

"Dear Sir: I hereby authorize you to deliver my warrant for the sum of $574.50, which is the 35-day payment for alterations to the old building at the Normandie Avenue School House, to Patten & Davies Lumber Co., this money being due them for material supplied by them for above mentioned work; said payment being due June 5th, 1925; when said warrant is ready for delivery I will endorse same to Patten & Davies at your office. Please notify me.

"Lewis Tucker, Contractor."

In view of the holding had by this court in the Tucker Case, supra, we find no escape from the conclusion that the assignment in the instant case must be held sufficient to transfer the fund to the respondent, People's Lumber Company, a corporation.

Other minor questions are presented for consideration upon appeal, but, in view of what we have stated, it is evident that the judgment must be affirmed. And it is so ordered.

CRAIG, Justice.

A demurrer to the amended complaint in an action arising from an award of compensation to the sublessee of certain real property having been sustained without leave to amend, the plaintiff appealed.

[1-3] After the entry of an interlocutory decree in condemnation, the owner in fee of the realty in controversy commenced a suit to enjoin the payment of damages to a tenant in possession under a five-year lease from said owner's lessee. It is asserted by the appellant that no appeal was taken from the decree in the original proceedings, but that a determination of the respective rights of the parties is here desired that the real party in interest may receive just compensation. A demurrer to the complaint praying injunction was sustained, whereupon the plaintiff by an amended complaint demanded the amount of award allowed his sublessee, to which pleading a demurrer was sustained without leave to amend. It is not denied that the respondent Daigler's term had not expired, nor that he was in actual occupancy of the premises when the interlocutory decree was entered. The validity of said sublease is not questioned, but it is argued, in effect, that the owner was the sole party who could have suffered from deprivation of property rights in said premises through condemnation. A leasehold is property, the subject of ownership, for which a tenant for a term of years is guaranteed compensation before his title can be divested under the power of eminent domain. City of Pasadena v. Porter, 201 Cal. 381, 257 P. 526, 53 A. R. L. 679. It is a use or right of possession with which the owner has parted for a consideration flowing from his lessee. We are unable to say as a matter of law that it was error to allow any amount of damages to the tenant in possession; and it was solely a question of fact for the trial court to determine upon the question of proper apportionment. The sufficiency of evidence to justify such judicial allowances could have been questioned only upon appeal from the decree then rendered.

The judgment is affirmed.

LACOE v. WOLFE et al.
Civ. 970.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

July 3, 1933.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 31,
1933.

1. Corporations ⇨133.

Person entitled to stock in corporation can sue corporation for damages for refusal to transfer stock to him or can sue in equity to compel registration of transfer of stock.

2. Corporations ⇨133.

Person seeking damages for refusal to transfer stock on corporation's books has claim against corporation since act or omission complained of is act of corporation done through its agent.

3. Corporations ⇨133.

Secretary of corporation is not personally liable for failure to transfer stock on corporation's books, in absence of statutory provision.

4. Corporations ⇨320(7).

In stockholder's action for damages against secretary and directors of corporation on ground they conspired to prevent transfer of plaintiff's stock, damages and not conspiracy was gist of action, and alleged conspiracy did not remedy failure of complaint to state cause of action.

Complaint alleged that petitioner demanded transfer of stock on corporation's books; that defendants conspired to induce corporation through its secretary to refuse transfer of stock for purpose of defrauding plaintiff; that defendants conspired and directed secretary not to make such transfer; that corporation by reason thereof refused to make transfer; that refusal was wrongful; and that as result of such interference on part of defendants, plaintiff was deprived of his rights as owner and holder of stock, and that stock became worthless.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

On February 8, 1928, the plaintiff purchased at a trustee's sale all of the stock of a certain corporation with the exception of five qualifying shares held by the directors thereof, said stock having been transferred to the trustee to secure a debt of the corporation. On July 25, 1928, the plaintiff demanded that the stock thus acquired be transferred to his name on the books of the company, which demand was refused, although the stock was finally transferred on April 12, 1929. This is an action for damages brought against the secretary and directors of this corporation on the theory that they had entered into a conspiracy to induce and prevent the secretary from transferring the stock in question to the plaintiff. After the filing of a second amended complaint, the matter came on for hearing upon the demurrer of one of the defendants and upon the motion of all the appearing defendants for judgment on the pleadings, as a result of which the demurrer was sustained without leave to amend and judgment was entered in favor of the defendants, from which judgment the plaintiff has appealed.

The only question before us is whether the amended complaint states a cause of action.

This complaint, after alleging certain facts about the organization of the corporation, the amount of its stock, and the acquiring of practically all of the same by the plaintiff, alleges that the plaintiff demanded of the company that the stock be transferred; that the defendants conspired to induce the company, through its secretary, to refuse to transfer the stock for the purpose of defrauding the plaintiff as owner and holder of the stock; that in pursuance of such conspiracy the defendants directed, requested, and advised the company through its defendant secretary, not to make the transfer requested; that by the exercise of threats, persuasions, and promises the defendants induced the company through its said secretary to refuse to make said transfer; that said company by reason thereof refused to make such transfer; that such refusal was wrongful; that as a result of such interference on the part of defendants plaintiff was deprived of his rights as owner and holder of the stock; that said stock was worth $65,327.33 on July 25, 1928; that the market value thereof depreciated from said sum to nothing between that date and April 12, 1929; and that plaintiff was damaged in the sum of $90,327.33.

[1-3] It seems to be well settled that a person entitled to stock in a private corporation has a right of action for damages against the corporation for the refusal of its officers to transfer the stock to him upon the company books. Kimball v. Union Water Company, 44 Cal. 173, 13 Am. Rep. 157. It has also been held that a suit in equity is available to such a person and that, ordinarily, this is the most complete and most just remedy for compelling a corporation to register a transfer of stock. Spangenberg v. Western, etc., Co., 166 Cal. 284, 135 P. 1127. A party claiming to be entitled to such a transfer has the option to compel the same through a suit in equity or to press a claim for any damages suffered. If he seeks damages, his claim is against the corporation, since the act or omission complained of is the act of the corporation, done through its agent. While a corporation may be liable for such a refusal to act on the part of its secretary, if wrongful, in the absence of any statutory provision, the secretary is not personally liable for such an official act. 14 Cor. Jur. 766; Fletcher Cyclopedia Corporations, § 3821; Thompson on Corporations (3d Ed.) 6, p. 309, § 4438; Nicholson v. Morgan, 119 Misc. 309, 196 N. Y. S. 147; Cooley v. Curran, 54 Misc. 221, 104 N. Y. S. 424. While the appellant insists that the gist of his action is a conspiracy to prevent the secretary from acting, the fact that the act complained of was the act of the corporation is recognized in the many allegations of the complaint that the transfer was requested of and refused by the "company."

[4] At the times material hereto, the only statutory provision in this state for personal liability on the part of an officer of a corporation to the party aggrieved by the failure of such officer to transfer stock therein was section 324 of the Civil Code, which provided that such an officer, so refusing, should be liable to the party aggrieved in the sum of $400, to be recovered as liquidated damages. Not only was this the only statutory provision at that time but the provision that such an amount should be recovered as liquidated damages effectually limits the personal liability of such an officer for such a refusal to act. However, it appears that this action was not brought in time to permit a recovery under that section, and the appellant specifically disclaims any attempt or desire to recover thereunder.

Reliance is here placed entirely upon a right to recover against the secretary and the directors of the corporation on the ground of their having conspired to prevent the corporation from transferring the stock in question at the time demand was made therefor. The damage and not the conspiracy is the gist of such an action as this, and the rule is that a conspiracy will not support such an action unless something is done which, without the conspiracy, would give to the plaintiff a right of action. Bowman v. Wohlke, 166 Cal. 121, 135 P. 37, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 1011. It follows that the failure of the complaint to state a cause of action as against the secretary of the corporation is not remedied by the inclusion of allegations that the directors conspired with him to bring about the result complained of.

This case seems rather to illustrate the wisdom of the general rule. Having a remedy available, the appellant chose to wait until, as he alleges, the stock in question had become worthless. A similar decline in value occurs in connection with the stock of many corporations and may well be beyond the control of any secretary thereof or even of the board of directors. In the particular complaint before us, while it is alleged that the corporation, through its secretary, refused to transfer this stock as a result of a conspiracy, and that the market value of the stock declined during the period such refusal continued, there is no allegation of any facts tending to show that the defendants did anything or were responsible for anything which contributed to such a decline in value. Many cases may arise where a secretary is in doubt as to the rights of parties asking for transfers and where his duty to the corporation and to all concerned requires him to refuse to act at once, in order that proper steps may be taken to determine conflicting claims and to protect all parties. To subject a secretary to personal liability for thus performing his duty and to make him liable for all that may occur during the interim, whether arising from general business conditions or not, might often work a great injustice to the officer and at the same time allow a transfer claimant to profit by his own delay and his own failure to avail himself of proper and timely remedies open to him.

For the reasons given, the judgment is affirmed.

DAILY TELEGRAM CO. OF LONG BEACH et al. v. LONG BEACH PRESS
PUB. CO. et al.
Civ. 7530.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

July 1, 1933.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 28, 1933.

1. Limitation of actions ⇨100(1).

To avoid statutory bar in cases of fraud, plaintiff must show discovery of fraud within 3 years before beginning action, commission of fraud under circumstances excluding presumption of knowledge at time, and circumstances surrounding discovery so that court may determine whether discovery was made within prescribed period (Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 4).

2. Fraud ⇨22(1).

Rule that, absent confidential relationship, reasonable prudence requires one to read or have read document before signing it, is subject to limitation that fraud used to procure signature relieves one from such requirement.

3. Limitation of actions ⇨179(2).

Assertion that fraud was not discovered sooner is insufficient to avoid statutory bar, since it must appear that fraud could not have been discovered by reasonable diligence (Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 4).

4. Limitation of actions ⇨179(2).

Mere allegation that defendants concealed true facts is insufficient to avoid statutory bar against actions for fraud, absent allegation of affirmative acts in nature of artifice (Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 4).

5. Limitation of actions ⇨100(1).

Parties cannot by seclusion from means of information claim exemption from statutory bar against actions for fraud (Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 4).

6. Limitation of actions ⇨179(2).

Complaint for procuring signature to contract without promised stipulations for assumption of debts by new corporation and equal division of stock held insufficient to avoid statutory bar against actions for fraud where not showing that information leading to discovery of fraud was not available to plaintiff prior to running of statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 4).

Complaint alleged that fraud complained of was perpetrated subsequent to negotiations which began in August, 1924; and that fraud was not discovered until on or about September 26, 1926, though action was not begun until December 11, 1929; it also showed physical disability, reliance on assurances that contract presented for signature contained stipulated provisions and subsequent concealment of truth by defendants, but alleged no affirmative acts of artifice, and no facts showing that plaintiff-director could not have obtained information sooner than she did obtain it by examination of corporation's books, but showed engagement in other matters and absences from state.

HENDERSON, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal from a judgment of dismissal entered after defendants' demurrer to the second amended complaint was sustained without leave to amend upon the ground that it does not state a cause of action, and that said cause of action is barred by the statute of limitations. The complaint, which is for damages based upon the alleged fraud of the defendants in procuring the execution of a contract, was filed more than three years after the accrual of the purported cause of action.

In brief, the salient facts recited by the amended complaint are in effect as follows: The appellant corporation, the Daily Telegram of Long Beach, and the respondent corporation, Long Beach Press Publishing Company, were publishing rival newspapers in the city of Long Beach. The appellant Belle McCord Roberts, the president and majority stockholder of the appellant corporation, owned all of its shares of stock except those owned by its secretary, the respondent S. S. Conklin, and the respondents otherwise individually named, owned all of the shares of the respondent corporation. During the month of August, 1924, the respondents, including said S. S. Conklin, presented a plan to the appellants for the consolidation of the two companies into a new corporation known as the Press-Telegram Company, together with the proposal that it should occupy a building then in the course of construction by the Long Beach Building Corporation, the shares of which would be divided among the respective parties in varying amounts. The appellants were finally persuaded to enter into negotiations for the purpose of effecting such an arrangement, and during the course thereof respondents prepared and presented to appellant Roberts an agreement in writing for her signature, which provided in effect that 63 per cent. of the stock of the proposed corporation should be issued to appellants and the balance thereof to the respondent corporation; that as the indebtedness of the appellant corporation exceeded the obligations of the respondent corporation by the sum of $103,910 the owners of the latter should purchase from the former 18 per cent. of the stock of the new corporation at a price of $140,000 to be paid for in part by the assumption of said indebtedness by the new corporation. The appellants refused to accept the terms offered by the contract, but with the counterproposal, however, that the same be redrafted to include certain changes whereby their indebtedness should be assumed by the respondent corporation and the shares of stock should be equally divided between the respondent and appellant corporations.

The respondents consented to the suggested changes and presented a second draft for the signature of said Belle McCord Roberts, both individually and as president of the appellant corporation. By reason of the loss of one eye, together with a nervous and sick condition which affected the sight of the remaining eye, and because she was physically unable at said time to read said contract, the appellant Roberts signed the contract without reading the same, in reliance upon the fraudulent representations of respondents that the changes as requested and demanded by her had been made.

It was further alleged that during the interval following the execution of the contract she was prevented from reading the contract by reason of her absence from the city of Long Beach, with the exception of certain brief intervals, and that although a director of the corporation, her position was purely nominal with only a restricted participation in the affairs of the corporation.

The alleged fraud was not discovered until on or about the 26th day of December, 1926, when information relative to a payment of money by the Press-Telegram Company to the Long Beach Building Company caused her to make an investigation of the books of the former. By reason of this examination she was moved to read the agreement between the parties and learned for the first time of the exclusion of the provisions demanded by her to be included in said contract prior to its execution by her. It is stated by counsel for respondents, and there is no denial made, that this action was commenced on the 11th day of December, 1929.

The appellants urge, among other things, as a ground for reversal that the trial court erred in determining that their cause of action was barred by the running of the three-year period of limitation prescribed by section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Furthermore, they contend in this connection that the allegations of their complaint are sufficient to bring them within the terms of the exception expressed by subdivision 4 thereof, which provides that a cause of action, by which relief is sought upon the grounds of fraud and mistake, is "not to be deemed to have accrued until the discovery, by the aggrieved party, of the facts constituting the fraud or mistake."

[1] The requirements of a complaint necessary to invoke this exception are summarized by the recent case of Consolidated Reservoir & Power Co. v. Scarborough, 216 Cal. 698, 16 P.(2d) 268, 270, which quotes with approval from Galusha v. Fraser, 178 Cal. 653, 657, 174 P. 311, 312, as follows: "Where the plaintiff sues for relief on the ground of fraud, and seeks exemption from the three-year period of limitation for the reason that he did not discover the fraud until after it was perpetrated, he must not only show (1) that he did not discover the fraud until within the three years next before the action was begun, and (2) that the fraud was committed under such circumstances that he would not be presumed to have had knowledge of it at the time, but (3) he must also set forth the times and circumstances under which the facts constituting the fraud came to his knowledge, so that the court may determine from the allegations of the complaint whether the discovery was within that period." See, also, Lady Washington C. Co. v. Wood, 113 Cal. 482, 45 P. 809; Original M. & M. Co. v. Casad, 210 Cal. 71, 290 P. 456.

The complaint, in addition to setting forth the physical inability of the appellant Roberts to read, specifically alleged, in order to excuse her nondiscovery of the fraud at the time of the execution of the contract, the following facts: "That before signing said new and second draft of said agreement said Belle McCord Roberts inquired of the defendants whether the changes agreed upon prior thereto and requested and made a condition of the execution of the contract had been made, that the defendant including the said S. S. Conklin informed and stated to said Belle McCord Roberts individually and as president of the plaintiff corporation that the changes had been made in said draft."

[2] We are of the opinion that the complaint adequately states the facts necessary to meet the first two requirements above stated. The circumstances alleged were sufficient to excuse the appellant Roberts from reading the instrument at the time of its execution. It is the well-established rule that in the absence of a confidential relationship between the parties, reasonable prudence requires one to read or to have read to him a document, which he proposes to execute (Hawkins v. Hawkins, 50 Cal. 553; Dale v. Dale, 87 Cal. App. 359, 262 P. 339; Freligh v. McGrew, 95 Cal. App. 251, 272 P. 791); but this rule is subject to the limitation that where actual fraud is used in procuring an instrument to be signed the party injured is relieved from reading it. The rule is thus stated in the case of Ferro v. Los Angeles First National, etc., Bank, 89 Cal. App. 43, on page 46, 264 P. 292, 293, as follows: "In Hanscom v. Drullard, 79 Cal. 237, 21 P. 736, 737, the court says: 'A man may perhaps be able to discover for himself what he ought to know if left to his own devices, but where he is induced by the artifice of another not to use his opportunities, it would seem hardly fair that the one using the trick or misrepresentation should remain protected.'"

In attempting to satisfy the third requirement of the rule above announced, the appellant Roberts alleged the following circumstances surrounding the discovery of the fraud: "That on or about the 26th day of December, 1926, she received information of the action of the board of directors of the said Press-Telegram Publishing Company in taking money out of its treasury and paying it to and in behalf of said Press-Telegram Building Company; that then for the first time she had an investigation made of the books, accounts and affairs of said Press-Telegram Publishing Company."

[3] In analyzing this allegation we find nothing to show that the information leading to the discovery was not available to the appellant Roberts prior to the running of the statute. For aught that appears she was not prevented, as a director of the corporation, from making an examination of its books at all times. In this connection her averment of indifference towards the affairs of the corporation raises the inference of lack of diligence on the part of the appellant Roberts to avail herself of the information at her disposal. The degree of care required under such circumstances is succinctly stated in the case of People v. San Joaquin, etc., Association, 151 Cal. 797, at page 807, 91 P. 740, 745, which quotes from Truett v. Onderdonk, 120 Cal. 589, 53 P. 26, as follows: "It is not enough to assert merely that the discovery was not sooner made. It must appear that it could not have been made by the exercise of reasonable diligence. And that which reasonable diligence would have disclosed, plaintiff is presumed to have known; means of knowledge in such a case being the equivalent of the knowledge which it would have produced." We quote with approval the reason for the said rule from Consolidated R. & P. Co. v. Scarborough, supra, a case not dissimilar to the instant one, as follows: "Any other conclusion would permit a defrauded party, having at all times the means of knowledge at his disposal, to complain of such fraud long after the running of the period of limitations by the simple expedient of alleging that an investigation within three years of the commencement of suit uncovered the fraud. This would place a premium on dilatory tactics and would relieve a party of exercising that diligence required by the law."

[4] We are not unmindful of the fact that appellant also attempts to excuse an earlier discovery by alleging that defendants "kept secret and concealed" the true facts relating to the fraud during the interval following the execution of the agreement. It is the well-established rule, however, that in the absence of an allegation of affirmative acts in the nature of artifice to conceal the facts, a complaint is deficient in this respect. The rule has been expressed in the case of Phelps v. Grady, 168 Cal. 73, at page 78, 141 P. 926, 928, by quoting from Wood v. Carpenter, 101 U. S. 135, 25 L. Ed. 807, as follows: " * * * Concealment * * * must be the result of positive acts. * * * Concealment by mere silence is not enough. There must be some trick or contrivance intended to exclude suspicion and prevent inquiry."

The appellant Roberts further seeks to excuse a more timely discovery of the fraud by alleging that subsequent to the execution of the agreement she was engaged in other matters both within and without the state for protracted periods of time.

[5] The authorities cited in support of this allegation (Nichols v. Moore, 181 Cal. 131, 183 P. 531; Kane v. Cook, 8 Cal. 449) are apparently confined to instances where a plaintiff, fraudulently induced to purchase property from a distance, never had a reasonable opportunity to discover the fraud until subsequent to the period of limitation. The rule applicable to the factual situation presented by the instant case is expressed in the case of Phelps v. Grady, supra, at page 80 of 168 Cal., 141 P. 926, 928, as follows: "Says the Supreme Court of the United States [Brod-erick's Will, 21 Wall. 503, 22 L. Ed. 599]: 'Parties cannot thus, by seclusion from the means of information, claim exemption from the laws that control human affairs and set up a right to open up all the transactions of the past. The world must move on, and those who claim an interest in persons or things must be charged with knowledge of their status and condition, and of the vicissitudes to which they are subject.'"

[6] For these reasons we are of the opinion that appellants' cause of action is barred by the statute of limitations; and a consideration of other points raised by this appeal is deemed unnecessary.

The judgment is affirmed.

I concur: CONREY, P. J.

HOUSER, Justice.

I dissent. As nearly as I am able to determine the law, as attested by a host of precedent authorities emanating from the appellate tribunals of this state, the pleaded facts in the instant action make it "a borderline case." In such circumstances, I am unwilling to subscribe to a judgment by which, assuming the truthfulness of the facts alleged in the complaint, the defendants will be shielded in their asserted wrongdoing. If the pleading fairly shows that the plaintiffs actually have been defrauded by the defendants, and thus have been caused to suffer a financial loss, any doubtful question which arises on the construction of the statute, as to whether the action to recover such damages as appear to have been sustained was commenced within the time limited by the provisions of such statute, should be resolved in favor of the plaintiffs. As I read the authorities, they are to the effect that in circumstances such as are herein presented, the plaintiffs had no legal duty imposed upon them to make a discovery of the alleged facts at a date earlier than is shown by the allegations of the amended complaint discovery by plaintiffs actually occurred. Particularly am I moved to such conclusion by judicial language which appears peculiarly appropriate to the facts herein, contained in the opinion in the case of Tarke v. Bingham, 123 Cal. 163, 166, 55 P. 759, 760, as follows: "Where no duty is imposed by law upon a person to make inquiry, and where, under the circumstances, 'a prudent man' would not be put upon inquiry, the mere fact that means of knowledge are open to a plaintiff, and he has not availed himself of them, does not debar him from relief when thereafter he shall make actual discovery. The circumstances must be such that the inquiry becomes a duty, and the failure to make it a negligent omission. Bank of Mendocino v. Baker, 82 Cal. 114, 22 P. 1037 [6 L. R. A. 833]; Prouty v. Devin, 118 Cal. 258, 50 P. 380. In this case, though means of information were open to the plaintiff, it does not appear that there was any duty devolving upon him to make use of them. Nothing had occurred to excite his suspicion, or to put him upon inquiry, and for these reasons, under the facts of this case, we think the finding of the court sufficient and sufficiently supported by the evidence."

CUNNINGHAM v. REYNOLDS et al.
Civ. 4934.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

July 1, 1933.

Appeal and error ⇨460(2).

In claim and delivery action to recover sheep seized by defendant under Estray Law, plaintiff's appeal without stay bond stayed execution on judgment directing sheriff to sell sheep if sum determined as defendant's damages, costs, and expenses was not paid within 10 days (St. 1901, p. 603, as amended; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 942-945, 949).

Plaintiff's appeal without a stay bond stayed execution on the judgment since purpose of stay bond is to protect respondent, and as he had possession of the subject-matter of the action he was not in jeopardy of losing what he already had.

Action by E. L. Cunningham against J. C. Reynolds and another. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. On application for writ of supersedeas to stay further proceedings pending appeal.

Writ granted.

Hale McCowen, Jr., of Ukiah, for appellant.

H. G. Crawford, of Lakeport, for respondent.

Mr. Presiding Justice PULLEN delivered the opinion of the court.

Petitioner herein was the owner of certain sheep which strayed upon the lands of respondent. Acting under the Estray Law, respondent thereupon seized the sheep upon his lands and has held the same pending the payment of such damages, expenses and costs as may have been incurred. A few days after the sheep were taken up, petitioner tendered to respondent the sum of $35 as payment for the damages, expenses, and costs incurred, but respondent declined to accept that sum and refused to deliver up the sheep to petitioner, and proceeded to record and publish notice as required by law for the sale thereof under the Estray Law (see St. 1901, p. 603, as amended). Thereupon, petitioner as plaintiff filed an action against respondent in claim and delivery. Respondent answered, and upon the trial of the issues raised, judgment was entered in favor of respondent for the sum of $1,026.05, being the amount found by the court as damages, costs and expenses incurred by respondent, and further directing if the sum were not paid within ten days after the entry of judgment, the sheriff proceed to sell said sheep at public auction as provided by law.

Plaintiff, upon the entry of judgment, gave notice of appeal and in time the transcript was settled and allowed. Thereafter, upon motion, the trial judge entered an order authorizing and directing the clerk of the court to issue a writ of enforcement of the judgment requiring the sale of the sheep referred to in the judgment.

Thereupon, upon petition to this court for an order to show cause why a writ of supersedeas should not issue, and pending a hearing thereon, an order was made by this court staying further proceedings.

It is contended by respondent and so held by the trial court, that no bond having been posted by appellant, the execution on the judgment is not stayed. On the other hand, petitioner maintains that the proceedings are stayed by the appeal without the filing of any bond. Whether a stay bond is required is the question here for determination.

The judgment under consideration directs that if plaintiff shall pay to defendant or deposit in court the required amount, the sheep shall be returned to plaintiff. It is further ordered, however, that in case plaintiff fails to pay to defendant or deposit in court the specified amount, said sheep shall be sold.

To sections 942, 943, 944, 945, and 949, Code of Civil Procedure, we must look for the solution of this question. Section 942, Code of Civil Procedure, deals with a judgment directing the payment of money. That is not the situation here. Section 944 relates to a judgment directing execution of a conveyance, etc. Section 945 is concerned with real property. This case cannot fall within the provisions of section 949, Code of Civil Procedure, which relates to perishable property, for the court has not predicated its order upon the ground that the property is perishable. Zappettini v. Buckles, 167 Cal. 27, 138 P. 696. This leaves for consideration, section 943, Code of Civil Procedure, which deals with the assignment or delivery of documents or personal property and is the section upon which respondent relies. An examination, however, of that section does not seem to bear out the construction that respondent attempts to find in it. Section

943, Code of Civil Procedure, reads in part as follows:

"If the judgment or order appealed from direct the * * * delivery of * * * personal property, the execution of the judgment or order cannot be stayed by appeal, unless the things required to be * * * delivered be placed in the custody of such officer or receiver as the court may appoint, or unless an undertaking be entered into on the part of the appellant * * * to the effect that the appellant will obey the order of the appellate court upon the appeal."

It will be noted that the section is dealing with the converse of the situation here involved. If the appellant here were in possession of the personal property in litigation, then he would be required to deliver that property into the custody of the officer designated by the court or enter into an undertaking that he would obey the order of the appellate court upon appeal.

Here appellant is not in possession of any of the property in question, and could not on demand or otherwise, being out of possession, deliver the property to any one. The purpose of the undertaking is to protect the respondent, and here respondent, having possession of the subject of the suit, is not in jeopardy of losing what he already has and can comply with any order of the court, so the requirement of a bond is unnecessary.

Somewhat analogous is an appeal by a pledgor from a judgment foreclosing a pledge of personal property and directing a sale of the pledged property, which stays all proceedings on the judgment without the necessity of a stay bond. Rohrbacker v. Superior Court, 144 Cal. 631, 78 P. 22.

The conclusion must therefore be that the case before the court does not fall within the provisions of the sections cited and that the writ should issue.

It is so ordered.

Civ. 4838.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

July 8, 1933.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 6,
1933.

1. Appeal and error ⇨78(3), 870(5).

Order denying motion to file amended complaint is "interlocutory order," hence not appealable, but may be reviewed on appeal from judgment (Code Civ. Proc. § 963).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Interlocutory Order," see Words & Phrases.]

2. Appeal and error ⇨1201(1).

Refusal to permit filing of amended complaint in accordance with suggestion in appellate court's opinion reversing judgment of dismissal, where complaint and proposed amendment showed that cause of action could be stated, held error.

3. Appeal and error ⇨1201(1).

Suggestion, in opinion of appellate court reversing judgment of dismissal, that complaint be amended, if facts warranted, constituted direction to both court and counsel, so that good reason was required to justify trial court in refusing request to amend.

4. Pleading ⇨243.

Refusing leave to file amended complaint is proper where court can see that complaint cannot be amended to state cause of action.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lake County;
M. H. Iversen, Judge.

Action by Abbie F. Hurley against Lake County and others. From a judgment dismissing the action, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed and remanded with directions.

Francis L. Ashe, Wm. R. Lowery, and Sylvester Andriano, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Burt W. Busch, Dist. Atty., of Lakeport, and Charles Kasch, of Ukiah, for respondents.

Mr. Presiding Justice PULLEN delivered the opinion of the court.

Plaintiff filed a complaint to recover for personal injuries; to this complaint a demurrer was interposed and by the court overruled. Defendants answered and in due time the cause was set for trial. Plaintiff failed to appear at the time of trial and judgment of dismissal was entered. Upon appeal the judgment of dismissal was set aside (Hurley v. Lake County, 113 Cal. App. 291, 298 P. 123, 125) on the ground of the insufficiency of the notice of the trial. In its opinion the appellate court, in considering the complaint, said: "While the clerk's transcript shows that the demurrer to the plaintiff's complaint was overruled, it appears from the case which we have cited [Benton v. City of Santa Monica, 106 Cal. App. 339, 289 P. 203] that the complaint is manifestly insufficient and should be amended if the facts warrant such action."

Thereafter, and in accordance with the suggestion in the opinion, a notice of motion was presented by plaintiff for leave to file her first amended complaint. The motion was by the court denied.

After such denial of the motion, no judgment having been entered in favor of defendants upon the original complaint, and no order sustaining the demurrer theretofore interposed having been made, plaintiff served a memorandum to set the cause for trial upon the original complaint. An order was made by the trial court setting the case for trial and fixing September 6th as the date therefor. On September 5th, the clerk of the court received a telegram from Mary I. Ashe, as follows: "San Francisco Calif via postal telegraph, Sept. 4, 1932. F. Merritt, County Clerk, Lake Co., Lakeport, Calif. My husband attorney F. L. Ashe counsel for Miss Abbie Hurley in action Hurley versus Lake County coming on trial tomorrow Sept sixth 1932 has become suddenly ill and is confined to bed by doctors orders must have continuance of above action please advise, am sending copy of this request to F. Merritt County Clerk of Lake County. Mary I. Ashe."

Plaintiff failing to appear either personally or by counsel at the trial, the court upon motion of defendants, dismissed the action under subdivision 3 of section 581 of the Code of Civil Procedure. From this judgment of dismissal plaintiff appeals.

[1-4] The first point argued for reversal is that the court abused its discretion in denying the motion for leave to file an amended complaint, and, secondly, that the court erred in denying the request of plaintiff for a continuance and in entering judgment for defendants.

Let us consider first the objection that the court abused its discretion in denying the motion for leave to amend. An order denying a motion to file an amended complaint being an interlocutory order is not appealable (section 963, Code Civ. Proc.; Harper v. Hildreth, 99 Cal. 265, 33 P. 1103; Cornic v. Stewart, 179 Cal. 242, 176 P. 164), but may be reviewed on appeal from the judgment itself. We believe the court erred in refusing to permit plaintiff to file her amended complaint. The suggestion by the appellate court that the complaint be amended if the facts so warranted was a direction to both court and counsel. Good reason must exist to justify a court in refusing a request to so amend. When a court can see that a complaint cannot be amended as to state a cause of action, the refusal is proper. People v. Mt. Shasta Mfg. Co., 107 Cal. 256, 40 P. 391. But from the complaint and the amendments here proposed it appears that a cause of action can be stated.

Respondents point out many alleged shortcomings in the proposed amended complaint, but we do not deem it necessary at this time to pass upon those issues. At the proper time that will be a matter for the attention of the trial court. It is sufficient at this time to know that sufficient facts may be alleged to state a cause of action.

Respondents claim that appellant did not use due diligence in presenting her motion to amend. We cannot agree with counsel in this. No duty rested upon appellant to obtain the entry of an adverse judgment in order that she might appeal therefrom.

Inasmuch as the judgment must be reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial we will not discuss the point urged by appellant that the court abused its discretion in dismissing the action under section 581 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded with directions to the trial court to permit appellant if so advised, to file an amended complaint.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by J. J. Betzold against the Rossi Floral Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Ray W. Hays, of Fresno, for appellants.

Tarance S. Magee, of Fresno, for respondent.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

This is an action for damages for personal injuries received by the plaintiff in a slight collision between a motortruck operated by him and a delivery truck owned by the defendant corporation and operated by its employee, the individual defendant. The Rossi Floral Company conducts a floral shop in the business section of the city of Fresno. In the rear of its place of business there is a strip of private property which slopes slightly upward from the alley toward the building, upon which strip the company's delivery truck is habitually parked. On the occasion here in question the defendant Marsella started out to deliver some flowers and, releasing the brake, allowed the truck to roll backwards toward the alley. While it rolled only some six feet, when it arrived at a point either in the alley or about at the edge thereof, it collided with the plaintiff's truck. The collision was slight, causing no damage to either car, but the plaintiff's arm was caught between the two cars and rather seriously injured. The defendants have appealed from a judgment after a verdict in favor of the plaintiff.

It is first contended that "two separate and inconsistent causes of action were proved at the trial and it cannot be ascertained from the evidence upon which" theory the verdict was based. This contention is founded upon the fact that two witnesses gave conflicting versions of what occurred immediately prior to the happening of the accident. The respondent testified that he was driving north along the alley referred to at a speed of three or four miles an hour looking for a place to park; that, when his machine was about two car lengths away, he saw the appellants' car standing on the parking strip; that, when he arrived at a point nearly opposite that car, he saw it rolling backwards toward him at an increasing speed; that he turned his machine to the right, toward the approaching car, "because I figured the closer I could get, the least momentum it would have to back, to throw me over"; that he "hollered" at the top of his voice; that, when he saw he was "trapped," he reached over and turned off the switch on his car with the expectation of jumping out; that he put on his brakes and stopped his car; that in his excitement he tried to get out of his machine; and that "When I was—when I switched off here, I found out I was trapped, I moved with lightning speed to jump out before the machine would hit me. When I got here the machine was so close I only had about that much space to get out of there, and I accidentally—I just put my hands right out there. When I put them there it was done so quick in another instant my hand was caught here in the machine." However, another witness testified that the respondent drove up and stopped his car about four or five feet to the rear of the floral truck, and that he (the witness) went into an adjoining restaurant to make a delivery, and had returned before the floral truck moved backward and came in contact with the respondent's standing truck.

[1] The appellants maintain that two irreconcilable theories as to negligence upon their part thus appear, and that some of the jurors may have accepted one theory and some the other, and insist that this situation comes within the rule applied in the case of Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Bratcher, 99 Okl. 74, 225 P. 941. The rule referred to was invoked in that case because separate individuals were joined as defendants, one of whom might be liable on the theory of respondeat superior and the other on the theory of the last clear chance, while neither was liable for the negligence of the other. That rule has no application in this case, where the only theory involved was that the appellants, as master and servant, were liable for negligently operating a motor vehicle in such a manner as to cause the respondent's injuries. While there is a conflict in the evidence as to whether the respondent's truck was stopped immediately prior to the collision or whether it had been standing at the point where the collision occurred for a few moments, no conflicting theories appear, and the basis of liability on the part of the appellants is the same in either case. There is ample evidence of negligence on the part of the appellants, one of whom was the servant of the other.

It is next urged that the evidence discloses that the respondent was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. It is argued that it conclusively appears that the respondent could have avoided the accident by proceeding straight ahead or turning to his left, and that he was guilty of a series of negligent acts in turning to his right, in getting out on the right-hand side of his car, and in putting out his arm toward the rear of the floral truck. Appellants state that it is evident that "the plaintiff became unduly excited and lost his head and that these two factors, coupled with his subsequent conduct, were entirely responsible for the accident."

[2] The general rule which applies is thus stated in Carnahan v. Motor Transit Company, 65 Cal. App. 402, 224 P. 143, 146:

"A person suddenly confronted with an unexpected danger, without any fault on his part, is only required to use such means for avoiding the danger as would be used by a person of ordinary prudence, and he is not held to that strict accountability which would require that the course chosen be the most judicious one."

[3] There is ample evidence in the record that the respondent was without fault up to the time he observed the other car rolling toward him and only a few feet away. He was an elderly man, and there is considerable evidence to indicate that, when he saw this car bearing down upon him, he was badly frightened, that he feared his car would be tipped over and he would be cut by various glass containers with which his car was loaded, and that he made a hurried and frantic attempt to get out of the car. Viewing all of the evidence in the light most favorable to the respondent, it cannot be said, as a matter of law, that he must be held responsible for having taken the wrong course in the emergency that presented itself. While the appellants' car moved only a few feet, its rate of speed and the suddenness of its movement may have been important factors, and the entire circumstances are such as to make the question of contributory negligence peculiarly one of fact rather than one of law.

[4] The next point raised is that the court erred in refusing an instruction offered by the appellants defining contributory negligence, and that no instruction explaining the meaning of that term was given. The court gave instructions containing full and complete definitions of negligence and of proximate cause, and also gave the following instructions:

"You are instructed that if you find the injuries received by the plaintiff, J. J. Betzold, were caused proximately by the negligence and carelessness of Charlie Marsella in driving the defendant, Rossi Floral Company's truck, while the said Charlie Marsella was acting in the scope of his employment, your verdict must be for the plaintiff and against the defendants unless you find that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence which itself was a proximate and contributing cause of the accident."

"The defendants have alleged that the plaintiff is guilty of contributory negligence which was the proximate cause of this accident; you are instructed that the burden of proving this contributory negligence is upon the defendants and the defendants must prove such negligence by a preponderance of the evidence."

"I instruct you that if you find from the evidence that the said plaintiff could by the exercise of ordinary care have avoided this accident, either by slowing down, stopping, or exercising that degree of care which an ordinary prudent person would have under ordinary circumstances, and that he failed to avail himself of this opportunity or did not use that degree of care and such omission, if any, upon his part proximately contributed to this accident, you are in duty bound to return a verdict in favor of the defendants.

"The mere fact that an act or omission on the part of the defendants, if any, contributed to this accident is not, in itself, sufficient to support a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. To render a verdict in favor of the plaintiff you must find that the defendants were guilty of negligence, and that such negligence was the proximate cause of the accident, and further that J. J. Betzold was without any fault that in the slightest degree contributed to this accident; otherwise your verdict must be for the defendants."

We think these instructions conveyed the requisite information to the jury as fully and completely as the more technical instructions offered by the appellants would have done.

[5] The last point urged is that the amount of the verdict, $3,000, is excessive. This contention is based, not upon the fact that the respondent's injuries were not serious and permanent, but upon the claim that the respondent, by his own actions, aggravated the original injury. It is stated that immediately after the accident the respondent was taken to the office of a physician; that, instead of arranging to have his arm set and treated, he became involved in an argument with this doctor and left; that, after searching for another doctor, he finally reached the county hospital, where his injuries were attended to and the bones in his arm set; and that, thereafter, he went from one doctor to another until it was ultimately found that the original broken bones had not been properly set. Another doctor testified that the respondent came to him; that he was suffering from a badly comminuted fracture of both bones of the right forearm; that it was a surgical case requiring hospitalization; that he was without sufficient funds; and that he advised him to go to the county hospital. There is no evidence that the respondent did not use ordinary care in the selection of a physician (Boa v. S. F.-Oakland T. Rys., 182 Cal. 93, 187 P. 2), and our attention is directed to no evidence that sustains the contention here made.

[6] During the oral argument of this case, complaint was made of the refusal of the court to give another requested instruction. This point was neither set forth in the original statement of the questions involved on this appeal nor referred to in either of the briefs filed by the appellants, and the same need not be here considered. Witter v. Bank of Milpitas, 204 Cal. 570, 269 P. 614. Without going into detail, we may add that any possible error in the matter referred to was, in our opinion, not prejudicial.

The judgment is affirmed.

Civ. 7671.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,

Division 1, California.

July 8, 1933.

1. Action ⇨63.

"Laches" is available as defense only where, in addition to lapse of time, prejudice to defendant or another appears, or lapse is such that prejudice will be presumed if remedy should be allowed.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Laches," see Words & Phrases.]

2. Trespass ⇨35.

Action for damages for unauthorized use of residence lot for storage purposes despite protests of owners held not barred by laches, though use continued for several years.

3. Trespass ⇨46(1).

Unauthorized use of residence lot for storage purposes during several years, despite protests of owners, held sufficient to show prima facie cause of action in trespass.

4. Trespass ⇨46(3).

Evidence that use of residence lot for storage purposes despite owners' protests had deprived owners of use of lot held sufficient to show that owners had been damaged by such use.

5. Trial ⇨165.

For purpose of deciding motion for nonsuit, court must assume that all relevant evidence favorable to plaintiff is true.

6. Licenses ⇨43.

Where license of owners is relied on as defense to action in trespass, license implies assent of licensors.

7. Trespass ⇨50.

That lot used for storage purposes despite owners' protests was residence lot held not to prevent recovery of damages for such use.

8. Trespass ⇨67.

Where evidence concerned unauthorized use of entire lot as well as of parts of it, and showed reasonable rental value of lot as whole, question of damages was for trial court.

9. Limitation of actions ⇨55(6).

Recovery may be had for period not exceeding statutory period for continuing trespass, since statute does not begin to run from date of original entry.

10. Trespass ⇨46(3).

Evidence supported judgment of $500 for unauthorized use of residence lot for storage purposes for nearly three years.

11. Trespass ⇨50.

Measure of damages in case of trespass is reasonable rental value of premises.

12. Appeal and error ⇨782.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Thomas H. Selvaage, Judge.

Action by Charles O. Lindberg and another against George Linder and another. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Max Lewis, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Albert & Brown, of Long Beach, and Leon B. Brown, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

DESMOND, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiffs were awarded judgment in the sum of $500 by reason of defendants storing lumber, machinery, and rubbish upon a lot which plaintiffs owned in San Pedro. Defendants appeal, specifying as error the trial court's refusal to grant a motion for a nonsuit and also its refusal to grant a new trial. The case comes before us on a bill of exceptions, from which it appears that defendants early in 1923 began to use the real property of the plaintiffs, a lot 150 feet by 74 feet on Seventh street, one of the principal thoroughfares of San Pedro, for the purpose of placing a variety of materials upon it. This lot was in close proximity to another lot used, with the permission of its owner, by the defendants for the same purpose. The two lots were separated by a street which was not improved, and so was not apparent. One of the witnesses produced by plaintiffs testified that he had bought a load of lumber from the defendants, and that it was delivered to him from the plaintiff's lot where a carload of it was stored. There was a denial by the defendants that they had used the plaintiffs' lot without permission; it being contended that such use as was made of the lot was with the consent and knowledge of the plaintiffs, before this suit was started in 1929. There was testimony however that plaintiffs had requested defendants, one or the other, occasionally to clear the land. It may be noted also that at one point Mrs. Linder, one of the defendants, testified that she had at no time received permission to use plaintiffs' land. A witness for plaintiffs testified also that Mrs. Linder admitted to him that plaintiff C. O. Lindberg had requested her several times to remove the materials from his lot. A realtor called as witness by defendants testified that plaintiffs' property was zoned for residential purposes, and that it had no value for industrial purposes. He did not testify as to the fair rental value of the land, if any, for residential purposes, but did say that a lot across the street from plaintiffs' property 50 feet by 125 feet on Seventh street, which is in an industrial zone, had a rental value of $120 per year. It will be noted that, while plaintiffs' property is only 74 feet deep, it has a frontage on Seventh street three times as long as the other lot just mentioned. A realtor produced by plaintiffs testified that the reasonable rental value of the Lindberg lot from 1923 to 1929 was from $25 to $30 per month. There was conflicting testimony as to what portion of plaintiffs' lot was used by defendants, one of plaintiffs' witnesses describing it as an area 100 feet square, Mrs. Linder, on the other hand, stating that only the extreme end of the lot was used. George Lindberg, one of the plaintiffs, testified that they had been deprived of the use of their lot by the use which defendants made of it.

Defendants' motion for nonsuit rested upon the following grounds: First, laches; second, failure of the evidence to prove a prima facie cause of trespass; third, no evidence to prove plaintiffs had been damaged; fourth, implied license established by the evidence; fifth, no damage could be shown to have resulted from the use for industrial purposes, the property being zoned for residences; sixth, no evidence showing what portion of the land was used, no testimony as to the reasonable rental value of 100 feet square.

[1, 2] Commenting on these contentions in order, we note, as to the first, occasional requests for clearing the premises and admittedly friendly relations continuing between the parties until the plaintiffs finally took affirmative action to assert their rights. The defense of laches is available only where, in addition to a mere lapse of time, there appear circumstances from which the defendant or some other person may be prejudiced, or there must be such lapse of time that it may reasonably be supposed that such prejudice will occur if the remedy is allowed. 10 Cal. Jur. pp. 522, 524, and cases cited. No such circumstances appear in this case.

[3] As to the second contention, namely, that the evidence produced by plaintiffs was insufficient to prove a prima facie cause of action in trespass, we believe this position is untenable, in view of the repeated objections made by the plaintiffs to the use of their land in a residential zone for the purpose of placing thereon steam rollers, cement mixers, junk, and other unsightly objects. Certainly, in view of the testimony of the defendants themselves, as well as of several witnesses for the plaintiffs, this use was not permissive or ex contractu but tortious, and clearly constituted a continuing trespass upon the real estate of the plaintiffs. See Hathway v. Ryan, 35 Cal. 188.

[4, 5] As to the third ground, that no evidence was introduced nor was any attempt made to prove that the plaintiffs had been in any way damaged by the defendants' use of the property it appears from the bill of exceptions that one of the plaintiffs testified that by reason of the use which defendants made of the premises he was deprived of the same, and for the purpose of deciding a motion for a nonsuit the court must assume that all the evidence in favor of the plaintiffs, if relevant, is true. 9 Cal. Jur. p. 551.

[6] The fourth ground upon which the motion for a nonsuit was based, namely, that the evidence showed that the defendants had an implied license to the use of plaintiffs' land, is not touched upon in appellants' brief. We shall dispose of it here by saying that in the case of express or implied license the assent of the licensor is essential (16 Cal. Jur. 278), and there is no assent indicated in the evidence reported in this bill of exceptions.

[7] The fifth ground relied upon in the motion for a nonsuit was that the plaintiffs' lot is located in a residential district, and "therefore no damages could be shown to have been suffered by the plaintiffs by reason of the use and occupation of said land by the defendants." No argument is advanced to support this contention, and we cannot think of any that would have that effect.

[8] With the first contention in the sixth ground, namely, "that there was no evidence showing what portion of said land was wrongfully used by the defendants," we do not agree in view of the testimony reported in the bill of exceptions. As to the remaining contention, "that the testimony of plaintiffs' witnesses only went to the reasonable rental value of the entire lot and there was no testimony whatsoever as to what the reasonable rental of a one hundred foot square of said lot was," we refer again to the testimony that defendants' use of this lot deprived plaintiffs of the use of it, and reproduce here the testimony of plaintiffs' witness Peterson as it appears in the bill of exceptions: "I have seen the plaintiffs' lot many times in the last few years, probably as often as once a week on the average, and at all times noticed more or less rubbish, materials and equipment on the same. Said materials and equipment often covered a large part of the lot." It may be that the trial court made its award for use of practically all of plaintiffs' lot or possibly for use of part only. From the foregoing, we conclude that the trial court committed no error in denying the motion for nonsuit.

[9] Appellants assume in their brief that judgment in this case was based upon an action for use and occupation and question the propriety of applying the reasonable rental rule of admeasuring damages set up in such an action by section 3334 of the Civil Code, which section also fixes the period for which recovery may be had at five years. The exact ground of the objection is not made clear, but our attention is called to language of the bill of exceptions reading as follows: "Opening statement was made by counsel for plaintiff to the effect that this action is brought for the purpose of obtaining damages sustained by reason of the trespass upon the property of plaintiffs, as described in the complaint." (Italics ours.) Possibly appellants' position is that by subscribing to such statement respondents have precluded themselves from recovering a judgment in any amount because the statute of limitations bars an action for trespass after three years, and the testimony in this case showed user extending over a period of more than six years. This position is not tenable, however, for, if there were a trespass here, it was a continuing trespass, and in such case the statute does not begin to run from the date of original entry, but recovery may be had for a period of time not exceeding the statutory period immediately preceding filing of the action. See comment on this subject in 25 Cyc. 1138, quoted in Kafka v. Bozio, 191 Cal. 746, 751, 752, 218 P. 753, 29 A. L. R. 833.

If the opening statement above quoted bound the respondents to a cause based on trespass, then we must consider the evidence as applicable to a period of three years prior to the date upon which suit was filed, August 15, 1929. Testimony was to the effect that appellants used plaintiffs' lot until July 1, 1929. Recovery then might be had for actual use over a period of 2 years 10½ months. Evidence as to reasonable rental value of this lot and of the lot across the street ran from $10 to $30 per month, and there was testimony that plaintiffs had demanded $15 per month for the use of their lot.

[10, 11] If the learned trial judge adopted the last-mentioned figure as a proper measure of value, his finding of $500 as damages can give no just cause of complaint on an arithmetical basis, at least so far as appellants are concerned. That a reasonable rental value affords a proper measure of damages in a case of trespass appears in Salmond on Torts (7th Ed. 1928), p. 246: "When a trespass consists in some beneficial use wrongfully made of the plaintiff's land even if it causes no damage, the plaintiff is entitled to claim by way of damages a reasonable remuneration for the use as if it had been under agreement. * * * The same principle applies to the unlawful use of a way over another's land; even though no harm has been done to the land, a reasonable rent for such a way may be recovered as damages." See, also, Tome Institute v. Crothers, 87 Md. 569, 40 A. 261, 267, and 38 Cyc. 1129.

[12] Since in a civil action no appeal lies from an order by which a motion for a new trial is denied, the purported appeal from such order made in this case is dismissed. Having reviewed all the evidence reported in this bill of exceptions, we see no reason to disturb the findings of the trial court.

Judgment is affirmed.

Appeal by administrator with the will annexed from decree of partial distribution.

Mary Johnson died testate March 12, 1922. Probate proceedings were held in abeyance for some ten years awaiting the termination of litigation growing out of the probate of the estate of her deceased husband. The last will and testament of said Mary Johnson bequeathed to petitioners and respondents here, in respective proportions, the sum of $6,000. On December 12, 1931, an inventory and appraisal was made showing that the entire property of the estate consisted of $1,319.23 in money, household furniture valued at $500, and 80 shares of capital stock of Oulton Land Company, valued at $150 per share ($12,000)—a total of $13,819.23. Said stock was not listed on any exchange, and could not readily be sold. In February, 1931, respondent cash legatees, and appellant administrator had executed a written agreement whereby, in consideration of said administrator waiving his right to appeal from the decree of distribution entered in the matter of the above-mentioned estate of the deceased husband of this decedent Mary Johnson, said respondent cash legatees agreed to accept in compromise and in lieu of their said $6,000 cash legacies 36 shares of said stock to be divided among them in respective proportions. Pursuant to this agreement, respondents, on December 29, 1931, duly filed their petition for such partial distribution, alleging that the estate was but little indebted, and that the 36 respective shares of stock might be allowed to them without loss to the creditors or injury to the estate or to any person interested therein.

When the matter was called for hearing, respondents introduced in evidence all the papers, pleadings, and files in the matter of said estate, including the above-mentioned inventory and appraisal, and also an order for allowance to one Daniel A. Ryan of the sum of $2,500 on account of extraordinary services rendered by him to the administrator, plus $375.60 for expenses incurred. Counsel for appellant administrator opposed the granting of the petition for partial distribution, stating that the estate was indebted to the extent of $2,600 for fees and expenses of administration and $1,500 for other debts. Counsel for respondents, in opposition to this statement, introduced the register of actions in said matter, containing all the papers and documents filed therein, and informed the court that there were no claims on file against the estate other than the said claim for extraordinary counsel fees.

The transcript before us then shows that appellant administrator offered no evidence whatsoever. In other words, he utterly failed to offer any proof to substantiate his statements with respect to the indebtedness of the estate. The court thereupon, and on February 3, 1932, made and entered its decree of partial distribution as prayed, ordering the aforesaid respective distribution of 36 shares of said stock to respondents.

In prosecuting this appeal from said order of partial distribution, appellant administrator asserts: First, that the court erred in not requiring evidence upon the matters alleged in the petition for distribution and in not requiring a bond from the distributees, and lastly that the record fails to show that a report of the inheritance tax appraiser was on file and there was no evidence that no inheritance tax was due or payable.

[1-4] The petition is verified. The records and files of the estate were introduced, and included the inventory and appraisal. In the absence of a contest, this furnishes support for the allegations of the petition. In fact, the terms of the written agreement for the division and distribution of the estate furnish additional proof. The question of a bond on partial distribution, under the facts here, was one of discretion, and we see no showing of an abuse thereof. The existence of an inheritance tax against the legacies of the distributees is negated by the finding that the distribution can be made without injury to any one interested in the estate. Besides, the administrator could have asked for an order directing retention from the property to be distributed of enough thereof to meet this anticipated charge. Estate of Ross, 187

Cal. 466, 202 P. 641; Estate of Hill, 94 Cal. App. 114, 270 P. 708. Furthermore, if the facts justify it, the administrator may now ask for a modification of the decree to care for this item, if it exists. The fact is that in his reply brief appellant abandons this claim and rests his objection upon the claim that the assets remaining are now insufficient to pay the debts and expenses of administration. But, as already pointed out, no proof to this effect was even attempted by him at the hearing.

The decree is affirmed.

PER CURIAM.

In denying the petition for a transfer of this cause to this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal [22 P.(2d) 597] we withhold approval of that portion of the opinion which declares that the revocation of the permit automatically released the impounded stock. However, under the facts and findings recited by the District Court of Appeal, there can be no doubt but that the plaintiff was equally intent with defendants in his determination to obtain the stock without regard to and in defiance of the order impounding the stock. Hence the doctrine of Domenigoni v. Imperial Live Stock & Mortgage Co., 189 Cal. 467, 209 P. 36, concludes the argument of petitioner here.

CURTIS, Justice.

This action was instituted for the purpose of recovering the possession of a Lincoln automobile.

Plaintiff, at the commencement of said action, and for a long time prior thereto, was the owner of said automobile. During all the time herein mentioned E. L. Butler was the agent of the defendant Parisian Motors, Inc. (a corporation), as a salesman, under an agreement with said corporation that he was to receive one-half of the profits on all automobiles sold by him for said corporation. The Parisian Motors, Inc., had the agency for the Hispano Suiza automobile. The defendant H. Lew Zuckerman was the secretary-treasurer of said corporation. He has no personal interest in this action. The same may be said concerning the other defendants in said action, with the exception of the Parisian Motors, Inc. The plaintiff and the Parisian Motors, Inc., are therefore the only parties in interest herein, and when we refer to defendant or appellant we mean the Parisian Motors, Inc. As the agent and salesman of the Parisian Motors, Inc., Butler apparently approached the plaintiff in an endeavor to sell to her an Hispano Suiza car. At least, in January, 1929, Butler came to Zuckerman, at the office of the corporation, and stated that he had a good prospect to sell one of the Hispano Suiza automobiles, and that it would be necessary, in order to make said sale, for him to buy a Lincoln car that belonged to the daughter of the proposed purchaser, and that he might need $500 to close the deal. Zuckerman gave Butler two checks for $250 each, to be used on the purchase of said Lincoln car. A few days later Zuckerman gave Butler $100 and finally another $100, for the same purpose for which he had given him the $500. In the meantime Butler had the Lincoln car in his possession, evidently endeavoring to sell it for the plaintiff. On February 15th Butler wanted more money from Zuckerman, and offered to give the Lincoln car as security for the money advanced to him by Zuckerman and for any future loans or advancements. Zuckerman declined to loan Butler any more money unless the Lincoln car was turned over to him, together with the "pink slip" or certificate of ownership. At some time, whether before or at the time Zuckerman demanded the "pink slip," Butler represented to the plaintiff that he had sold the Lincoln car and required the "pink slip" to consummate the sale. Plaintiff accordingly indorsed and delivered to him the "pink slip." Butler then delivered to Zuckerman the possession of the Lincoln car and the "pink slip." Zuckerman gave to Butler an additional sum of $200, and agreed to advance to him further amounts, not exceeding the sum of $1,500, on the automobile. Zuckerman put the Lincoln car in his garage overnight, and a few days thereafter, possibly the next day, returned the car to Butler for the purpose of enabling the latter to sell it. Zuckerman made additional advancements to Butler; the total amount of money so advanced being $1,131. On March 22, 1929, while Butler was driving the Lincoln car, he met with an accident which caused his death. Zuckerman thereupon took possession of the car, and later, on demand of the plaintiff, refused to deliver it to her. Hence this action. The trial court rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the possession of the car, and the defendants have appealed under the alternative method provided by section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

As a ground for reversal of the judgment, appellant contends that the respondent was estopped from asserting any claim to said car prior or superior to that of the Parisian Motors, Inc. This contention is based upon the fact that the respondent had parted with the "pink slip," or indicia of ownership, together with the possession of the car, and, as against an innocent purchaser or pledgee, she was estopped from asserting her ownership of said car. In support of this contention, appellant relies upon the case of Rapp v. Fred W. Hauger Motors Co., 77 Cal. App. 417, 246 P. 1067, which holds that an owner of an automobile who has clothed another with the indicia of ownership of his automobile is estopped, as against an innocent purchaser or incumbrancer thereof, from asserting his ownership or right of possession to said automobile. The principle enunciated in that case would apply to the instant case if the Parisian Motors, Inc., at the time it acquired possession of said automobile, was an innocent incumbrancer thereof.

[1-4] The trial court made no specific finding as to whether the appellant was or was not an innocent incumbrancer of the Lincoln car at the time it acquired possession thereof. It made, however, a general finding that the plaintiff was at the time of the commencement of said action, and at all times thereafter, the owner of, and entitled to the immediate possession of, said car. This finding must be accepted as at least an implied finding that appellant did not acquire possession of said car without notice, either actual or imputed, of the plaintiff's ownership thereof. There is evidence in the record that might warrant the conclusion that the appellant through its secretary-treasurer, Zuckerman, had actual notice of respondent's ownership of said car, or at least had sufficient knowledge of facts to put it on inquiry as to Butler's claim of ownership. Zuckerman testified that Butler first came to him and told him that he had a good prospect to sell a Hispano Suiza car, provided he could buy the Lincoln car. Later he said that Butler told him he had purchased the car, and still later Butler asked for a loan to close the deal, and Zuckerman advanced money for that purpose, and later, when Butler asked for an additional loan, Zuckerman demanded the certificate of ownership and possession of the car as security. This additional loan was made upon the conditions imposed by Zuckerman. Zuckerman also testified that Butler told him that he must sell the Lincoln car in order to make the deal for the Hispano Suiza car. Why was it necessary for Butler, if he had purchased the Lincoln car from the respondent, to sell it in order that the respondent might purchase a Hispano Suiza car from the appellant? The only reasonable inference to be drawn from this testimony was that the respondent still owned the Lincoln car, or at least had a substantial interest therein. If the trial court from this evidence drew the conclusion that appellant was put on notice that Butler was not the real owner of said car, we think it was warranted in arriving at such conclusion, and we feel bound by its determination of that matter. We think any reasonably prudent person, acting in entire good faith, with this knowledge in his possession, would have made inquiry of the true owner (whose name and address were on the certificate of ownership) before accepting the car as security for money loaned. But, even if the appellant had not actual knowledge sufficient to put it upon inquiry as to the true ownership of the Lincoln car, yet Butler had knowledge of all of the facts, and knew that the respondent had never parted with her ownership of the Lincoln car. Butler was the agent of the appellant in the sale of Hispano Suiza cars, and as such agent gained possession of the Lincoln car for the purpose of negotiating a sale of a Hispano Suiza car. The evidence does not definitely define the scope of Butler's authority, but it is undisputed that the knowledge gained by him was acquired while he was acting for appellant and in an endeavor to carry out the purpose of his employment. Under these circumstances, we think the knowledge of Butler must be imputed to his principal, the Parisian Motors, Inc. "As against a principal, both principal and agent are deemed to have notice of whatever either has notice of, and ought, in good faith and the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, to communicate to the other." Civ. Code, § 2332. This is a familiar and well-established principle, and has been frequently expressly followed by this court. Christie v. Sherwood, 113 Cal. 526, 530, 45 P. 820; McKenney v. Ellsworth, 165 Cal. 326, 329, 132 P. 75, 76; 12 Cal. Jur., p. 775. In the case of McKenney v. Ellsworth, supra, the rule was applied even when the agent was dealing with his principal in a transaction in his own behalf. In that case the court said: "Where an agent of a corporation is dealing with the corporation in a transaction in his own behalf, it will not be presumed that he will communicate to his principal facts affecting the transaction. [Citing authorities.] This is no doubt the general rule regarding the imputing to a principal of notice of facts known to an agent who is, in the particular transaction in question, acting in an interest adverse to that of his principal. But the rule is not without exceptions. If the agent is in fact acting for his principal in the transaction, even though he may have an opposing personal interest, 'it is his duty, notwithstanding his interest, to communicate to his company (principal) any facts in his possession, material to the transaction, and the law will therefore presume, in favor of third persons, that he made such communication.'" The appellant, the Parisian Motors, Inc., having either actual or imputed knowledge, or both, of respondent's rights in said Lincoln was not an innocent incumbrancer thereof. The rule therefore announced in Rapp v. Fred W. Hauger Motors Co., supra, does not govern this case, nor has it any applicability to the actual facts thereof.

There are other questions raised by respondent in support of the judgment, but, inasmuch as we are of the opinion that the appeal is without merit for the reasons hereinbefore stated, it is not necessary to discuss these further questions.

The judgment is affirmed.

PER CURIAM.

A hearing was granted in this case after decision by the District Court of Appeal, Third Appellate District, and upon further consideration of the cause we adopt part of the opinion of Mr. Presiding Justice Preston, reading as follows:

The Security-First National Bank of Los Angeles, having succeeded to all the rights and authority of the Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank and the Pacific-Southwest Trust & Savings Bank, was substituted as plaintiff in this action.

Plaintiff brought this action to foreclose a mortgage or deed of trust executed by defendant J. G. Ruddle Properties, Inc., to secure $300,000 in bonds.

Plaintiff was named as trustee in said instrument, and judgment was rendered in its favor as said trustee for the sum of $466,580.97, foreclosing the said mortgage and ordering the property described therein to be sold and the proceeds applied to the payment of said sum.

The judgment further provided that defendant Hunter, Dulin & Co. has a lien on said property, subject to plaintiff's mortgages, for $26,338.17, that defendant Carl E. Wagner has a lien on said property, subject to the lien of plaintiff and to the lien of Hunter, Dulin & Co., for $33,283.01; and that defendant T. H. Carlon has a lien on said property, subject to the lien of plaintiff and the liens of Hunter, Dulin & Co., and Wagner, for $29,163.55.

From this judgment defendants Ruddle Properties, Inc., Carlon, Lemas, Pareira, Bettencourt, Silva, Petta, and Wagner have appealed.

This mortgage or deed of trust was given to secure the payment of bonds to the amount of $300,000, 275 of said bonds being of the denomination of $1,000 each and 50 of said bonds being of the denomination of $500 each. Permit from the Corporation Commission was obtained for the sale of said bonds amounting to the sum of $225,000, but no permit was secured for the sale of the bonds amounting to the sum of $75,000.

The court found that all of said bonds were sold by appellant J. G. Ruddle Properties, Inc., to bona fide purchasers for value in good faith, before maturity, without notice of any defect or infirmity in said bonds, or any of them. The Hunter, Dulin Company acted as agent for J. G. Ruddle Properties, Inc., in negotiating the sale of said bonds.

The principal contention of appellants is that the mortgage or deed of trust was altered, in material respects, after its execution, without the knowledge or consent of appellant Ruddle Properties, Inc.

Allan Ruddle, a witness for appellants, testified that he was the vice president of Ruddle Properties, Inc., at the time the mortgage or deed of trust was executed. The original mortgage or deed of trust, together with a copy, were handed to witness by Hugh Landram, the attorney for Ruddle Properties, Inc. He took them home, and the next day, August 10, 1922, he, his father, since deceased, and his brother, Garland Ruddle, then secretary of said company, carefully read the said document and the two documents were identical. Witness testified that there were pencil alterations in both the original instruments and in the copy, and that the alterations were the same in each; that he retained possession of said documents until August 14, 1922, when he and his father and brother went to Merced, and in the office of their attorney, Landram, the original was signed and acknowledged; that at that time the pencil interlineations were still on the original after its execution; that Phil Brooks, the agent of Hunter, Dulin & Co., came to the home of witness on August 15, 1922, and brought the bonds which were signed by his father and brother and were delivered to said Brooks together with the mortgage or deed of trust; that Brooks said that, when he got back to Los Angeles, he would write in ink the pencil notations contained in the original; this witness also testified that there was a good deal of hurry and rush among the attorneys in order to get the papers in shape for the bond issue; that all papers regarding this matter were prepared in Los Angeles and sent up from there. The testimony of Garland Ruddle on behalf of appellants was substantially the same as that of Allan Ruddle.

An examination of the copy of the mortgage or deed of trust returned by Allan Ruddle, and which appellants introduced in evidence as their Exhibit No. 7, shows about thirty interlineations in pencil, whereas the original mortgage or deed of trust executed on August 14, 1922, shows none (being Plaintiff's Exhibit 1).

H. K. Landram, a witness for respondent, testified that he was the attorney who represented J. G. Ruddle Properties, Inc., in the matter of their bond issue of $300,000; that the deed of trust securing same was executed in his office in Merced and in his presence, and was acknowledged before him as a notary public; that the said instrument did not when so executed contain any pencil notations, nor did it have any of the pencil notations that appear on Appellants' Exhibit No. 7. He stated on cross-examination that he could not say whether or not he read the deed of trust before it was executed. He had been instructed by Mr. North of the firm of Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher to be extremely careful that everything was done just right, and, while he could not say that the deed of trust produced in evidence by respondent was in the identical condition that the instrument was in when it was executed and acknowledged in his presence, he reiterated the statement that there was no pencil writing on that instrument at the time it was executed. R. L. North, a witness for respondent, testified that he was an attorney, and was associated with Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher of Los Angeles; that he had charge of legal matters connected with the bond issue of Ruddle Properties, Inc., and that he prepared the trust deed and other documents pertaining to the bond issue; that Landram was the attorney for said company, and that witness sent him the various documents relating to the transaction; that he sent Landram the deed of trust that was executed by the Ruddle Properties, Inc.; that Appellants' Exhibit No. 7 was an early draft of the proposed deed of trust; but that the deed of trust that he sent Landram for execution by the Ruddle Company was a completed instrument, and that the deed of trust is now in the same form it was when it was sent to Landram for execution; that the only writing with pen and ink that appears on the deed of trust is the filling in of certain dates which were placed there by witness before he sent it to Landram for execution; that a copy of this instrument was sent to the corporation commissioner a few days after its execution.

An inspection of Respondent's Exhibit No. 1, which is the deed of trust executed by the Ruddle Company, shows no pencil marks nor writings with pen and ink except the aforesaid dates.

One of the changes which appellant claims to have been made after its execution was that the deed of trust covers after-acquired property. On August 4, 1922, and again on August 11th following, resolutions were passed by the board of directors of the Ruddle Company authorizing the insertion of this clause in the deed of trust, and these resolutions were prepared by North.

Allan Ruddle testified that he discovered that changes had been made in the deed of trust in 1928; that at the last-named date he found a letter written by Brooks to Landram dated August 17, 1922, in which Brooks requested Landram to send his copy of the trust deed to him in order that he might substitute corrected pages which were made in the original, and that, upon such substitution being made, he would return it to Landram for his files. Landram made no reply to this letter. He further testified that he had a certified copy of this deed of trust made in 1924 for the purpose of securing a loan or for use in selling some of said stock.

[1, 2] The trial court found that the mortgage or deed of trust was not altered in any respect after its execution on August 14, 1924. We are of the opinion that this finding is supported by substantial evidence, and, such being the case, this finding is binding upon this court.

[3] Appellants next contend that the bonds amounting to $75,000 having been issued without the permission of the corporation commissioner are void. Supporting this contention he cites section 12 of the Corporate Securities Act of Statutes of 1917, p. 679, which provides "every security issued by any company, without a permit of the commissioner authorizing the same then in effect, shall be void."

The $75,000 worth of bonds for which no permit was issued were all issued and sold by appellant Ruddle Company in 1923 and 1924 for value. None of them matured until 1926. While there is no direct evidence that the holders of these bonds took them without notice that a permit for their issuance had not been given by the corporation commissioner, yet the inference is that they took them in the usual course of trade without such notice.

In the case of Goodale v. Thorn, 199 Cal. 307, 249 P. 11, 12, the court said: "Upon proof by the defendant of fraud or illegality in the inception of the note, the burden is cast upon the indorsee to show that he is an innocent holder. This the latter may do by showing that he purchased the note before maturity, or from an innocent indorsee for value, in the usual course of business. When this is done, unless the evidence shows that the note was taken by the plaintiff under circumstances creating the presumption that he knew the facts impeaching its validity, the burden is cast upon the defendant to show, if he would defeat the plaintiff in his action, that the latter took the instrument with notice of the defendant's equities. Eames v. Crosier, 101 Cal. 260, 35 P. 873. To the same effect are the cases of Sinkler v. Siljan, 136 Cal. 356, 68 P. 1024; Bell v. Pleasant, 145 Cal. 410, 78 P. 957 [104 Am. St. Rep. 61]; Blochman Commercial Bank v. Moretti, 177 Cal. 256, 170 P. 419."

The trustee in this case, the respondent, is merely a nominal party in this action; the real parties in interest are the owners and holders of the bonds. In the recent case of Eberhard v. Pacific Southwest Loan & Mortgage Corporation (Cal. Sup.) 9 P.(2d) 302, 303, after stating that there was nothing whatever to show that plaintiffs were anything more than innocent victims of appellant, which was now seeking to profit by its own deliberate wrong, the court said: "The inhibitions of the Corporate Securities Act * * * against sales of securities to the public without permits are meant to protect the public from imposition and deception—not primarily to benefit the seller. The seller and the purchaser are therefore in no sense in pari delicto where this provision is violated. The fact that the transaction may be void at the behest of the purchaser is not to allow a premium for real wrong done by the seller. The fundamental maxim that 'no one can take advantage of his own wrong' (section 3517, Civ. Code), and other kindred principles, immediately recur to the mind. The above is but a recast of the doctrine abundantly supported by authority and applied in cases involving this very act done under similar circumstances. See Pollak v. Staunton, 210 Cal. 656, 293 P. 26; Michell v. Grass Valley Gold Mines Co., 206 Cal. 603, 275 P. 418; Tattersson v. Kehrlein, 88 Cal. App. 34, 263 P. 285, and Castle v. Acme Ice Cream Co., 101 Cal. App. 94, 281 P. 396; Hemneon v. Amalgamated, etc., Co., 95 Cal. App. 400, 273 P. 74."

The recent case of Braunstein v. Title

Guarantee & Trust Co., 216 Cal. 780, 17 P.(2d) 104, is to the same effect.

[4] So in the instant case, there is no showing made that the bondholders are other than innocent victims of appellant, Ruddle Company, which is now seeking to profit by its own wrong.

We are therefore of the opinion that, under the circumstances, the defense that no permit was given to sell these bonds cannot avail appellants.

[5, 6] The only other point which requires notice is the contention of appellants that the trial court should have ordered the property sold in smaller units instead of as one parcel. The argument is based solely upon the testimony of their witness Allan Ruddle, who described the property as divided into six units of dairies, a number of orchards, vineyards, and some pasture land, and gave it as his opinion that a sale of the tract as a whole would realize only 50 per cent. of its value.

It may well be assumed that the trial court, in disbelieving the testimony of this witness on the issue of alteration, likewise gave it little force in drawing its conclusion on the manner of sale. However, taking such testimony at its face value, it would still fall far short of grounds for reversal. The trust indenture provided that, in the event of default and foreclosure, the whole of the property should be sold as one parcel and as an entirety, "unless such sale as an entirety be impracticable by reason of some statute or other cause." The term "impracticable" means "not practicable"; "incapable of being performed or accomplished by the means employed or at command." Webster's New International Dictionary. Respondents argue with much conviction that under the rule of ejusdem generis, where general words, such as "other cause," follow specific words which enumerate objects of one class, such as "statute," the general words will be construed to refer only to things of such class. See Matter of Petition of Johnson, 167 Cal. 142, 138 P. 740; Smith v. First Nat. Bank, 114 Okl. 293, 245 P. 653; United States v. Phez Co. (C. C. A.) 28 F.(2d) 106. Under this reasoning, the impracticability would have to arise from a statute or similar cause. But it is unnecessary to rely upon this doctrine, for the plain meaning of the words used excludes the interpretation sought by appellants. Their argument is simply that a sale as an entirety would be unprofitable; but they do not contend that it is impossible or even difficult, and, in fact, the sale actually did take place, realizing $310,000. It is by no means clear from the record that a reversal, followed by a resale in small units, each subject to individual redemption, would bring a greater return.

It follows that the trial court did not err in ordering the sale of the property as an entirety.

The judgment is modified by striking out paragraphs III, IV, V, and VI of the judgment relating to the liens of Hunter, Dulin & Co., Carl T. Wagner, and T. H. Carlon; and, as so modified, is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; V. M. Thompson, Judge.

In the matter of the guardianship of the persons and estates of Evelyn Shannon and Richard Shannon, minors. From an order appointing Alta Shannon as guardian and certain other orders, Florence Monsees appeals. On motion to dismiss the appeal or affirm the orders appealed from.

Orders affirmed.

Whitelaw & Whitelaw, of El Centro, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice.

This is a controversy between the natural mother and the alleged stepmother of two minor children for appointment as their guardian. The guardianship was awarded to the stepmother. An appeal was thereupon taken from various orders and rulings of the court below, as hereinafter set forth, and the matter is now before us on motion to dismiss the appeal or affirm the order or orders of the court below.

The mother of the children, Florence Shannon, now Florence Monsees, at the age of sixteen, and in the year 1919, married the father, James Shannon. Some seven years later she sued him for divorce and on September 13, 1926, was given an interlocutory decree on grounds of mental and physical cruelty. The two children of the marriage, Evelyn and Richard, then aged six and five years, respectively, were to spend six months of the year with each parent. Shortly after the entry of said interlocutory decree of divorce, and on November 3, 1926, James Shannon married Alta Shannon at Florence, Ariz. Questioning the legality of this ceremony, they were again married on December 23, 1926, at Mexicali, Mexico. Later they established a home in California for the two minor children above mentioned, and for their own daughter, Dorothy Jean Shannon. On May 8, 1931, James Shannon was killed in an industrial accident. He left a small estate, which went into the possession of Alta Shannon, as his widow; in addition the industrial accident commission awarded to the three children jointly, upon waiver of any claim of said widow, a death benefit of $5,000, payable to each of them at the rate of $8.33½ a week. Meanwhile the first wife had secured her final decree of divorce from James Shannon and on March 22, 1930, had married one Xel Monsees, who claimed to be willing and able not only to support her, but also to provide a home and an education for said two minor children of her first marriage.

On June 15, 1931, Alta Shannon petitioned to be made guardian of said Evelyn and Richard Shannon, then aged eleven and nine years, respectively. The mother, Florence Monsees, filed an answer and cross-petition. Hearings were had, and the court on June 27, 1931, made its order to the effect that said mother was not a fit, proper, and competent person to be appointed guardian of said children, but that Alta Shannon was and letters of guardianship were therefore granted to her as prayed and she was also awarded the payments from said compensation fund for use toward the maintenance and education of the children. In December, 1931, at the time of hearing of the first account current of the guardianship, Florence Monsees again appeared and petitioned for the removal of said guardian, claiming that James Shannon and Alta Shannon were never legally married and that the motive of the latter in winning the children to her side was merely to secure the estate of the father and the payments from said compensation fund; further that said guardian had misused the property and was wasting the estate of the children. Further proceedings were had. Alta Shannon waived her claim to the estate of said James Shannon in favor of all three of the children. In March, 1932, she filed her final account of the guardianship of the two minors and said guardianship was thereafter duly terminated by the court, pursuant to her petition, for the purpose of appointing her guardian of all three of the children. The final account was allowed, and on May 26, 1932, after further hearings, and over the objection of said Florence Monsees, Alta Shannon was duly appointed guardian of all three of said minor children. Florence Monsees thereupon moved for a new trial. The motion was denied and she then filed a notice of appeal from the "order * * * appointing Alta Shannon guardian of said minors and from order * * * refusing to revoke said order * * * so appointing said guardian, and from the order * * * refusing to remove said Alta Shannon as such guardian * * * and from the order refusing to grant a new trial * * * and also those signed by the court on May 12 * * * and May 16, 1932 (findings of fact, conclusions of law, and order allowing final account of guardian). * * *

We are now asked to dismiss the appeal from the order of June 27, 1931, appointing Alta Shannon guardian of the two minors on the ground that said order was appealable and became final before the time of filing notice of appeal (July 1, 1932). We are also asked to dismiss said appeal and the other appeals upon the further ground that the questions thereby presented have become moot by reason of the termination of said guardianship.

[1, 2] It will readily be seen that the termination of the first guardianship and the creation of the second guardianship rendered immaterial the determination of all questions raised by the appeals from orders made in the first proceeding. But these two proceedings were so interwoven in the hearings by the court below as to make their separate review impossible. The record contains but one clerk's and one reporter's transcript, covering all hearings had and evidence taken from June, 1931, to May or June, 1932. In other words, the only real question raised by any of the appeals is that of the sufficiency of the evidence to support the conclusions of the court below. To determine this issue we have reviewed the entire record and find ourselves in thorough accord with the findings, orders and judgment. The evidence was not without conflict, but it well warranted the appointment and reappointment of Alta Shannon as guardian, and the various other orders made. In closing we shall set forth a portion of the memorandum decision made by the court below, which has our unqualified approval.

In said memorandum decision it is stated that although certain things in connection with the guardianship led the court to believe there might be some justification for removal of the guardian, on the other hand, considering the present and future rights and benefits of the minors, it seemed she should not be removed; that after talking alone with Evelyn and Richard Shannon, the court was thoroughly convinced that they looked upon Alta Shannon as their mother and looked upon Florence Monsees as a person not very near to them because during the five years of their development they had been reared in the home with Alta Shannon as their mother; that they also expressed great love and affection for their little half-sister and did not want to be separated from her; that the conclusion reached by the court made the estate, including the home, available for all the children; that the children were doing exceedingly well in school and were being well reared and educated; that the present home of Mr. and Mrs. Monsees is in Canada; that giving Mr. Monsees full credit for sincerity in his offer to care for the minors, there would be no legal responsibility upon him and he would be a nonresident of both California and the United States; that if the children were placed in the care of their natural mother, they would be removed from the jurisdiction of the court, from their property and home, from the school they have attended for several years and from their associates, and it would mean breaking up an established family and placing said children with a mother who has had little contact with them for five years or more and a stepfather whom they have seen only a few times, in entirely strange surroundings; that considering all these things, the court could not bring itself to make an order affecting the present status of said children.

As above stated, it is our view that under the evidence presented, the court made wise disposition of this cause.

The several orders and judgment appealed from are hereby affirmed.

We concur: WASTE, C. J.; LANGDON, J.; CURTIS, J.; SHENK, J.; THOMPSON, J.; SEAWELL, J.

HERSH et al. v. GARAU et ux. (MacCONNELL et al., Interveners).

L. A. 12452.

Supreme Court of California.

June 30, 1933.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1011(1).

Trial court's finding based on conflicting evidence is conclusive unless testimony is so obviously false or so inherently improbable as to require its rejection.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⇨44.

Evidence sustained finding that option to purchase realty had not been revoked when exercised by optionee's assignee.

3. Vendor and purchaser ⇨18(1/2).

Option to purchase realty constituted continuing offer which remained open for agreed term thereof unless sooner revoked by notice to optionee, irrespective of whether consideration was given for option.

4. Vendor and purchaser ⇨18(3).

Option to purchase realty not revoked prior to acceptance by optionee's assignee became valid contract on proper tender of performance.

5. Vendor and purchaser ⇨18(3).

Tender made by legal owner of option to purchase realty held not rendered ineffective because legal owner held title to option as trustee for undisclosed beneficiary.

6. Vendor and purchaser ⇨350.

Evidence sustained finding that assignee of option to purchase realty had ability to pay consideration required by option.

7. Vendor and purchaser ⇨350.

Evidence sustained finding that at time optionors refused to convey property, it had increased in value not less than $150,000 in excess of consideration set out in option.

8. Vendor and purchaser ⇨350.

Evidence sustained finding that optionors acted in bad faith in refusing to convey property in accordance with option to purchase by reason of increase in value of property (Civ. Code, § 3306).

CURTIS, Justice.

This action was instituted by plaintiffs, Sara F. Hersh and Samuel Hersh, husband and wife, to recover damages in the sum of $150,000 for the refusal on the part of defendants, Aurelio Garau and Sarah Garau, husband and wife, to convey to plaintiffs certain real property in accordance with the terms of a written option to purchase said property given by defendants to one Morris Rauch and by him assigned to plaintiff Samuel Hersh.

The undisputed facts of the case, very briefly stated, are as follows: In November, 1922, Aurelio Garau and his wife, Sarah Garau, were the owners in fee simple of a piece of property consisting of approximately eight acres known as the "Garau Home Place" located near Culver City, which property is bounded on the south side by Washington boulevard, a major boulevard from Los Angeles to Venice, on the west side by National boulevard, and on the north side by Venice boulevard. During the month of November, 1922, Garau and his wife entered into an agreement leasing said property to the Green Mill Catering Company, and in January, 1923, said company commenced the construction thereon of a large café and restaurant building. Thereafter the Green Mill, Inc., was formed, which assumed the rights, duties, and privileges of said Green Mill Catering Company and completed said building, at a total cost in excess of $90,000. During this period of construction Morris Rauch secured from Garau and his wife a written option, dated March 26, 1923, for one year, to purchase said property for a consideration of $90,000 cash, or upon terms to be agreed upon by the parties. This option was given for the reason that Rauch stated that it was impossible for the Green Mill, Inc., to finance the construction of the building on leased property without an option to purchase the property during the life of the lease, and it was the understanding of Garau and Rauch that upon the satisfactory completion of the building Rauch should repurchase from Garau the stock in the Green Mill, Inc., which Garau had theretofore purchased. Thereafter, Rauch interested Samuel Hersh in furnishing money for the completion of said building, and Hersh out of funds owned by his wife put into the construction of said building a substantial amount of money and Rauch assigned, by written assignment, to Samuel Hersh, the option upon said real property. The date of said written assignment was September 26, 1923, and two days later it was put on record in the office of the county recorder. At the same time another written agreement was entered into between Rauch and Hersh with reference to the purchase of stock in the Green Mill, Inc., by Hersh, and setting out certain conditions upon which Rauch would be entitled to a one-half interest in said option. On February 15, 1924, Hersh personally delivered to Garau and his wife a written notification of his election to exercise said option, agreeing unconditionally therein to pay the $90,000 in cash, or upon any terms of payment satisfactory to Garau. Garau informed Hersh that he should see his (Garau's) attorney, and thereafter Hersh received from the attorney for Garau a letter stating that Garau declined to accept the tender or offer of cash or terms "for the reason that no consideration of any kind was paid Mr. or Mrs. Garau * * * for the option mentioned in your letter." Subsequent to this rejection of the tender, Morris Rauch was killed in an accident, and was not available as a witness by either party. Thereafter the Green Mill, Inc., went into bankruptcy.

The case was tried by the court sitting without a jury and judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiffs and against the defendants for damages in the sum of $150,000.

The complaint alleged that the consideration moving to said Morris Rauch for said assignment was furnished by and was the property of Sara F. Hersh, and that said assignment was taken in the name of Samuel Hersh, as the trustee of and for the benefit of Sara F. Hersh. Said judgment was, therefore, rendered in favor of the plaintiffs "for the benefit of Sara F. Hersh as her sole and separate property." From this judgment the defendants have appealed.

Appellants advance as the basis of the claim that respondents are not entitled to damages for the refusal of appellants to convey said property in accordance with the terms of the written option the following reasons: (1) No consideration was paid by Morris Rauch to appellants for the option, and they, as optionors, were therefore not required to carry out the terms of the option; (2) at a time prior to the assignment of the option by Rauch to Hersh, the original parties, appellant Garau and Morris Rauch, by mutual consent and agreement, orally expressed, had abandoned the option and it thereafter ceased to have legal force or effect; (3) the tender of performance made by Hersh to Aurelio Garau was not effectual for the reason that, although Hersh was the legal owner of said option, he was holding it in trust for persons whose interest he did not disclose to the optionors at the time of said tender; (4) Hersh at the time of said tender did not have the present ability to pay the consideration of $90,000 cash for said real property; (5) the property had not increased in value and was not worth the value of $240,000 on February 15, 1924, the date of the tender by the optionee; and (6) the disinclination and refusal of the optionors to convey said real property was based upon an honest belief that said option was null and void and of no effect and not upon the fact that the value of the property had increased from $90,000 to $240,000, and that, therefore, the optionors were not acting in bad faith in making such refusal, and consequently the measure of damage is not that set out in section 3306 of the Civil Code.

It is apparent that every point raised by appellants has to do with a question of fact. The case, therefore, simply presents the question of whether there is sufficient evidence to support the findings of the trial court upon which the judgment is based. In brief, the trial court found that the option was given by the defendants for a valuable consideration; that it has never been revoked; that plaintiffs were ready, able, and willing to pay the consideration as the purchase price of the property on February 15, 1924; that plaintiffs made a proper tender and thereupon exercised said option; that the defendants in bad faith refused to convey said property by reason of the increase in value of said property, and that the property had increased in value and was worth at said time not less than $150,000 in excess of the consideration set out in said option.

[1] We have read and carefully examined the record and are of the opinion that the findings so made are supported by the evidence. There is a conflict of evidence it is true, but the rule is well established that in such a situation the determination of the trial court is conclusive unless the testimony is so obviously false or so inherently improbable as to require its rejection. Appellants argue that the evidence offered in favor of plaintiffs is unworthy of credence and should be rejected. There is nothing in the facts and circumstances as testified by plaintiffs and witnesses in behalf of plaintiffs so inherently improbable as to render such testimony unworthy of credence. Neither are there contradictions or inconsistencies therein which would indicate that the testimony was obviously false. The trial court deemed the testimony in behalf of plaintiffs worthy of belief and accepted as true plaintiffs' version of the transaction. We are of the opinion that the trial court was amply justified in so doing.

[2-4] It might be well to here set out briefly the additional facts deduced upon the trial of the case which support the position of plaintiffs with reference to the validity of the option. Although Garau testified that, previous to the assignment of the option to Hersh by Morris Rauch, it had been abandoned by mutual consent of the original parties, orally expressed on several different occasions, there is in the record testimony by Samuel Hersh, which was corroborated by the testimony of another witness, that before Hersh advanced any money for the construction of the Green Mill café, Mr. Rauch brought Mr. Garau to see Mr. Hersh for the express purpose of having Mr. Garau assure Mr. Hersh that the option was valid, in order that Hersh might be induced to invest his money, and that during the conversation Mr. Garau was asked "if everything was all right; if the option was regular and valid," to which Mr. Garau replied that "everything was all right, he was very anxious to have the building completed, because it had been partly abandoned then." Mr. Levy, in corroboration of this testimony, testified that he was introduced to Mr. Garau by Mr. Rauch and he had inquired of Mr. Garau if the option was a bona fide option, stating that Mr. Hersh was thinking of putting money into the venture and before Hersh put any money into it, he wanted to be sure "there was no hitch at all." At that time Mr. Garau said: "That is all right, I don't care whose money goes in if the building is completed. Mr. Rauch has this option and when he pays me at any time at all, he can have the building and he can have the land."

The witness then asked Garau if he would be willing to come up to Mr. Hersh's office and make the same statement, and the following day Mr. Garau came to Mr. Hersh's office and stated in the presence of Mr. Hersh and Mr. Rauch the substance of what he had said the day previous—that the option was a valid option and that if the money was tendered him at any time at all, he would convey the property to Mr. Hersh or Mr. Rauch. Mr. Garau admitted going to Hersh's office but denied discussing the option. In addition to this testimony of Hersh and Levy with reference to this occasion, there is the testimony of Mr. Rubens, corroborated to some extent by that of Mr. Rosen, that on another occasion in September or October, 1923, at the office of the attorney for Mr. Garau, at which there were present several persons besides Mr. Garau and his attorney, Mr. Rauch, Mr. Hersh, Mr. Levy, and the witness, the question of the option was discussed in the presence of Mr. Garau, at which time Mr. Rauch stated that he had assigned the option to Mr. Hersh and was going to get the money for finishing the construction of the building from Mr. Hersh. The question also came up as to how Mr. Garau would take the purchase price and it was suggested that it would not be beneficial for him to take the entire amount in cash as it would raise his income tax for the year tremendously. It is apparent that despite the testimony of Garau that the option had been withdrawn and abandoned by the original parties prior to its assignment by Rauch to Hersh, there is sufficient evidence to support the finding of the trial court that the option had not been withdrawn but was in fact in full force and effect at least up to the time of the conversations herein narrated. Obviously this discredits the claim of appellants that the option had been withdrawn previous to its assignment to Mr. Hersh. And we think there is sufficient evidence to warrant the conclusion that no attempt was made to revoke the option between the time it was assigned to Hersh and the date on which Hersh made tender of performance to the optioners. Mr. Hersh testified positively that at no time previous to his tender did Garau notify or inform him that the option had been revoked and was no longer effective. There was never any attempt made to revoke the option by written notice prior to its acceptance, and the letter written by the attorney for Garau after the tender was made by Hersh failed to state that the option had already been revoked. Irrespective, therefore, of whether any consideration was given for the option, it constituted a continuing offer which remained open for one year unless sooner revoked by notice to the optionee, and the option in the instant case not having been revoked prior to acceptance, became a valid and binding contract between the parties as soon as proper tender of performance was made by the optionee.

We do not wish to be understood as holding that there was in fact no consideration. "A written instrument is presumptive evidence of a consideration." Civ. Code, § 1614. And, "the burden of showing a want of consideration sufficient to support an instrument lies with the party seeking to invalidate or avoid it." Civ. Code, § 1615. Garau, it is true, testified that Rauch paid him nothing for the option. But accepting as true the fact that no money was paid for the option, there is in the record the testimony of Garau that one of the reasons he gave the option to Rauch was the promise of Rauch to repurchase from him the Green Mill, Inc., stock which he had theretofore bought. The trial court may well have concluded that this was a sufficient consideration for the giving of the option.

[5] We are satisfied that the tender made by Hersh was proper and sufficient. The authorities cited by appellants in support of their contention that Hersh, although the legal owner of the option, was in fact holding such title as trustee for other undisclosed persons and could not, therefore, make the tender in his own name, do not involve the question of a trustee, but involve situations in which tender was attempted to be made by strangers or mere volunteers. Obviously they are without application here. Hersh was not a stranger or volunteer. He was the legal owner of the title to the option and was known to be the legal owner by the optionor, Garau. Garau's own testimony shows that he looked up the records and found that the assignment from Rauch to Hersh had been recorded. The tender made by Hersh cannot for this reason be held to be ineffective.

[6] An examination of the record with reference to the ability of respondents to pay the $90,000 cash consideration required by the terms of the option shows that the offer to pay this amount in cash, or upon terms to be agreed upon, was not a mere idle gesture. Mr. Hersh testified that he was borrowing and lending money all the time as part of his business and was prepared to meet the payment when he needed the money. His statement of his financial standing furnished to the Bank of Italy in February, 1924, showed that he and his wife jointly owned real and personal property having a net financial worth of over $300,000. Appellants make much of the fact that the bank balances of respondents only totaled $2,816 on the date of the purported tender. In view of respondents' financial worth and rating this fact is not of vital importance. In Laack v. Dimmick, 95 Cal. App. 456, 273 P. 50, 55, the court held that it was not necessary that in order for a purchaser to be able to buy he must have the purchase money on hand in the form of money or to his credit at the bank, saying: "The word 'able' means financially able. This does not mean, however, that such purchaser must have all the money in his immediate possession or to his credit at a bank, but only that he must be able to command the necessary funds to close the deal within the time required. * * * It is much more clearly sufficient if the purchaser has assets of greater value than the purchase price and a financial rating which will enable him to command the funds when needed. For in such event the purchaser is not only able to purchase, but is able to respond in damages if he refuse to go ahead with the contract." And in Russell v. Ramm, 200 Cal. 348, 254 P. 532, 534, the court said: "The rule * * * which would require a would-be purchaser of property to make a showing, either that he had the purchase price on hand in the form of money or that he had consummated such a loan upon his available properties or securities * * * would be to lay down too drastic a rule governing business transactions of the kind presented in the instant case." Both of the above cases involved suits for brokers' commissions, but we think the same principle is applicable to the case of an option. We think it sufficiently appears from the record that if the appellants had accepted the exercise of the option and subsequently the respondents had refused to perform, the respondents would have been amply able to respond in damages. This being so, the finding of the trial court with reference to the ability of respondents at the time of making the tender was clearly correct.

[7] A considerable portion of the record is taken up with testimony of real estate men as to the market value of the property in February, 1924, the date of the tender of performance. Appellants insist that the finding of the court that property worth $90,000 in March, 1923, was worth $240,000, an increase of $150,000, in February, 1924, eleven months later, is so ridiculous that on its face it is palpably false. To any one not familiar with the tremendous increase in the values of real estate during this particular period in and around Los Angeles, the claim of appellants would seem to be justified. But appellants in their opening brief state that "as a matter of common knowledge, the Los Angeles territory was in the midst of an unusual boom and a flood of easy money." Three real estate men testified as witnesses for the respondents. The first witness, Mr. C. V. Loop, placed the value at $300,000 in February, 1924. Mr. Loop had been engaged in the real estate business in Culver City and had had actual experience in the purchase and sale of real property, and in the making of appraisals, having been chairman of the appraisal committee of the Real Estate Board, and one of the appraisers on the opening and widening of Exposition boulevard, as well as other private appraisals. Mr. Loop was familiar with the property, as he had a purchaser interested in the purchase of the property at that time. He knew of the lease on the property here involved and had taken that into consideration in making his estimate of the value of the property. Mr. Glen A. Davidson, another witness for respondents, was, at the time of the trial, chairman of the appraisal committee of the Culver City Realty Board, and had acted as referee under an appointment by a judge of the superior court of Los Angeles county in a condemnation suit which involved land embraced in this action. He had also appraised property for the First National Bank of Culver City, and was apparently well qualified to give his opinion as to the value of the real estate. Mr. Davidson, after an extended explanation of the manner in which he arrived at his figures, placed the market value of the property here involved in February, 1924, at $259,708.75. He did not include in this estimate the value of the Green Mill café building, stating that he figured the value of the buildings which would revert to the lessor would counterbalance the fact that there was a lease bringing in a low rental on the property. Mr. Melville Hall, who had been in the real estate business since 1918, engaged in purchasing raw acreage and subdividing it, valued the property at $240,000 for the purpose of subdivision on terms, and not less than $200,000 cash. He stated that values had increased tremendously during that period. The only testimony contradictory of this evidence was that offered by Mr. Garau himself, who claimed it was not worth more than $120,000, and a witness in his behalf, who had only been in the real estate business for a year, and who placed the value of the property without improvements at $60,000. There can be no question but that the property by reason of its frontage on three main boulevards leading from the beach cities to Los Angeles was in a particularly advantageous position and undoubtedly the increase in its value was greater than that of property in the vicinity not fronting on all three boulevards. It appears from the record that the real estate men testifying for the respondents are men of standing in the community, with considerable business experience along real estate lines. Their testimony was accepted as true by the trial court, and the findings based thereon will not be disturbed.

[8] As to the finding relative to bad faith, it will suffice to say that although it is true that there is no direct evidence in the record of bad faith, no one who could testify that appellants had admitted that their reason for refusing to perform was the increase in the value of the property, the circumstances surrounding the transaction practically compel this conclusion. Appellants insist that bad faith cannot be predicated upon an optionor's refusal to accept tender based upon his honest belief that the option was not valid by reason of the fact that no consideration had been given for it and it had in fact been revoked by mutual consent of the original parties. If the record sustained appellant Garau's claim that he did honestly entertain a belief that the option had been revoked prior to the time Hersh as optionee made the tender and was no longer effective, the trial court would not have been justified in making, and it is extremely doubtful whether it would have made, a finding that the sole reason for appellants' refusal to accept tender was the rise in price in real estate in that vicinity. However, it must be borne in mind that according to the testimony of respondents' witnesses, at the time of the assignment of the option by Rauch to Hersh, and therefore subsequent to the time when, according to Garau, the option had been abandoned by mutual consent and was no longer effective, Garau informed Hersh that the option was valid and subsisting and made no claim that it had been in fact revoked. If this testimony be true, and the trial court was warranted in accepting it as true, the conclusion is inescapable that Garau did not in fact, as indicated by his conduct on that occasion, entertain an honest belief that said option had been abandoned by the mutual consent of himself and Rauch. Moreover, it is apparently conceded by appellants that subsequent to the assignment by Rauch to Hersh, at a meeting in the office of Garau's attorney, the question of the option was discussed. This clearly indicates that appellants did not entertain an honest belief that the option had been previously revoked. Upon this showing the trial court was justified in making the finding it did with reference to bad faith.

We are satisfied that there is substantial evidence to support the findings of the trial court and that the findings, in turn, support the judgment.

Judgment is affirmed.

ABBOTT v. COOPER et al.

L. A. 14012.

Supreme Court of California.

June 29, 1933.

Rehearing Denied July 28, 1933.

1. Appeal and error ⇨927(3).

On appeal from judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff's evidence must be taken as true and all reasonable inferences must be drawn in plaintiff's favor.

2. False imprisonment ⇨8.

Jailer taking into custody private police officer arrested without warrant by officer of rival private police patrol stating he did not know what charges were, held liable for false imprisonment (Pen. Code, §§ 142, 1597, 1611; Pol. Code, § 4157).

Facts disclosed that both the officer arrested and the arresting officers were members of different private police patrols, and also deputies under different constables of the township; that officer suing for false imprisonment was arrested without warrant and kept in custody for about 8½ hours and then released; that he was refused release on bail or the use of a telephone; and that on jailer's inquiry as to what the charges were, arresting officer replied that he did not know.

3. Sheriffs and constables ⇨157(3).

Deputy constable's act in arresting private police officer without warrant or charge and deputy sheriff's act as jailer in taking private officer into custody held acts colore officii, rendering constable, sheriff, and sheriff's surety liable for false imprisonment (Pen. Code, §§ 142, 1597, 1611; Pol. Code, § 4157).

SEAWELL, Justice.

This appeal is taken from a judgment of nonsuit entered by the superior court in and for the county of San Diego against plaintiff and in favor of defendants Ed F. Cooper, as sheriff of the county of San Diego; Edwin S. Macy, deputy sheriff and jailer; the Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland, said sheriff's bond, conditioned for the faithful performance of official duty of himself and his deputies; and Harry Webber, a constable in and for said county of San Diego. Judgment by default in the sum of $2,000 was rendered by the trial court at the conclusion of the trial against two other defendants, C. V. Carson and H. Atlee Worsham, both of whom were deputy constables under said Webber, from which no appeal was taken.

The action was brought against said defendants to recover damages suffered by plaintiff by reason of his unauthorized arrest and imprisonment by the persons and in the manner herein related. There is no dispute as to the facts as testified to by the plaintiff, who was the sole witness in the case.

In addition to being deputy constables under Constable Webber, Carson and Worsham were engaged in conducting a private police patrol in or about the city of San Diego. L. A. Abbott, the plaintiff, was also engaged in conducting a rival private police patrol in said city of San Diego, and was also a deputy constable by appointment of another constable whose jurisdiction also included the territory of the township of San Diego. Abbott, at the time he was arrested, was operating under a license from the state board of prison directors. He was dressed in a blue uniform and was wearing on his person a constable's badge of office, and also a badge showing that he was in the service of the state board of prison directors. All of the parties to the action were well acquainted with one another, both personally and officially. It is a reasonable inference from the uncontradicted evidence that a rivalry existed between the private police patrol headed by Carson and Worsham and that headed by Abbott. From the testimony given by Abbott, which will hereafter be referred to, it is also fairly inferable from said testimony that the feeling of hostility existing on the part of Carson and Worsham against Abbott was shared by the sheriff and his deputy. Carson, upon delivering Abbott to Macy, the jailer in charge, stated to him that he was "carrying out his orders," and ordered the jailer to lock Abbott up. The jailer, who beyond question recognized Carson as a person in authority in the premises, yielded ready compliance with Carson's orders, and locked Abbott up without a semblance of authority, warrant or right to do so. Whence Carson's orders does not directly appear from the scant record before us, but as the sheriff was the only person who could have given orders which the jailer would have felt bound to obey, the inference may be drawn that Carson was acting under an understanding with the sheriff as to the kind of treatment that should be accorded Abbott should opportunity present itself. Doubtless Carson did not mean that he was carrying out orders given by himself, but orders which he had received from some one in authority. This inference is strengthened by what was said and done at the jail as summarized by the District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, when this cause was before that court upon appeal. The unchallenged authority which Carson exercised in giving orders to the jailer and the latter's obedience to said orders, all of which stands admitted upon the record, are made evident by the following excerpts taken from the opinion of said District Court of Appeal, which correctly states the evidence of the only witness called to testify in the case and the law applicable to said facts as herein set forth:

About 2 o'clock on the morning of November 26, 1930, Carson and Worsham arrested the plaintiff and took him to the county jail where, upon their request and order, he was locked up by the defendant Macy, who, as a deputy under the defendant Cooper, the sheriff of San Diego county, was in charge of the jail. The plaintiff was held in jail for about eight and one-half hours and then released.

It appears from the evidence that on the night in question, the appellant and one of his assistants, named Sizer, were driving along in an automobile upon a mission connected with their business of a private police patrol. While so proceeding they came upon Carson and Worsham, whose car had in some manner become caught in a bridge, and stopped and assisted them in extricating their car. Carson and Worsham recognized the appellant and called him by name. Shortly after the appellant drove on, Carson and Worsham followed him and ordered him to pull into the curb. When he complied Worsham asked him what he was looking for, and upon receiving the reply, "I don't know as that is any of your business," Carson ordered the appellant from his car and told him he was under arrest. The appellant's gun was taken from him and he, with Sizer, was taken to the county jail. The respondent Macy received the appellant and took from him various articles, including his deputy constable badge and his private police badge. Upon the appellant's asking Macy the reason for his detention, Macy turned to Carson and asked him what the charges were, to which Carson replied: "Damned if I know. Damned if I believe he is allowed out in the county. We will leave him in here over night and let Sheriff Cooper decide it in the morning." Whereupon Macy asked Carson if Sizer was to be arrested also, to which Carson replied: "No, he is our friend; we don't want him, we want Abbott." Thereupon Sizer was released. The appellant also testified that he was refused permission to use the telephone; that he asked to be released on bail, saying: "I am a bonded man. If I have to have bail, can't I get out on bail?" Macy replied: "No, it's up to Carson, if he wants to let you out, it's all right." Macy then asked Carson if he would let the appellant out and Carson replied: "No, I am carrying out my orders, lock him up." * * * About 8:30 o'clock the next morning he was handed his articles and told to, "Get out of here."

[1] This, being the only evidence, must be taken as true in view of the motion for nonsuit, and all reasonable inferences therefrom must be drawn in favor of the appellant. It seems a fair and reasonable inference from this evidence that the arrest in question was made because of some rivalry between the respective private patrols and not because of any offense committed by the appellant. So far as appears from the evidence, there was no justification for the arrest, it was made without authority of law, and for the purposes of this appeal it must be held to have been unauthorized and unlawful. The only questions raised relate to the responsibility of parties other than those making the arrest.

[2] The first question presented is as to the liability of respondent Macy. The appellant argues that it appears from the evidence that Macy knew or should have known that the arrest was illegal and that he had no right to imprison the appellant. On behalf of this respondent it is urged that, under sections 142, 1597, and 1611 of the Penal Code and section 4157 of the Political Code, it was his duty to receive and hold the appellant when presented at the jail as a prisoner by the defendant Carson, a peace officer. It is argued that such a jailer is merely a ministerial officer and that it is no part of his duty to make any investigation or any decision as to whether or not any person brought to the jail shall be kept there. While it should not be held to be the duty of a jailer to make any extensive investigation before receiving a prisoner brought to him for custody, we think this contention of this respondent cannot be fully sustained. This arrest was made without a warrant, and whether Carson and Worsham be considered as having made the arrest as deputies of a constable or as private persons, they were only authorized to make an arrest for an offense committed or attempted in their presence or under certain circumstances upon the belief that the person arrested had committed a felony. Pen. Code, §§ 836 and 837. In Boaz v. Tate, 43 Ind. 60, the court said: "We have said that the marshal had authority to arrest when the offense was committed in his view and, under certain circumstances, commit to jail; that such authority necessarily conferred upon the jailer the right to receive and imprison the prisoner. If he had the right to receive the prisoner when brought to him by the marshal with the declaration that he had been arrested for an offense committed on view, that declaration would stand in the place of a mittimus in other cases, and it would be the duty of the jailer to receive him as a prisoner, without regard to the question of his guilt or innocence."

Conceding that a similar rule applies in this state and that a jailer is justified in receiving a prisoner without a warrant upon the declaration of the officer or person bringing him in that the arrest has been made for an offense on view or in the belief that a felony has been committed, the circumstances here fall far short of showing any such justification. Even if it could be held that a jailer is authorized to receive and hold a prisoner in the absence of any statement or declaration on the part of the officer or person bringing him in, we think it must be held that such a jailer has no authority to receive and place in custody a person brought in by another when the information furnished to the jailer affirmatively shows that the arrest has been made without authority, and that the person making the arrest neither knows what the charge is nor makes the claim that any offense has been committed either in his presence or otherwise. We think the information here conveyed to the respondent Macy was such that he knew or should have known that the arrest was illegal, and was such as to inform him that he had no right to imprison the appellant. It follows that, so far as shown by this evidence, the respondent Macy was himself liable for his wrongful act, whether done officially or otherwise (Gomez v. Scanlan, 155 Cal. 528, 102 P. 12), and that, as to him, the judgment of nonsuit was improperly entered.

[3] This brings us to a consideration of the question whether the sheriff and his surety and Constable Webber are liable for the acts of their respective deputies committed as herein set forth. The trial court held, as did said District Court of Appeal, that the acts of said deputies were extra-official acts and neither the principals nor their sureties are liable therefor.

It is not contended by any party to the action that said arrests were made upon a warrant of arrest, or for a crime committed in the presence of said arresting officers, or that plaintiff was delivered to said jailers upon the authority of a mittimus, or that any declaration was made to the jailer by said officers that plaintiff had committed a crime in the presence of either of said arresting officers, which declaration may satisfy the law or take the place of a mittimus. On the contrary, when the jailer inquired as to the charges made against Abbott, Carson replied: "Damned if I know. Damned if I believe he is allowed out in the county." He finally decided that plaintiff should be kept in jail overnight, and his fate left to the decision of the sheriff upon his arrival at a later hour. It is admitted that the acts of the jailer in detaining plaintiff in prison were unauthorized and unlawful, but it is the contention of respondents that the jailer's conduct was so patently unwarranted as to have amounted to conclusive proof that he knew that he was committing a trespass in detaining plaintiff in the circumstances of plaintiff's delivery to him, and therefore, as he was not acting under color of his office, his principal and the surety are not liable. We cannot subscribe to this doctrine, as it would tend to excuse or mitigate the wrongful acts of the officer if said acts were accompanied by unusual acts of oppression or amounted to a flagrant abuse of official duty, and penalize the offender only when his acts were less culpable. The fallacy of respondents' argument is well met in Clancy v. Kenworthy, 74 Iowa, 740, 35 N. W. 427, 428, 7 Am. St. Rep. 508, and by many other decisions spread throughout the states which adopt the reasoning of the Iowa court, from which we quote: "But it is insisted that, as the constable is shown to have had no lawful authority to arrest plaintiff, his act was therefore not done in the line of his duty. In truth his act was in the line—direction—of official duty, but was illegal because it was in excess of his duty. In the discharge of official functions he violated his duty, and oppressed the plaintiff. This is all there is of it. If, in exercising the functions of his office, defendant is not liable for acts because they are illegal or forbidden by law, and for that reason are trespasses or wrongs, he cannot be held liable on the bond at all, for the reason that all violations of duty and acts of oppression result in trespasses or wrongs. For lawful acts in discharge of his duty he of course is not liable. It follows that, if defendant's position be sound, no action can be maintained upon the bond in any case. In support of our conclusions, see Tieman v. Haw, 49 Iowa, 312." See, also, Greenius v. American Surety Co., 92 Wash. 401, 159 P. 384, L. R. A. 1917F, 1134.

In holding that a deputy sheriff and his principal and sureties were liable for the act of a deputy falsely claiming to have a warrant for a person not formally charged with crime, and who, under guise of authority of his office arrested and took a person into custody, had committed an unlawful and unauthorized act under color of his office the Supreme Court of North Dakota, in Lee v. Charmley, 20 N. D. 570, 129 N. W. 448, 449, 33 L. R. A. (N. S.) 275, said: "The almost uniform current of the later cases * * * regards wrongful acts of a public officer colore officii as official acts for which the sureties upon his bond are liable. Such is the holding of the courts of last resort of Pennsylvania, Maine, Massachusetts, Ohio, Virginia, Kentucky, Missouri, Iowa, Nebraska, Texas, California, Minnesota, Illinois, and of the Supreme Court of the United States. And in reviewing these authorities this court, in one of its former opinions, has remarked: "While there is a dispute among the authorities whether the sureties on a sheriff's bond are liable for the wrongful act of their principal in seizing property of a third person, the more numerous decisions are found arrayed in support of the rule that they are liable, and these cases appear to us to have the best of the argument. See Lammon v. Feusier, 111 U. S. 17, 28 L. Ed. 337, 4 S. Ct. 286, where the authorities are reviewed and where the doctrine we deem sound is enunciated."

Lammon v. Feusier, last above cited, holds upon a review of a long list of cases that where a person holding the office of sheriff or constable does acts colore officii, though he had no sufficient warrant to do the act, he is responsible to third persons in an action for a breach of official duty. Such a rule is declared to be supported by the weight of authority. We may paraphrase the language of that decision and say, as was there said, respondent Macy was an officer in charge of a county jail, and had authority to detain persons charged with crime on a suitable writ or process. He assumed to have such authority and thereupon took from plaintiff Abbott all of his personal property and refused to release him or permit him to arrange for bail by telephone message or otherwise, and held him as a prisoner. He exercised every function a jailer or officer could have exercised in the discharge of official duty.

In Johnson v. Williams, 111 Ky. 289, 63 S. W. 759, 760, 54 L. R. A. 220, 98 Am. St. Rep. 416, quoting from Knowlton v. Bartlett, 1 Pick. (Mass.) 273, the court said: "'If the act from which the injury resulted was an official act, the authorities are clear that the sheriff is answerable. If it was not an official, but a personal, act, it is equally clear that he is not answerable. But an official act does not mean what a deputy might lawfully do in the execution of his office. If so, no action could ever lie against the sheriff for the misconduct of his deputy. It means, therefore, whatever is done under color or by virtue of his office.' To hold the deputy and his sureties liable to the sheriff on his bond, it is not necessary that the deputy should be acting under color of some writ, but if he is acting under color of his office, and professing so to act, and inducing others interested to believe he is acting colore officii, he and his sureties will be bound by such acts. No other rule would be safe. Sureties are not needed on a sheriff's bond, if they are only to be held when he acts legally. They vouch for his acts, and bind themselves to make good any damage he may cause to any one while acting under color of his office."

The Supreme Court of New Mexico, in State v. Llewellyn, 23 N. M. 43, 167 P. 414, 424, upon consideration of the question here presented said: "The rule exempting sureties from liability, for acts colore officii, was doubtless adopted by many of the courts before the advent of surety companies, whose business it is, for a stipulated compensation, to guarantee the fidelity of officers and employees. The obligation of sureties was then ordinarily assumed without pecuniary compensation, and was not extended by implication or construction. Their liability was strictissimi juris. In this state no definite rule on the subject has been established by the courts, and we see no good reason for a departure from the apparent majority rule that the surety is liable for the acts of the principal colore officii. We believe the public interests will be more surely protected and safeguarded by the establishment of such rule here."

There are unquestionably cases in which the act of the deputy is clearly a trespass or private tort and bears no semblance or show of color to the performance of official duty, and these cases are readily distinguishable from the cases cited above. The three California cases cited by respondents, Felonicher v. Stingley, 142 Cal. 630, 76 P. 504, Neff v. Redmond, 54 Cal. App. 757, 202 P. 925, and Filarski v. Covey, 75 Cal. App. 353, 242 P. 874, more fully illustrate respondents' claim than any others to be found in our reports. The first was an action against the constable and the sureties on his official bond for damages on account of said constable by force and violence compelling a married woman to denude herself for the purposes of examination, and taking from her person certain rings and other personal effects. The second case cited and relied upon was an action brought against a sheriff and the sureties to recover a sum of money deposited with the sheriff upon agreement of the parties interested and later embezzled by his undersheriff. Said moneys were paid to the sheriff after an attachment which had been levied was discharged and the parties to the action had agreed in writing upon the payment of certain monthly installments to the sheriff. Whatever legal rights the plaintiff had under the writ of attachment were stipulated away and the sheriff was no longer acting in his official capacity. The third cited case was an action brought against a deputy sheriff, his principal, and the latter's bond to recover for the negligent operation of an automobile by said deputy sheriff, which caused the death of a minor while said officer was returning from calling upon a magistrate notifying him that a person was held in the county jail awaiting a preliminary hearing.

The above are practically the only decisions of this state which are cited to sustain the judgment of the trial court. That they do not sustain the respondents is obvious from the abstract of facts herein set forth. It may be added that whenever this court has spoken upon the precise question herein presented the trend of thought seems to favor appellant's contention that said jailer and deputies were acting colore officii.

The judgment of nonsuit as to defendants Ed F. Cooper, Edwin S. Macy, Harry E. Webber, and the Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland, a corporation, is reversed.

PER CURIAM.

We have re-examined the questions involved in this appeal and find ourselves in entire accord with the conclusion and opinion of the District Court of Appeal, Division 1 of the First Appellate District, and we hereby adopt that opinion as the opinion of this court in this case, as follows:

An appeal from an order and decree sustaining the demurrer of respondent executor to appellant's petition for a decree of partial distribution and denying said petition.

Appellant is the widow of decedent, who at the time of his death was a resident of California. They were married on March 28, 1925, at which time, according to the petition, both had their legal residence and domicile in Indiana. Within a few days after the marriage they separated, and decedent came to California, where he established his residence. Thereafter he commenced in Los Angeles county an action for a divorce from appellant, but died testate before the action terminated. Proceedings for the administration of his estate are pending in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco. The petition alleged:

"That prior to her marriage with decedent the decedent represented to the petitioner that he owned stocks, bonds and other securities of an amount in value in excess of $200,000, which stocks, bonds and securities were issued by corporations having their domicile in said state of Indiana; that said decedent did in fact own said securities at and prior to the time of said marriage, and he made said representations to the petitioner as inducements for her engagement to marry him, and they were intended to and in fact did operate as a part of the consideration for the consummation of said marriage on part of the petitioner.

"That at, prior to and continuously since the time of said marriage it was and is the law of said state of Indiana that if a man dies testate leaving a widow, one-third of his personal estate shall descend to said widow subject to its proportion of the debts of said decedent, and that any such widow shall have the right to reject and renounce the provisions made for her under the terms of the will and elect to take under the laws of said

Under Indiana law, wife's inchoate interest in husband's lands is not present estate, and so long as title remains in husband her inchoate right alone cannot be conveyed (Burns' Ann. St. Ind. 1926, §§ 3337, 3349).

2. Descent and distribution ⇐69.

Under Indiana law, husband may dispose of his personality without wife's consent, except in expectancy of death to defeat her statutory distributive right (Burns' Ann. St. Ind. 1926, § 3343).

3. Descent and distribution ⇐5.

Wife having only expectancy in decedent's personal estate under law of matrimonial domicile, and decedent having established his domicile in California, wife held not entitled to portion of decedent's personality which she could have claimed under law of matrimonial domicile (Burns' Ann. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

Petition by Caroline H. O'Connor for a decree of partial distribution of the estate of Joseph S. O'Connor, deceased, opposed by Charles B. O'Connor, executor. From the state; that it was and is further provided by the laws of said state that any surviving wife desiring to renounce the provisions made for her in any such will shall file her election in writing, duly signed and acknowledged before some officer authorized to take acknowledgments of deeds, and cause such election to be filed within one year after such will has been admitted to probate in said state.

"That similar statutory provisions were made in favor of a husband with reference to property and property rights owned by a wife, with like right of election in favor of a surviving husband to take under the law instead of any provisions made for him by will; that under the decisions of the courts of said state having final jurisdiction over the subject-matter thereof, said statutory provisions have been construed as modifying the common-law property rights as between husband and wife, and holding it to be the law of said state that by virtue of the marital contract and the rights accruing therefrom the law casts upon each a contingent interest in the other's property which in the event of death becomes fixed in the survivor and which can be abridged or taken away only to the extent stipulated in a marriage settlement; that your petitioner herein has duly executed and filed or caused to be filed her renunciation of the decedent's will and the provision therein made for her and her election to take under the laws of their matrimonial domicile, being said state of Indiana, which renunciation and election was filed within the time and in the manner required by law.

"That after the separation between your petitioner and the decedent as hereinbefore stated, the decedent disposed of the stocks, bonds and securities so owned by him at the time of their marriage and converted the proceeds thereof into the property, stocks and bonds described in the inventory filed by the executor herein, and that the property and property rights represented by said inventory are in legal effect the same as those owned by the decedent at the time of their marriage; that the petitioner is entitled to a distributive share of the funds remaining for distribution after the payment of the decedent's debts, in an amount equal to one-third thereof."

Appellant contends that she is entitled to the portion of decedent's personal estate which she could have claimed under the laws of Indiana notwithstanding his attempted disposal thereof by his will.

By the Code of 1852 dower was abolished in Indiana. May v. Fletcher, 40 Ind. 575. But with regard to the wife's interest in her deceased husband's real estate it is provided by statute that "if a husband die testate or intestate, leaving a widow, one-third of his real estate shall descend to her in fee-simple, free from all demands of creditors * * *" (Burns' Annotated Indiana Statutes 1926, § 3337 [3014]); and that "a surviving wife is entitled * * * to one-third of all the real estate of which her husband may have been seized in fee-simple at any time during the marriage, and in the conveyance of which she may not have joined, in due form of law, and also of all lands in which her husband had an equitable interest at the time of his death: Provided, That if the husband shall have left a will, the wife may elect to take under the will instead of this or the foregoing provisions" (Burns' Annotated Indiana Statutes 1926, § 3349 [3029]).

[1] It has been held with respect to said section 3337 (3014) that the wife acquires her title thereunder by descent as an heir of her husband; but that under section 3349 (3029) her title is by purchase by virtue of her marital rights and not as an heir, and that in both cases her title vests at the same time and by virtue of the happening of the same event, namely, the death of her husband (May v. Fletcher, supra; Bowers v. Lillis, 187 Ind. 1, 115 N. E. 930), so that, while her inchoate interest in the lands of her husband is an estate in the land itself and not a mere incumbrance (Clements v. Davis, 155 Ind. 624, 57 N. E. 905), it is not a present estate, and so long as the title remains in the husband her inchoate right alone cannot be conveyed (Davenport v. Gwilliams, 133 Ind. 142, 31 N. E. 790, 22 L. R. A. 244; Unger v. Mellinger, 37 Ind. App. 639, 77 N. E. 814, 117 Am. St. Rep. 348). The community system does not prevail in Indiana, and appellant admits that prior to 1891 there was no statute of that state giving to a surviving widow an interest in her deceased husband's personal estate akin to the common-law right of dower and not subject to be defeated by will. See Pond v. Sweetser, 85 Ind. 144; Loy v. Loy, 128 Ind. 150, 27 N. E. 351. She claims, however, that the Act of March 9, 1891, Acts 1891, p. 404, c. 185 (Burns' Annotated Indiana Statutes 1926, § 3343 [3025]), gives such right.

This act provided as follows: "If a man die testate leaving a widow, one third of his personal estate shall descend to said widow, subject, however, to its proportion of the debts of said decedent: Provided, however, That nothing in this act shall be construed to reduce the interest which the law now gives a widow in the estate of a deceased husband: And provided, further, That such widow may elect to take under the will of said decedent instead of this or any other law of descent of this state, which election shall be made within ninety days after said will has been admitted to probate in this state, and in the same manner as widows are now required by law to elect." This section was referred to in Crawfordsville Trust Co. v. Ramsey, 55 Ind. App. 40, 100 N. E. 1049, 102 N. E. 282, an action involving the validity of a gift. The gift was conditioned on the event of the donor's death, with a reservation of the use of the property during his life and was testamentary in character. It was also made with the intention of defeating his wife's right to share in his personal estate at his death, and was held to be void. The court, with respect to the husband's power of control over his personal property in that state, held that there could be no question but that as a general rule he had the absolute control of his personal property during his life and could give and otherwise dispose of it without his wife's consent free from any claim of hers, but that where the transfer was a mere device by which he sought to deprive his wife of her distributive share under the statute the same rule should apply as in cases of conveyances of real property for the purpose of defeating the wife's right to dower. In its opinion the court cites cases from other jurisdictions which refer to the right of a wife to share in her deceased husband's personal estate as a dower right. An examination of these cases shows that with one exception, namely, where by statute "dower" was given in the personal estate of the husband, the court used the term to describe the widow's statutory right to a distributive share of her deceased husband's personal estate. That the term is sometimes so used is shown in Howard v. Strode, 242 Mo. 210, 146 S. W. 792, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 1057.

Appellant cites other Indiana cases which she contends support her claim. In Carroll v. Swift, 10 Ind. App. 170, 37 N. E. 1061, 1062, the court said that "prior to the Act of March 9, 1891 * * * a surviving wife took no absolute interest in the personal estate of her husband, except as to the statutory allowance of $500. He might dispose of the surplus, after the payment of debts, by will." This case involved the right of a widow to the distribution of part of her husband's personal property, and the question of her interest therein was not necessary to the decision, or decided.

In Murphey v. Brown, 159 Ind. 106, 62 N. E. 275, a widow claimed the whole of her husband's estate under the provisions of a statute; but the question of her interest in his personal property other than her right to a distributive share thereof upon his death was not involved.

In Unger v. Mellinger, supra, the validity of a postnuptial contract was considered, and the court in its opinion speaks of the "contingent" and "inchoate" right of each spouse in the property of the other, but the character of such right in personal property was not considered. None of these cases appear to us to have decided the question presented in the case at bar.

Indiana laws dispose of his personal property during his lifetime without his wife's consent and free from any claim by her, provided it be not done in expectation of death and for the purpose of defeating her distributive right under the statute (Crawfordsville Trust Co. v. Ramsey, supra), and no statute or decision from that state has been called to our attention which provides or holds that the wife enjoys any ordinary rights of ownership in her husband's personal property during his lifetime, or has a more complete interest therein than that of an expectancy as heir if she survives him.

Appellant concedes that the property in question if governed by the California law would be the separate property of decedent and subject to his testamentary disposition; also that as a general rule the descent of personal property is governed by the laws of the state where decedent was domiciled at the time of his death; but she insists that the contract of marriage in relation to property rights should be governed, as other contracts, by the laws of the jurisdiction where it was to be carried out—in this instance by the laws of Indiana.

This doctrine has been recognized and applied in instances where rights in the property of one spouse were held to have vested at the time of the marriage. The rule is stated in Wharton on Conflict of Laws, § 193a, as follows: "While * * * it is undoubtedly true that the intestacy laws of the last domicile of the deceased govern the distribution of the personal estate of either husband or wife in case of intestacy, a distinction is to be observed between the mere inchoate rights of either spouse to share in the distribution of the other's estate at his death and a vested right which attaches at the time of marriage though its enjoyment may be postponed until the death of the other spouse." The author says further that the latter right is not divested by a change of domicile, but that a mere statute of distribution of the original matrimonial domicile, or any domicile other than the last, by which either spouse is to share in the other's personal estate upon the latter's death creates no vested right, and therefore offers no obstacle to the application of the statute of distribution of the last domicile.

Appellant in this connection cites a number of decisions. Kraemer v. Kraemer, 52 Cal. 302, holds that where there is no express contract the law of the matrimonial domicile will govern as to personal property everywhere. See, also, Estate of Drishaus, 199 Cal. 369, 249 P. 515. Bonati v. Welsch, 24 N. Y. 157, was an action by a widow to recover from her husband's estate the amount received by him from the sale of certain real property situated in France. The spouses were married and living in that country when plaintiff inherited the property from her mother. She was later abandoned by her husband, who died domiciled in New York. It appeared that by the French law the property which came to her by succession belonged to her, but that her husband had the management of it, with the right to retain the avails of the sale during the existence of the community, which terminated upon his death, whereupon she would have a valid claim against his estate. It was held that as a creditor of her husband under the laws of France her rights continued and attached to the property of her husband situated in New York.

Harral v. Harral, 39 N. J. Eq. 279, 51 Am. Rep. 17, was a similar case. The parties married and established their domicile in France without any contract as to property. By the laws of that country, where there was no contract and the marriage was followed by a conjugal domicile the property of married persons became subject to the community law. Under this law the husband, who had the management of the community property, might dispose of his share by will, but not the share of his wife to which she became entitled upon his death. After the marriage the husband became insane and was brought to the United States, where he died. It was held by reason of the above facts that his personal property became subject to the law mentioned, and that his widow was entitled to a half thereof notwithstanding that by his will he had bequeathed the whole to others.

It was held in Doss v. Campbell, 19 Ala. 590, 54 Am. Dec. 198, that where the wife acquired separate property under the laws of California and removed with it to Alabama, where she could not have acquired a separate interest in the property under the same facts, that the removal did not destroy her property interest.

So in Holmes v. Holmes, 4 Barb. (N. Y.) 295, a wife who had obtained a decree a mensa et thoro inherited a legacy from her father. Under the law then in force her husband was entitled to the legacy, which he received. A subsequent act would have made the wife the owner, but it was held that the later statute did not apply, as "the marriage of the parties and the vesting of the money were prior to the passage of the act."

In Noonan v. Kemp, 34 Md. 73, 6 Am. Rep. 307, a citizen of Maryland left a legacy to his daughter, who resided in Kentucky. The latter died before the distribution of her father's estate, leaving a husband surviving. Under the Kentucky law the husband succeeded to the entire personal estate of his deceased wife. It was held that the legacy, like any other personal property owned by the daughter, was deemed to be situated in Kentucky and governed by its laws.

Other cases declaring similar principles decided in Indiana and other jurisdictions are cited by appellant, but none involved the question presented here.

In addition she cites cases dealing with the question whether or not the provision made by law for the wife is in the nature of an inheritance and subject to a succession tax, which cases hold that such a provision is not an inheritance but belongs to her independent of any right of inheritance or succession. These cases are contrary to the California rule that upon the death of the husband the wife took one-half of the community property as heir. Estate of Moffitt, 153 Cal. 359, 95 P. 653, 1025, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 207; Estate of Dargie, 176 Cal. 720, 169 P. 360.

[3] The mere fact that under the Indiana laws (Section 3343 [3025]) the power of the husband to dispose of his personal property by will was subject to the right of his wife at her election to claim a third thereof gave her no more than an expectancy in this portion of his estate. As was held in Spreckels v. Spreckels, 116 Cal. 339, 48 P. 228, 36 L. R. A. 497, 58 Am. St. Rep. 170, such a limitation of the husband's right would give the wife no interest in his property during his lifetime. We are satisfied that appellant had no present fixed right or interest in decedent's personal estate, or more than a mere expectancy, which depended upon survivorship to become a vested right. This being true, and he having established his domicile in California, as he might do (Civ. Code, § 129), the property was subject to the law of this state, which governs its disposition and distribution whether he died testate or intestate.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

Ex parte MILLER.
Cr. 1273.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.
July 10, 1933.

I. Indictment and information ☞114.

To support judgment adjudging defendant habitual criminal, service of term in state prison following either prior conviction must be alleged in information and proven (Pen. Code, § 644).

2. Criminal law ☞1202(6).

Where information does not charge serving of sentence after prior convictions, plea of guilty does not supply deficiency as basis for adjudging defendant habitual criminal (Pen. Code, § 644).

3. Habeas corpus $\Rightarrow$ 50.

Where prisoner has not completed term for which he could be legally confined, prisoner is not entitled to writ of habeas corpus to obtain discharge on ground sentence is excessive.

Application by Conrad Miller for a writ of habeas corpus prayed to be directed to the Warden of the San Quentin Prison to secure release of petitioner on the ground of illegal detention.

Writ denied.

Conrad Miller, in pro. per.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

Mr. Justice PLUMMER delivered the opinion of the court.

The record in this case shows that the above-named petitioner was, in the superior court of the county of San Joaquin, on the 21st day of October, 1929, convicted of burglary, upon an information charging him with three counts. Each count charged the defendant with the crime of burglary in the second degree. The information also charged the defendant with having suffered two prior convictions for offenses, one committed in the county of Los Angeles and the other in the county of Kern. Following the conviction, as above stated, the defendant was adjudged to be an habitual criminal, and sentenced to the state prison for such term as should thereafter be fixed by law. Thereafter, and on or about the 27th day of August, 1932, the state board of prison terms and paroles fixed the sentence of the petitioner for life.

The record further shows that, at the time the petitioner was arraigned and pleaded to the offenses charged in the information, the plea as to the prior convictions was entered by the attorney for the petitioner as to both charges.

Basing his petition upon the provisions of section 1018 of the Penal Code, it is urged that the judgment against the petitioner is void, as said section provides that a plea of guilty can only be entered by the defendant himself.

[1] So far as the record shows by the return of the warden of the state prison at Folsom, it does not appear that the defendant was charged with having served a term in a state prison following either one of the prior convictions alleged in the information. This, of course, is necessary in order to support the rule of the court adjudging the defendant to be an habitual criminal under the provisions of section 644 of the Penal Code. This section is in its provisions similar to the provisions of sections 666, 667, and 668, which required not only conviction, but the serving of a term of imprisonment following the conviction.

[2] The Supreme Court, in the case of People v. Dawson, 210 Cal. 366, 292 P. 267, has definitely held that the information must charge the serving of the prior terms, and this must be followed by proof of the service, and that a plea of guilty only goes to the extent of the charge in the information, and, if the information does not charge the serving of sentences, the plea of guilty does not supply the deficiency, as it is only a plea of guilty of the charge contained in the information.

We do not need to enter into a discussion of whether the plea in this case conformed to the provisions of section 1018 of the Penal Code, by reason of the fact that the plea would not be any more extensive or inclusive, whether entered by the defendant or by his attorney, as in neither case would it exceed the terms of the information.

It does not follow, however, from what we have said, that the writ should be granted.

[3] Subdivision 2 of section 461 of the Penal Code provides that burglary in the second degree may be punished by imprisonment for a term not less than one year, nor more than fifteen years. As the judgment in this case was dated October 23, 1929, it is evident that the petitioner has not yet served the term for which he could be legally confined. Prior to the expiration of such date, the petitioner is not entitled to a writ directing his discharge.

The Supreme Court, in the case of In re Morck, 180 Cal. 384, 181 P. 657, held as follows: "It is the established practice of this court not to consider any question of excessive sentence until the expiration of the time for which the prisoner may be lawfully confined." Following this rule, the petitioner cannot complain of any excess of his sentence until the expiration of the time when the board of prison terms and paroles may provide for his confinement.

The writ is denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. Turney Fox, Judge.

Action by Ethel Davis against the Security-First National Bank of Los Angeles, formerly known as the Los Angeles-First National Trust & Savings Bank, and others. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals.

STEPHENS, Justice.

This is an action for the recovery of money paid on two contracts for the purchase of lots in a tract of land. The judgment went for defendant, and the plaintiff appeals.

The complaint alleges that respondent fraudulently represented that the tract in which the lots were situated would be improved in various ways, and that plaintiff, appellant here, relied upon such representations, but they were never made good; that she had received nothing and had rescinded the contract and demanded her money back.

After issue joined, appellant made demand for a jury, which demand was successfully resisted by respondents. Appellant refused to proceed to trial without a jury, and the court granted a motion for judgment of dismissal.

equity. The authorities hereinafter cited show that an action for the return of purchase money following an accomplished rescission is an action at law whether or not there is fraud in the case. The respondents base their claim that the case sounds in equity principally on Stone v. Superior Court, 214 Cal. 272, 4 P.(2d) 777, 778, 77 A. L. R. 743. Throughout this opinion we shall repeatedly refer to several leading cases, and for clarity and brevity shall first cite them in the regular manner but thereafter refer to them as the "Stone" Case, etc.

McNeese v. McNeese, 190 Cal. 402, 213 P. 36, 37, holds: "The interposition of a court of equity to set the contract aside was not necessary to rescission. A contract may be rescinded by the act of the party entitled and desiring to rescind." This case also holds that the action for the return of personal property after rescission is one in law. The holding here is authority for the principle that the presence of rescission does not itself lay the case in equity.

It may be here mentioned that no point of fraud or deceit is involved in the McNeese Case or the very recent case of Bennett v. Superior Court (Cal. Sup.) 21 P.(2d) 946, 949, but the authorities are to the effect that the mere presence of fraud and deceit with rescission does not necessarily constitute a case as sounding in equity.

Appellant insists that she has rescinded her contract and that she has brought a suit in law for the return of the money paid after failure of consideration and is entitled to submit the issues of her case to a jury. It would seem and indeed it is conceded that her contention must be sustained unless the action sounds in equity. It is hardly necessary here to argue the point that without the Stone Case and under the McNeese Case, where there is no fraud, and under Ito v. Watanabe, 213 Cal. 487, 2 P.(2d) 799, and others where there is fraud, that the action would be held to be an action at law after an accomplished rescission. Sections 1689-1691, inc., Civ. Code, Cal. We shall therefore turn our immediate attention to the question as to whether or not the Stone Case is authority in support of respondents' contention that the action here is one in equity. In other words, does it overrule the theretofore settled law on the subject? We think it does not.

In the Stone Case the court was asked to, and did, issue the writ of mandamus against the superior court to dismiss an attachment issued under the following facts: The plaintiff in Thorndike v. Stone, a case then pending in the superior court, had purchased certain shares of stock under the inducement of false, fraudulent, and deceitful representations. The stock was valueless. She promptly served notice of rescission, offered to return the stock, and demanded her money back. Defendant refused to comply, she brought suit in two counts, and the writ of attachment issued. The first count set up the facts as to false inducements, and the second count was in the form of money had and received.

The opinion holds that the count alleging the facts determines the nature of the action, and that the additional common count does not aid the plaintiff, but we have nothing to do with that here.

Much confusion has followed the following language which we quote from the opinion in that case: "The first count in the plaintiff's complaint in said action clearly and unmistakably set forth a cause of action for equitable relief arising out of a transaction which she had been induced to enter into by certain false and fraudulent misrepresentations of the defendants in said action, which are set forth with much detail in the first count of her complaint, and upon which she based the exercise of her right of rescission and her right to a recovery of the money or property with which she had parted as a result of said false and fraudulent misrepresentations. The cause of action thus set forth was essentially an action sounding in fraud and deceit, and based upon her rescission of the transaction between herself and said defendants, undertaken by her upon the discovery of said fraud and deceit. Had the plaintiff's complaint contained this first count only, it would seem to be beyond question that the plaintiff would not have been entitled to the issuance of a writ of attachment thereon." (Italics ours.)

While the language "set forth a cause for equitable relief," standing alone, might justify the conclusion that the author meant to hold the case as sounding in equity, such a conclusion is entirely negated by the opinion when read as a whole.

In considering the Stone Case, it must ever be kept in mind that the kind of action was not the issue; the issue was whether or not an attachment was proper in the case. Stanford Hotel Co. v. Schwind Co., 180 Cal. 348, 181 P. 780, as quoted in the Bennett opinion, supra, holds that the fact that a case has equitable qualities does not necessarily negative an attachment. "Hence it is not necessary in order to uphold the writ of attachment to establish the proposition that the action is either legal or equitable. What must be established is that the action is based upon contract, either express or implied, for the direct payment of money." Directly to the point is the following from the Bennett opinion: "To the same effect are Weintraub v. Superior Court, 91 Cal. App. 763, 267 P. 733, and a number of other cases. The rule is established upon well-considered authority that, if upon the examination of the complaint the gravamen of the action forces the conclusion that it is an action for the recovery of a specific sum of money upon a contract, express or implied, an attachment will issue regardless of the fact that the exercise of equitable powers of the court are also incidentally involved. In the instant case the suit is upon a contract, so far as the right of attachment is concerned, for the return of a specific sum of money by reason of failure of consideration."

It is our view that the Stone opinion is not authority for holding that that case sounds in equity, for every word of the opinion following the quoted phrase reasons to, and every case cited is authority for, the proposition that the case is an action ex delicto for fraud, an action in law. The second italicized phrase in the quoted paragraph from the Stone opinion, "an action sounding in fraud and deceit, and based upon her rescission," is held to be an action at law by every case cited in the Stone opinion in which that question is treated, and the author of the opinion was merely pointing out that it arose from some source other than contract.

Immediately after the above-quoted paragraph, the opinion comments with approval upon the case of Hallidie v. Enginger, 175 Cal. 505, 166 P. 1, which clearly and unmistakably holds that an action to recover money paid under fraud and deceit is not equitable in the sense of pleading, but falls on the law side. The point for decision was about the same in both cases. Under section 537, subd. 1, Code of Civil Procedure, an attachment may issue "In an action upon a contract, express or implied, for the direct payment of money." The appellant in the Hallidie Case contended that, even if the action be considered an action in equity, still, as it is upon an implied contract for the direct payment of money, the attachment was legal. In answer to this postulate, Mr. Justice Henshaw traced the development of pleading and arrived at the conclusion that attachments issue only in those cases which arise directly from contract and those which arise from implied contracts by relation to contract, and never by relation to facts ex delicto. The opinion in the Bennett Case, which we may add is another attachment case, states the point in unmistakable language: "Stone v. Superior Court, supra, involved the element of fraud and holds no more than that, where the gravamen of the complaint is fraud the plaintiff is not entitled to a writ of attachment, and the action is not changed where a second count is framed for money had and received if said count is based upon the same facts constituting the action on fraud. The Stone Case held strictly to the rule that an action on fraud is ex delicto, and no implied contract for the direct payment of money, or any other honest implication, could possibly be ingrafted upon a transaction that was fraudulent ab initio. [Our citations: Loaiza v. Superior Court, 85 Cal. 11, 24 P. 707, 9 L. R. A. 376, 20 Am. St. Rep. 197; Lemle v.

Barry, 181 Cal. 1, 183 P. 150.] In fact, fraud vitiates everything, and there can be no contractual relations between the defrauder and the defrauded. * * * The weight of the decisions of this state is to the effect that, where the foundation of the action is a demand for equitable relief the attachment will not issue, but, as the authorities state, where some exercise of equitable powers, as in settling accounts and striking a balance, is incidentally involved in the action, the writ will issue if the pleadings warrant it"—citing Hallidie and other cases. By the latter part of this quotation and by the Hallidie Case it will be seen that the expression "set forth a cause of action for equitable relief" does not necessarily mean that the case sounds in equity, for a case may have incidental equitable phases to it and yet sound in law.

The very next case considered in the Stone opinion is San Francisco Iron & Metal Co. v. Abraham, 211 Cal. 552, 296 P. 82, 83, an action in deceit and also an attachment case. The court says, after the statement of fact, "The foregoing facts show that the plaintiff's grievance is a tort and under our statute it [the plaintiff corporation] was not entitled to an attachment. Code Civ. Proc. § 537; Hallidie v. Enginger, 175 Cal. 505, 166 P. 1."

The next case considered is Powers v. Freeland, 114 Cal. App. 146, 299 P. 736, and the Stone opinion states it is "precisely in point." This case is a deceit case, and the opinion denominates the case as one in tort.

It strikes us with considerable force that immediately after citing and quoting from these cases the writer of the Stone opinion came directly to his reasoned conclusion. This conclusion, as one would expect it to be, is entirely consistent with all of the cited cases and none of them say the case sounds in equity. They all say they sound in fraud and deceit, which we have seen is an action in law (also see Stephan v. Superior Court, 183 Cal. 673, 192 P. 1083). We quote the concluding paragraph referred to: "From the foregoing review of the authorities, it would seem to be clear that the plaintiff's real cause of action in the case of Thorndike v. Stone, was an action sounding in fraud and deceit, and that to such a cause of action the provisions of section 537 of the Code of Civil Procedure, providing for the issuance of writs of attachment in proper cases, can be given no application." (Italics ours.) Nowhere in the opinion does the author say the cause sounds in equity, but twice he says "it sounds in fraud and deceit." Unless it is necessary, it would be doing the able, learned, and experienced lawyer and judge, Mr. Justice Richards, the author of the opinion, a great injustice to construe the opinion exactly opposite to the doctrine expressed in every opinion he cited, to the point under consideration, and the same can be said for the Chief Justice and the two associate justices who concur in the opinion. The meaning of the language that has misdirected so many able jurists is admirably explained by a historic quotation in Jensen v. Culver (Cal. Super.) 15 P.(2d) 907, 909: "Rather we see in the expression, 'a cause of action for equitable relief,' [referring to the phrase as quoted from the Stone Case] a present day application of the thought expressed by Lord Mansfield in Moses v. MacFerlan (1760) 2 Burrows, 1005, where, delivering the opinion of a court dealing only with cases at law, he held that an action on the case for money had and received was proper, saying: 'This kind of equitable action, to recover back money, which ought not in justice to be kept, is very beneficial, and therefore much encouraged * * * the gist of this kind of action is, that the defendant, upon the circumstances of the case, is obliged by the ties of natural justice and equity to refund the money.'"

[2, 3] If this is not the sense in which the questioned expression is used, then we must find that the opinion gives two inconsistent reasons for the decision in the case. If two inconsistent reasons are given for a decision and courts cannot follow one without disregarding the other, they will follow the one, if such there is, that is unequivocal in meaning and is in accord with the settled doctrine. Courts will not follow a new course that leads only to confusion unless it is apparent that the higher court intended to reverse the former doctrine. Of course, we should not find the decision inconsistent unless the language used drives us to it. We conclude that the Stone Case is consistent with and does not overrule the leading cases and the settled law as to the nature of an action for the return of money or property after rescission of a contract by a party thereto.

If we now apply these principles to the instant case, we see that the claim for the return of the purchase money is not based directly upon a contract to return it nor yet upon an obligation which arose from or out of a contract to return it. It is based directly and arises out of tortious facts, viz.: The false representations of inducement. Upon this point alone was the attachment declared wrong in the Hallidie Case, and upon this point alone can the Stone Case be found consistent with itself.

Unquestionably the learned judge in the instant case was misled by the ill-starred language of the Stone Case, and he was not alone in that. The Court of Appeal was assertedly following the Stone Case when the Bennett Case was before it. The cases of Ingalls v. Superior Court, 121 Cal. App. 453, 9 P.(2d) 266, a case comparable to the instant case in principle, and Fair View Farms Co. v. Superior Court, 123 Cal. App. 9, 10 P.(2d) 1011, comparable to the McNeese Case (no fraud), cite Stone v. Superior Court, supra, as authority. The Court of Appeal in Ryker v. Lindenberg, 20 P.(2d) 763, did likewise, and that case is now before the Supreme Court for hearing. Taback v. Greenberg, 108 Cal. App. 759, 292 P. 279, decided prior to the Stone Case, takes the opposite view. In Jensen v. Culver (Cal. Super.) 15 P.(2d) 907, the point of the municipal court's assuming jurisdiction of an action for money paid as consideration for a contract alleged to have been secured by fraud was under consideration. The money judgment prayed for was within the court's jurisdiction and the complaint alleged rescission of the contract which had been obtained by fraud. The court construed the Stone Case substantially as we have done in the instant case. Culver v. Superior Court (Cal. App.) 19 P.(2d) 43, is another phase of Jensen v. Culver, supra, and it followed that case. We hope this opinion may be helpful in clearing up the confusion that followed the Stone Case.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the superior court to proceed to a trial of the case before a jury.

ARCHBALD, Justice pro tem.

I concur. I agree with Justice STEPHENS that, in view of the statements in Stone v. Superior Court, 214 Cal. 272, 4 P.(2d) 777, 778, 77 A. L. R. 743, to the effect that the first count in the complaint involved there was "essentially an action sounding in fraud and deceit," which statements are so fundamentally opposed to the confusing statement that such count "clearly and unmistakably set[s] forth a cause of action for equitable relief," such latter statement cannot be applied to a similar complaint so as to place it on the equity side of a court, thus denying to a plaintiff his right to a jury trial. That the Supreme Court does not intend it to be so applied appears from the case of Bennett v. Superior Court, 21 P.(2d) 946, as Justice STEPHENS has shown.

That the language in the first count of the complaint in the Stone Case has allegations that necessarily would be in a complaint for equitable relief under such facts is indisputable. Under many sets of facts law and equity have concurrent jurisdictions. The essential difference between the pleadings in such cases of concurrent jurisdiction is in the relief afforded. In a court of law, based on facts as shown in the Stone Case and this, the relief is by way of judgment for a sum of money either by way of damages for the fraud and deceit, or, in case of rescission, on the contract the law implies to pay back the money obtained by such fraud. If the case is in equity, the appeal must be for some relief peculiar to equity which the law cannot afford. There was no such appeal either in the Stone Case or in the case before us. Blackstone said, many years ago: "The want of a more specific remedy than can be obtained in the courts of law gives a concurrent jurisdiction to a court of equity in a great variety of cases. To instance in executory agreements. A court of equity will compel them to be carried into strict execution unless where it is impossible or improper; instead of giving damages for their non-performance. * * * So waste, and other similar injuries, a court of equity takes a concurrent cognizance, in order to prevent them by injunction. Over questions that may be tried at law, in a great multiplicity of actions, a court of equity assumes a jurisdiction to prevent the expense and vexation of endless litigation and suits. In various kinds of frauds it assumes a concurrent jurisdiction, not only for the sake of a discovery, but of a more extensive and specific relief; as by setting aside fraudulent deeds, decreeing reconveyances or directing an absolute conveyance merely to stand as security." Book III, c. xxvii, p. 438, vol. II, Cooley's Blackstone (4th Ed.) p. 1183.

WORKS, Presiding Justice.

I dissent, and for the purpose of indicating the grounds of my disapproval of the majority opinion I here set down an opinion prepared by myself, before the writing of the opinion by Justice STEPHENS, in the vain hope that it might receive the concurrence of my associates:

In this action for a recovery because of fraudulent misrepresentations leading to the execution of contracts for the purchase of lands, judgment went for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

The complaint alleges that the agreements were for the purchase of two parcels situate in a certain tract of land which respondent corporations had placed on the market. The pleading is in two counts, each based upon one of the two contracts referred to. We shall quote from but one of the counts, as the two are alike in all respects which are material here. It is alleged "that the defendants for the purpose of inducing plaintiff to enter into the aforesaid agreement * * * falsely and fraudulently represented to plaintiff that a large, attractive and expensive clubhouse would be built on the tract of which the above-described lot was a part and parcel, and that the building of said clubhouse would greatly enhance the value of said above-described lot; that the defendants * * * further falsely and fraudulently represented to plaintiff that certain streets, driveways, pavements, sidewalks, water and sewers would be placed in and on the tract of which the above-described lot is a part and parcel, all of which, as represented, would greatly enhance the value of the above-described lot, and that plaintiff would in a few months and within a year at most, be able to realize a great profit on the said so-called investment." The complaint also contains the following paragraph: "That defendants in order further to deceive plaintiff and to induce her to enter into the contract aforesaid stated and represented to her that an architect had been sent to Europe to study the latest and most up-to-date type of Spanish architecture to the end that the said clubhouse * * * would be of the most modern type of Spanish architecture, and thereby greatly enhance the value of the above-described lot which plaintiff agreed to purchase. And in this connection plaintiff states that it is her belief and upon this belief she alleges that defendants did not send and did not intend to send an architect to Europe or elsewhere for the purpose of studying Spanish architecture or any other architecture in connection with the said clubhouse, but plaintiff states that it is her belief and upon this belief she alleges that said representations as to Spanish architecture and architects abroad were made for the sole purpose of deceiving plaintiff as alleged herein." It is alleged further that plaintiff relied upon the representations made to her and signed the contract as a consequence thereof. It is also averred in the complaint: "That defendants and their agents well knew at the time of making the representations aforesaid, that said improvements would not be made and placed upon the tract of which the above-described lot is a part and parcel, * * * and knew at the time of making said representations that the same were false and untrue and that plaintiff did not know that said representations were false, but believed them to be true, and relied thereon, and was deceived thereby; and that plaintiff purchased said lot believing said representations to be true." The pleading alleges that plaintiff had received nothing of value under the contract. It is also alleged that, when the time had passed for the promised making of the improvements, appellant ceased paying installments under the contract and notified respondents that she rescinded it. The prayer demanded judgment for a certain sum of money, being the total of the amounts paid by appellant under the two contracts.

Appellant in due form made demand for a jury in the trial court. Respondents then gave notice of motion "to strike the demand of the plaintiff for a jury herein and to remove the trial of the above-entitled cause to a nonjury department on the ground that the cause of action herein is an equitable one and not triable by a jury." The motion was later made and it was by the court granted. The minutes of the court, after referring to the motion, recite: "* * * Which motion is granted and plaintiff refuses to proceed to trial without a jury. Thereupon defendants move the court to dismiss the action on the ground that the plaintiff refuses to proceed without a jury and the motion is granted and a judgment of dismissal is ordered." Judgment was thereupon accordingly rendered.

Appellant insists that the action is one at law, and in support of her view cites several cases, among them McNeese v. McNeese, 190 Cal. 402, 213 P. 36. We think, however, that the disposition of the appeal must be governed by a comparatively recent decision of the Supreme Court and not by the cases cited. The facts disclosed by this later pronouncement, so far as the question whether the action was one at law or was a suit in equity is concerned, are not distinguishable from those of the present action. The basic question involved in the decision was whether an attachment could issue in the action. There is language in the opinion which shows that the plaintiff could not have the writ because the cause sounded in tort and not in contract. The court said, in addition, however, that the count of the complaint principally in question "clearly and unmistakably set forth a cause of action for equitable relief arising out of a transaction which she [plaintiff] had been induced to enter into by certain false and fraudulent misrepresentations of the defendants in said action." Stone v. Superior Court, 214 Cal. 272, 4 P. (2d) 777, 778, 77 A. L. R. 743.

Since the present appeal was briefed, and quite recently, the Supreme Court has announced a decision which bears upon the question now before us. The case is Bennett v. Superior Court (Cal. Sup.) 21 P.(2d) 946, 950. There is a concurring opinion following the main opinion of the court. At the beginning of this concurrence the assertion is made: "I concur in the conclusion reached in this opinion, but I think it should do expressly what it does in effect, namely, overrule the case of Stone v. Superior Court, 214 Cal. 272, 4 P.(2d) 777, 77 A. L. R. 743." The special concurrence was joined in by a justice other than its author. With great respect for the two justices, we cannot think that the decision overrules the Stone Case. Bennett v. Superior Court is another of those actions in which the basic question was whether the plaintiff was entitled to the writ of attachment. Before the action was commenced, as in the Stone Case, the plaintiffs by due notice had rescinded their contract with the defendants. In its decision in the Bennett Case the Supreme Court decided that an attachment was proper for the reason that the rescission had been made because of a failure of consideration and not upon the ground of fraud, which latter, as we have remarked above, was the case in the Stone action. In the Bennett Case the court determined, because the rescission was on the ground of a failure of consideration, that the action sounded in contract. The decision in the Stone Case was to the effect, for the reason that the rescission was on the ground of fraud, both that the action sounded in tort and that it was a suit in equity. Despite the assertion in the concurring opinion in the Bennett Case, the main opinion shows an intent to preserve the doctrine of the Stone Case, the prototype of the one now before us. It is said, for instance, in the Bennett opinion, immediately after a mention of the Stone Case and after a statement of what it decided: "The transaction in the instant case is strictly one arising out of contract. No claim is made that the contract was vitiated by fraud, or that fraud entered into the transaction in the slightest degree. It is a question solely of failure of consideration." And again: "The entire transaction sounds in contract. The ex delicto doctrine has no application to the case." Further, in commenting upon Stanford Hotel v. Schwind, 180 Cal. 348, 181 P. 780, it was said: "The court points out that in that case, as in the instant case, there was no suggestion that fraud entered into the making of the contract." And finally: "We do not regard Stone v. Superior Court, supra, as being in conflict with the cases last above cited [among which was McNeese v. McNeese, 190 Cal. 402, 213 P. 36], inasmuch as the question whether an attachment will lie in an action brought after rescission to recover back money paid under a contract wherein the consideration had failed was not in that [the Stone] case."

The present action is a suit in equity, and appellant was not entitled to a jury trial.

I think the judgment should be affirmed.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM.

[4, 5] In their petition for rehearing respondents bring to our attention two points not touched upon in the majority opinion, being obscured by the interest in the question decided therein. We adhere to the decision expressed in the majority opinion that this case is a law action and that a trial by jury was erroneously denied by the lower court. Respondents urge that appellant's failure to except to the ruling of the trial court striking appellant's demand for a jury was a waiver of her objection and an acquiescence in such ruling, and that she suffered no prejudice by such denial.

The motion to strike was based solely on the ground that the case is in equity and not triable by a jury, and on plaintiff's refusal to proceed without a jury the judgment of dismissal was entered. All of such facts are shown in the judgment and appear in the judgment roll, and consequently so appear in the record before us. Sichler v. Look, 93 Cal. 600, 29 P. 220. The only purpose of a bill of exceptions is to enable appellate courts to review errors in law which do not appear on the face of the record, and "that which is a record already, cannot receive any higher degree of sanction by being made record a second time." Parsons v. Davis, 3 Cal. 421, 425.

[6, 7] Trial by jury in civil actions, unless waived as prescribed by law, is a constitutional right. Section 7, art. 1, Const. of California. If, as we think, the instant case is a civil action, appellant's constitutional right was denied and finally determined by the order which the court made. Such order was an "interlocutory order * * * finally determining the rights" of appellant, and under section 647 of the Code of Civil Procedure is deemed to have been excepted to. Being a constitutional right, it is to be presumed that prejudice resulted from the denial.

Petition for rehearing denied.

WORKS, P. J., dissents from the order denying a rehearing.

PEOPLE v. EGAN et al.

Cr. 2342.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

July 3, 1933.

1. Homicide $\S$ 253(1).

Evidence sustained conviction for first-degree murder.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 371(4, 12).

Where questions of existence of conspiracy and of motive and intent of defendants prosecuted for murder committed during robbery were material, evidence of other crimes of same kind and perpetrated with peculiar similarity held admissible.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 369(2).

Statements, made in defendant's presence and not denied by him, showing participation in crime charged, held not inadmissible because statements showed similar participation in other like crimes of violence.

4. Criminal law $\S$ 407(2).

Defendant's failure to deny accusatory statements is indicative of consciousness of guilt.

5. Criminal law $\S$ 622(1).

Parties jointly charged with crime cannot as matter of right demand separate trials, but matter is left to court's discretion (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1098).

6. Criminal law $\S$ 622(1).

That defendants jointly charged with first-degree murder committed during robbery were denied separate trials held not abuse of discretion (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1098).

7. Criminal law $\S$ 519(4).

That statement was made while defendant was under arrest did not take away its voluntary character, established by evidence, nor render it inadmissible.

8. Criminal law $\S$ 525.

That defendant was shot just before statement was made and was possibly not in full possession of his faculties went to weight and not admissibility of statement.

9. Criminal law $\S$ 519(4).

Confession made by defendant to officers at hospital to which defendant, shot at time of arrest, was taken, held properly admitted in prosecution for murder committed during robbery.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Isaac Pacht, Judge.

Dallas Egan, Homer D. Rogers, and George Henry Turcott were charged with murder of the first degree. During the course of the trial, defendant Egan changed his plea to guilty, and the trial proceeded against the codefendants. Defendants Rogers and Turcott were convicted as charged, and they appeal.

Affirmed.

George B. Bush, Gladys Towles Root, and Philip C. Farman, all of Los Angeles, for appellant Rogers.

William I. O'Shaughnessy, of San Francisco, for appellant Turcott.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Lionel Browne, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

ARCHBALD, Justice pro tem.

Defendants were tried before a jury on a joint information charging one Dallas Egan and themselves with the crime of murder. Egan was also charged with four prior convictions and Turcott with one. During the course of the trial Egan changed his plea to "guilty" and the trial proceeded against his codefendants. The jury returned a verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree as to defendant Rogers, fixing the punishment at life imprisonment with recommendation of leniency. As to Turcott, the jury returned a similar verdict without recommendation of leniency. From the judgments of conviction entered upon said verdicts and from orders denying their respective motions for a new trial, each defendant has appealed.

On July 23, 1932, three men entered the Broder jewelry store in Los Angeles and robbed the establishment. During the robbery William J. Kirkpatrick, an elderly man, was shot and killed. The three robbers then left the store and escaped in an automobile with two confederates, one of whom had acted as lookout man, while the other stayed at the wheel of the car while the crime was being perpetrated. Three of the men involved were white, one a negro, and the other a Mexican.

Appellant Rogers contends that the court erred: (1) In permitting the introduction of evidence of other crimes in which it is urged he did not participate and which it is contended are not connected with or pertinent to the one involved here; (2) in admitting statements of defendant Turcott as to such other crimes, and accusatory statements of one Lamey and defendant Egan in the presence of Rogers; and (3) in denying his motion for a separate trial; and (4) that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict.

Appellant Turcott urges: (a) That the admission of statements made by him to W. C. Burris was erroneous in that at the time such statements were made this appellant was unable to comprehend them; (b) that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict in that excluding "the so-called confession" there is no evidence connecting him with the crime; and that the court erred (c) in admitting such confessions because they were not shown to have been free and voluntary but were obtained by a promise and for a consideration; and (d) in admitting testimony as to other crimes without proof of the existence of a conspiracy.

[1] (1), (2), and (4). One witness testified that she was trying to park her car in the vicinity of the jewelry store at the time of the robbery and noticed a "brown car" with "a kind of a rumble seat in the back" parked in front of a radio store near the jewelry store; that it was "moving back and forth," one man at the wheel and another on the sidewalk by the front wheel; that she heard a shot and that three men ran out of the jewelry store and jumped into the brown car; that the man standing on the sidewalk also jumped into the car. Mr. McCormick, proprietor of the radio store, testified that he saw an Oakland cabriolet, "tan color," in front of his store at the time of the robbery, "rocking to and fro from the curb at an angle," with some one in the driver's seat, and that defendant "Rogers was standing there, one hand on the door"; that he heard two shots, rushed out on the sidewalk, and saw two men with guns running toward him and the cabriolet; that one of them said "move," whereupon the witness ran into his store; that he saw Rogers jump in the car, following the shooting. In addition to the foregoing there was evidence showing that Egan, who, it will be remembered, was jointly charged with appellants, followed by two men, one white and one colored, entered the jewelry store at the time in question, and with guns compelled the proprietor and his clerk to hold up their hands, "took pillow cases out of their pockets and started to empty jewelry" into them from the showcases; that Kirkpatrick entered and was shot in the head, dying from the effect thereof. At the time of Rogers' arrest a car was found, which he said his father owned but that he (Rogers) "had used it most of the time," and which answered the description of the car used in the robbery. Photographs of this machine were identified by witnesses as a fair representation of the automobile used at that time. There would seem to be sufficient evidence to support the verdict and judgment as to appellant Rogers.

After properly instructing the jury that it was only to be taken as against the defendant Rogers, the court admitted evidence of a statement made by defendant Egan, in Rogers' presence, which was to the effect that Rogers was with them in the jewelry store robbery at which Kirkpatrick was killed, that Rogers' car was used, and that Rogers stayed outside with the car and was given his share of the proceeds of the robbery, to which statement Rogers said nothing. Against both appellants, a statement made to the police officers by Turcott, in the presence of Rogers, was read in evidence, to the effect that Rogers was not only with them in the robbery of the jewelry store but that he went with them to San Bernardino on a trip when they planned to hold up a bank but did not execute the plan, and in which his car was used as well as a stolen La Salle; that about a week before the jewelry store robbery they held up an office of the Bureau of Water and Power in Los Angeles, using the ever-present Oakland car belonging to Rogers; that Rogers was with them at the time and sat behind the wheel of the car waiting while the holdup was being perpetrated, afterwards taking his "split" of the money, the others present being Egan and Alvarado, the Mexican, of the jewelry store robbery. During the making of such charges Rogers "stood mute." Although Turcott confessed to his part in the robbery of the jewelry store which resulted in the killing of Kirkpatrick, he was not identified by any prosecution witness.

A statement made by one Lamey in the presence of Rogers and some officers was also introduced in evidence, in which Lamey said that he met the parties in San Bernardino at the time mentioned in Turcott's statement, having gone there from Los Angeles for that purpose; that he rode in the "Oakland car" in San Bernardino while Rogers was driving it; and that Rogers told him that he, Rogers, drove the car on the jewelry robbery job and that a man was killed. After the statement was made an officer asked Rogers if his name "was Homer Rogers and he said yes." Asked if he wanted to make any statement then, Rogers said he "didn't have any statement to make."

Following the introduction of such statements in evidence, testimony of the robbery of the office of the Los Angeles Gas & Electric Company was admitted, showing that an Oakland car resembling that driven by Rogers was used, one man remaining outside with the automobile during the commission of the crime. Other witnesses identified Egan as one of the robbers. The same is true as to a robbery of the Lakeview Creamery, participated in by four men who drove up in an Oakland car resembling that used by Rogers, three of them, two identified as Egan and Turcott, and the third a Mexican or negro, entering the place and perpetrating the crime while the fourth remained at the wheel of the machine. There is abundant other evidence showing the close association, as well as participation in such events, of Egan, Turcott, Rogers, Alvarado, the Mexican, and Johnson, a negro, from the holdup of the Bureau of Water and Power office to the robbery of the Bank of America branch on August 24, 1930, during which Alvarado and Johnson were killed. The day following the last affair Egan and Turcott were arrested in a room together and Rogers at his home, and pictures were taken of the ever-present Oakland car, identified by various witnesses as being present at different jobs done by various members of the group. Evidence as to the holdup of the branch office of the Bureau of Water and Power, as well as the Bank of America branch, was limited by the court to defendant Turcott alone, although as stated the Oakland car was shown to be present at the Bureau of Water and Power job and the Turcott statement showed Rogers' participation as driver.

[2] With respect to appellant Rogers, so far as the evidence shows, his participation was as lookout man and driver of the car, in the robbery resulting in the murder mentioned here. The question of his motive and intent was material. In addition, this evidence would seem to show the existence of a continuing conspiracy to perpetrate robberies, and kill if necessary. Turcott made the statement that he was as guilty of the killing of Kirkpatrick as Egan, as he would have killed him if Egan had not, and the evidence shows that he shot a man in the robbery of the branch of the Bank of America. They were acts of the same kind and perpetrated with peculiar similarity, which in our opinion sheds light upon the offense here under consideration. The court properly admitted evidence of such other crimes. People v. Arnold, 199 Cal. 471, 486, 250 P. 168; People v. Lapierre, 205 Cal. 462, 468, 271 P. 497; People v. Wilson, 76 Cal. App. 688, 245 P. 781. Furthermore, the court instructed the jurors that evidence of similar offenses was to be considered by them only for the purpose of proving motive or intent on the part of defendants, or a possible conspiracy on their part to commit the crime charged, and that whether or not such other offenses were committed by either defendant was for their exclusive determination.

[3, 4] In view of the foregoing we see no merit in the contention of appellant Rogers (2) that the court erred in admitting the statements of Turcott and Lamey, which, in addition to showing participation in the crime charged here, may have shown similar participation in other like crimes of violence. Failure to deny such accusatory statements is indicative of "consciousness of guilt on the part of the accused by allowing an imputation opposed to the presumption of innocence to pass unchallenged." People v. Yeager, 194 Cal. 452, 229 P. 40, 54.

[5, 6] (3) Parties jointly charged cannot as a matter of right demand separate trials. Section 1098, Pen. Code. The section cited leaves the matter to the discretion of the court, and we fail to see where there was any abuse thereof. See People v. Wilson, supra.

[7-9] (A) At the time of Turcott's arrest he was shot, the bullet cutting the head of his penis and passing through his groin, lodging in his hip. At the hospital he made a statement to officer Burris, which was introduced in evidence against him, in which he admitted that he was in several of the "jobs" already mentioned, as well as others, that he was in the Bank of America holdup, and that he shot the banker with the gun found under his pillow at the time of his arrest.

The fact that the statement was made while under arrest did not take away its voluntary character, which the evidence clearly shows, or render it inadmissible; and the evidence showing that he was shot just before, and possibly not in full possession of his faculties, goes to the weight to be given such statement and not to its admissibility. People v. Miller, 135 Cal. 69, 67 P. 12. And the court left to the jury the question whether or not he was in such a mental and physical condition as to understand the questions and "knew what he was being asked and what he was saying." We see no error in admitting such statement, nor (c) in admitting the confession which Turcott later made to the officers at the hospital.

Nor do we see any merit in appellant Turcott's contentions (b) that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict against him, and that the court erred (d) in admitting testimony of other crimes under the relationship shown by the evidence.

Judgments and orders affirmed.

KELLNER et al. v. WITTE et al.

Civ. 1214.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

July 10, 1933.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 6,
1933.

1. Negligence ⇐6.

Violation of statute is negligence per se.

2. Appeal and error ⇐1001(2).

Where there is any substantial evidence sustaining implied finding of jury, it will not be disturbed, even though appellate court believes preponderance of evidence supports opposite conclusion.

3. Automobiles ⇐245(78, 79).

Whether motorist colliding with truck was contributorily negligent because of excessive speed, or in not driving as closely to right edge of highway as possible, or in not maintaining lookout, held for jury (St. 1923, p. 553, § 113 (d), as added by St. 1931, p. 2120, § 34; St. 1923, p. 557, § 122 (b), as amended by St. 1931, p. 2124, § 41).

4. Appeal and error ⇐1050(1).

Evidence ⇐222(10).

Admitting driver's statement made at coroner's inquest held error as to employer sued with driver for motorist's death, but not prejudicial, where same statements were used to impeach driver testifying for employer without objection and no limiting instruction was requested.

5. Evidence ⇐241(1).

Statements of employee not in presence of employer and not res gestæ are inadmissible against employer, though admissible against employee as declarations against interest.

Action by Lotta L. Kellner and another against August Witte and another. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Ray W. Hays, of Fresno, for appellants.

Willebrandt, Horowitz & McCloskey, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

MARKS, Justice.

Lotta L. Kellner is the widow, and Jessica R. Kellner is the daughter, of Louis Kellner, deceased. They brought this action to recover damages for his death which resulted from a collision between an automobile which he was driving in a southerly direction on the state highway and a truck belonging to the appellant August Witte and driven by his employee, Joseph J. Seale, in a northerly direction on this highway. The accident occurred about 18 miles north of the city of Bakersfield. The highway rises on a slight grade for several hundred feet northerly from the point of impact. At that place the paved portion of the road was 30 feet in width, with a dirt shoulder on each side.

The accident happened about 4 o'clock on the afternoon of August 25, 1931. The day was clear. J. A. Root was driving northerly on the highway with his wife and daughter in a coupé at a speed of between 25 and 30 miles an hour. His left wheels were about 4 feet easterly from the center line of the highway. The truck, driven by Seale, gradually overtook the Root automobile and tried to pass. It could not make a speed in excess of 35 miles an hour. During his attempt to pass the Root automobile, the Kellner car and the truck came into collision.

Appellants rely on two grounds for a reversal of the judgment: First, that Kellner was guilty of contributory negligence; and, second, that the trial court erroneously overruled their objections and admitted in evidence statements of Seale as to how the accident occurred, without instructing the jury that the statements could not be considered as evidence against Witte, who was not present when they were made.

They rest their claim of contributory negligence on the part of Kellner upon three grounds: First, that he was driving at a high rate of speed and in excess of 45 miles per hour; second, that he was driving near the center line of the road and not near his right-hand edge of the highway; and third, that he did not maintain a lookout for obstructions ahead.

As is usual in cases of this kind, the evidence and reasonable inferences to be drawn from it are conflicting. There is ample evidence in the record to sustain the conclusion that Kellner was guilty of negligence which directly and proximately contributed to his injury and death, had the jury so found in reaching its verdict. However, as the jury reached a contrary conclusion, it is only necessary for us to determine whether there is any evidence to support its implied finding that the negligence of Kellner did not contribute to the accident and his subsequent death. In discussing this phase of the case, we will only summarize such evidence as tends to support this finding of the jury.

We have studied the record, and are satisfied that it must be conceded that Kellner was driving his automobile considerably in excess of 45 miles per hour at the time of the accident and on his right-hand side of the road with his left wheels about 2 feet to his right of the center line of the highway until he reached a point between 25 and 50 feet from the place of impact. The evidence would justify the conclusion that during this last distance he swerved to his right in an effort to avoid the collision. When the truck and automobile came to rest after the collision, the right-hand wheels of the automobile were in the dirt shoulder of the highway westerly from the pavement. The truck was headed in a northwesterly direction, with its left rear wheel at about the center line of the pavement. Its left front wheel was on top of the Kellner car in front of the driver's seat, and about 2 feet easterly from the westerly edge of the pavement. The truck was about 22 feet in length, and had a bed a little over 7 feet in width.

[1] It is well settled in California that violation of a statute is negligence per se. However, since the addition of subdivision (d) to section 113 of the California Vehicle Act (Stats. 1931, pp. 2120, 2121, § 34), speeds in excess of those prescribed in subdivision (b) of the same section may not be considered negligence as a matter of law, but "the burden shall be upon the opposing party to establish that the operation of such vehicle at such speed constituted negligence." Before the adoption of this subdivision, it was held that the question of whether excessive speed amounting to negligence per se on the part of the driver of an automobile contributed to his injury was a question of fact to be decided by the jury in the ordinary accident case. Skaggs v. Wiley, 108 Cal. App. 429, 292 P. 132; Hepner v. Libby, McNeill & Libby, 114 Cal. App. 747, 300 P. 830; Shannon v. Fleishhacker, 116 Cal. App. 258, 2 P.(2d) 835; Blodget v. Preston, 118 Cal. App. 297, 5 P.(2d) 25; Morehead v. Rochm, 118 Cal. App. 312, 4 P.(2d) 995; Klemko v. Ryer, 118 Cal. App. 238, 4 P.(2d) 998.

Subdivision (b) of section 122 of the California Vehicle Act (as amended by St. 1931, p. 2124, § 41), provides that, under ordinary circumstances, the operator of a motor vehicle shall drive it as closely as practicable to his right-hand edge of the highway. Whether a failure to observe this provision is negligence that contributed to the injury of a driver in an ordinary accident case has been held to be a question of fact to be decided by the jury. McLellan v. Coca-Cola (Cal. App.) 24 P.(2d) 200; Gayton v. Pacific Fruit Express Co., 127 Cal. App. 50, 15 P.(2d) 217.

[2, 3] There is ample evidence in the record supporting the contention of appellants that, had the deceased maintained a lookout, he would have seen the truck in his path and could have avoided the accident by reducing his speed and swerving his automobile to his right. However, the rule is well settled in this state that, where there is any substantial evidence sustaining an implied finding of a jury, it will not be disturbed on appeal, even though it seems to the appellate court that a preponderance of the evidence would support the opposite conclusion. There is evidence in the record which would support the conclusion that Seale turned his truck sharply to his left and onto his left-hand side of the center of the pavement and into the path of the Kellner car when it was within a distance of from 150 to 200 feet from him. J. A. Root testified that just before the collision another automobile passed the Kellner car several hundred yards to the north of the place of the impact. He further testified as follows:

"Q. Where was this truck when the first car passed you, how far behind you? A. He was right back at me.

"Q. He was right back of you when the first car passed you? A. Yes, sir. I should think that this man pulled out around him, he started to go around me and this car missed him.

"Q. You mean the truck had already pulled around you? A. I hadn't seen him.

"Q. You don't know where the truck was when the first car passed you? A. No.

"Q. Except that it was close behind you? A. Yes, the truck was.

"Q. Well, this is the picture. At the time the first car passed you or even with you, that the truck driven by Mr. Seale was right behind you and the car driven by Mr. Kellner was fifty or sixty yards to the north, that is right? A. Yes, sir. Coming down towards me.

"Q. Were you watching this truck at all when it pulled around you? A. Yes, sir."

From this evidence and from the other evidence indicating the positions of the two vehicles when they came to rest after the collision, we must conclude that the jury was of the opinion that, when Kellner was less than 200 feet from the Root car, Seale turned the truck sharply to his left to pass the Root automobile, and onto his left side of the road and into the path of deceased's automobile, and that this was the proximate cause of the accident and the death of Kellner. There being evidence to support this conclusion, we cannot disturb it on appeal.

[4, 5] Seale was not present in the court below during the time respondents were putting on their case in chief. They desired to call him for cross-examination under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but were not able to do so. He had appeared as a witness at the coroner's inquest. Over the objection of appellant Witte that the evidence could not bind him, respondents were permitted to introduce in evidence statements made by Seale while a witness at the inquest. This ruling of the trial court was error. It is well settled that statements made by an employee not in the presence of his employer, and which are not part of the res gestæ, are not admissible in evidence against the employer, though admissible against the employee as declarations against his interest. However, under the facts here presented, we do not consider this error sufficiently prejudicial to require a reversal of the judgment. Seale subsequently appeared as a witness and was cross-examined by respondents. Practically the same portions of the transcript of the coroner's inquest were used to impeach his testimony that had been referred to in the testimony introduced by respondents in chief. No objection was made by Witte to the use of the transcript on cross-examination nor did he request an instruction that the statements of Seale could not be considered as binding upon him when made out of his presence and not a part of the res gestæ. We have concluded this cured the former error.

Judgment affirmed.

Lloyd Kausen was convicted of assault with intent to commit murder, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

Thomas Cotter, of Eureka, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

Mr. Justice PLUMMER delivered the opinion of the court.

The defendant was convicted in the county of Humboldt of the crime of assault with intent to commit murder. From the order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial, and the judgment entered upon such conviction, the defendant appeals.

Three informations were filed against the defendant charging him with the crime of assault with intent to commit murder upon three different persons. These informations were consolidated and one trial was had upon all three. The defendant was convicted of making an assault with intent to commit murder upon the person of Aileen Kausen, and this conviction is the only one involved upon this appeal.

The record shows that on or about the 25th day of December, 1932, the defendant entered the room occupied by Aileen Kausen, between the hours of 9 and 10 p. m., and severely beat Mrs. Kausen with a flash-light then in his possession. It appears from the testimony that the defendant and Aileen Kausen were husband and wife, but had been separated for some time, and that Mrs. Kausen had obtained an interlocutory decree of divorce. At the time of the assault Mrs. Kausen was living in an apartment situate in the rear of a house occupied by her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Davis, in the city of Eureka. Prior to entering the room occupied by Mrs. Kausen, the record shows that the defendant, who had been living on a farm situate several miles from Eureka, drove to Eureka on the afternoon of December 25th, and after arriving there, continued to drive about the streets of Eureka in the neighborhood of the Davis home, and after being satisfied that Mr. Davis was away from home, parked his car a block or two distant from the Davis residence, proceeded to the rear of the residence, removed his shoes, and entered the apartment of Mrs. Kausen. The apartment was entered without knocking and without any noise or disturbance being made by the defendant. At the time of the entry of the apartment, Mrs. Kausen was lying in bed. A noise of some sort arousing her, she made an exclamation, and upon discovering who was present, told the defendant to leave. The defendant claims he entered the apartment for a peaceful purpose, to wit, to induce Mrs. Kausen to give up her intention of securing a divorce and return to his home. The testimony, how-

1. Homicide $\hookrightarrow$ 257(8).

Evidence that defendant, with heavy flash-light, severely beat wife who had obtained interlocutory divorce decree, threatened intent to kill her, and attempted to choke her, supported conviction of assault with intent to murder.

2. Criminal law $\hookrightarrow$ 1173(1).

In prosecution for assault with intent to murder, that instruction on included offenses mentioned only simple assault and not battery held not reversible error, where, under evidence, verdict of mere battery or assault would have been unwarranted.

3. Homicide $\hookrightarrow$ 339.

In prosecution for assault with intent to murder, allegedly committed after defendant entered victim's apartment in stocking feet, exclusion of testimony showing cattlemen's custom to take off shoes before entering private residence held not prejudicial, in view of evidence that defendant entered without knocking or indicating approach.

ever, shows that immediately after being requested to leave, the defendant began beating Mrs. Kausen over the head with a heavy metallic flash-light. This beating continued with considerable intensity until in the struggle Mrs. Kausen was out of the bed and down upon the floor, at which time there is evidence that the defendant attempted to tie a piece of cloth around the neck of Mrs. Kausen. At about this juncture, Mr. Davis having returned to his residence, Mr. and Mrs. Davis came into the room for the purpose of protecting Mrs. Kausen. Following their entry, both Mr. and Mrs. Davis suffered a severe beating at the hands of the defendant. There is testimony to the effect that in this beating not only the flash-light but also a club was used. There is also testimony to the effect that at the time the defendant was beating Mrs. Kausen he said to her, "I'll kill you" (using some profane language which we omit). The testimony of Mrs. Kausen is further to the effect that she was dazed by the beating, and at one time was partly unconscious. Dr. Flemming, who visited the premises for the purpose of rendering medical aid shortly after the assault, described the place as looking like a slaughterhouse (photographs of Mrs. Kausen showing how severely she had been beaten).

[1] Upon this appeal it is contended that the evidence is not sufficient to warrant the verdict; that the court erred in its instructions to the jury, and also erred in its rulings concerning the admission or rejection of testimony.

In determining whether the defendant entertained an intent to commit the offense with which he was charged, the jury had a right to take into consideration not only the extent of the beating which the defendant administered to Mrs. Kausen; not only the fact that he used a metal flash-light, which might or might not be sufficient to inflict a death wound in the hands of a strong man, but they had also a right to take into consideration one part of the testimony which cannot, in the opinion of the court, be considered as any act except that which supports the verdict of the jury beyond all reasonable doubt, and that is the attempt made by the defendant to tie a bandage around the neck of Mrs. Kausen, followed by efforts to tighten the same. An attempt to choke a person goes beyond the boundary line of either assault or battery, and lays a foundation amply sufficient to support the conclusion that the one guilty of the act just mentioned entertains an intent to take life.

While case after case has been cited by the appellant having to do with assaults with a deadly weapon, attempts to kill, and battery, no useful purpose would be subserved by discussing these cases which the industry of counsel has collected, because in the face of what we have just stated, as shown by the testimony, no other conclusion could be fairly arrived at than that reached, if the jury believed the testimony of Mrs. Kausen, and which testimony they had a right to accept and act upon as stating the true facts.

[2] A number of instructions were requested by the defendant which the court refused to give to the jury, and this refusal, as we have stated, is assigned as error. A review of the instructions given by the court shows that no error was committed in this particular. We may here state that this case presents an instance where the instructions given by the court to the jury are clear and direct, covering the case fairly and fully, and above all, are commendable for their brevity and lack of tedious repetition. The jury was told that every element of the offense must be proven, and that they must necessarily find the intent on the part of the defendant, and that this intent might be shown by the surrounding circumstances and acts of the defendant. The jury was then further instructed in the following language: "You are instructed that the jury may find the defendant guilty of any offense, the commission of which is necessarily included in that with which he is charged, or of an attempt to commit the offense. In this connection you are instructed that the offense of simple assault is included within the offense charged in the information, and should you find the defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, of the crime of simple assault, but not guilty of the higher offense charged in the information, it will be your duty to return a verdict accordingly. In other words, if after a careful consideration of all the evidence in the case, you are not satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant committed the assault alleged, your verdict should be not guilty. But if you are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant did commit the assault, and are not satisfied beyond all reasonable doubt that it was his intent to commit murder, your verdict should be guilty of assault. And if you believe and are satisfied beyond all reasonable doubt that he not only committed the assault alleged in the information on file herein, but that it was his intention at the time to murder the person whom you find he assaulted, then your verdict should be guilty, in the manner and form as charged in the information." While this instruction is charged as erroneous, the reasons assigned therefor by the appellant do not appear to us to be well founded. It is true that battery is not mentioned in the instruction, but in view of the record in this case and the items of testimony which we have cited, a verdict of battery only, and we may also add a verdict of assault, would have been unwarranted.

[3] The court refused to permit the appellant to introduce testimony to the effect of the custom of cattlemen to take off their shoes before entering a private residence.

We do not perceive how this ruling could possibly prejudice the appellant, in view of the fact that he thereafter entered the room occupied by Mrs. Kausen without knocking or making any noise indicating his approach.

In view of the record in this case and the testimony included therein, any errors of the court would have to be resolved in favor of the People under the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, because we cannot say that there was any miscarriage of justice, but are fairly well convinced that any other verdict or judgment would have been a miscarriage of justice.

The evidence discloses a previous trouble apparently precipitated by the defendant several months preceding December 25, 1932, but we do not deem it necessary to lengthen this opinion by consideration of that occurrence.

Finding no errors justifying a reversal in this case, the order and judgment are affirmed.

of Hunter & Co. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Judgment reversed, and new trial ordered.

Adam Thompson, Renwick Thompson, and Gordon Thompson, all of San Diego, for appellants.

Robert J. Donovan, of Santa Monica, for respondent.

TURRENTINE, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff instituted this action against defendants as copartners, seeking to recover damages on account of certain alleged fraudulent misrepresentations made by defendants in the sale of corporate stock. The plaintiff and respondent has filed no brief, but, on account of the necessity of disposing of the case on the insufficiency of the evidence, we have nevertheless given careful consideration to the entire transcript on appeal.

The salient facts are that the Mission Beach Amusement Corporation was incorporated in October, 1925. Thereafter, on application, the commissioner of corporations of California issued a permit to said corporation to sell its preferred stock to the public at its par value of $10 per share. Thereupon R. E. Hicks was appointed fiscal agent to sell said stock. Said fiscal agent did then contract with defendants as his agents and brokers to sell said stock to the public.

On January 25, 1926, defendants sold to plaintiff 250 shares of said stock for $2,500 and on March 5, 1926, defendants sold plaintiff 500 shares of said stock for $5,000, which stock was duly delivered to plaintiff and for which she paid the total sum of $7,500. The corporation was formed to erect and operate an amusement center at Mission Beach. Out of profits from the operation of said business the corporation paid a regular quarterly dividend to plaintiff on said stock. At about this time the corporation encountered financial difficulties and did not pay its regular quarterly dividend on October 1, 1926. In 1928 the corporation went into bankruptcy.

When plaintiff did not receive the dividend due in October she first made complaint respecting the sale of the stock to her, claiming that the same was fraudulent on the following grounds: (1) That defendants represented that said stock was a safe investment; (2) that she would receive large dividends therefrom; (3) that defendants were her agents in the purchase and sale of said stock and as such agents had not made a thorough investigation of the financial condition of said company and were guilty of gross negligence amounting to fraud; (4) that defendants had represented said stock to be worth $10 per share; and (5) that said statements were knowingly and falsely made by defendants to plaintiff and that she relied thereon and would not have made said purchases except for said statements.

[1, 2] The complaint does not allege the actual value of the stock at the time of the sale, or the value it would have had, had the stock been as represented. The plaintiff produced no evidence whatever as to the actual value of the stock at the time of the purchase thereof or what value it would have had, had the stock been as represented. Likewise the findings fail to find the actual value of the stock at the time of the sale, or the value it would have had, had the stock been as represented. It follows that there were no pleadings, evidence, or findings before the trial court upon which to base a finding or conclusion that any damage had been suffered by plaintiff at the time of her purchase of the stock. Nor will the evidence that the stock subsequently became valueless supply this defect. It is elemental that proof of damage is necessary to establish a cause of action for fraud. *Work v. Contracts ⇐332(2).

Complaint in action for breach of contract to loan money for construction of buildings held insufficient.

The complaint did not allege that defendants' representative recommended advance of portion of loan which defendants were authorized to retain until expiration of time for filing liens, as required by contract, and alleged that mechanic's liens for amount exceeding balance of loan were filed, though plaintiffs agreed to keep property free therefrom; that defendants credited balance on note for loan, as authorized by contract, instead of applying it on such liens; that note was assigned for only amount previously advanced, with interest, brokerage, and other expenses; and that plaintiffs paid off liens and used their own funds in building operations.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

The plaintiffs have appealed from a judgment in favor of the defendants entered after an order sustaining general and special demurrers to a fifth amended complaint without leave to amend.

The complaint alleges that on February 5, 1931 (apparently 1929 was intended), the first three named defendants agreed with the plaintiffs and with each other to loan to the plaintiffs the sum of $5,500 to be used in the construction of certain buildings upon described real property owned by the plaintiffs. Copies of the application for the loan, the escrow instructions, and the trust deed made and given in connection with said loan agreement are attached to and made a part of the complaint. It is alleged that by oral agreement among the parties, the trust deed securing the loan was executed in favor of the Metropolitan Guaranty Corporation; that this trust deed was assigned to the San Diego Trust & Savings Bank; that this bank advanced money to plaintiffs on said loan from time to time as construction progressed; that the plaintiffs recorded legal notice of completion on July 19, 1929; that the bank made advances according to the terms of the loan agreement until notice of completion was filed, at which time these advances totaled $3,789; that thereafter and before the time for filing mechanic's liens had expired these defendants orally repudiated said loan agreement and refused to advance any more funds thereunder; that the defendants wrongfully withheld and are withholding the balance of said loan in the sum of $1,711; that by reason of said refusal to make further advancements mechanic's liens aggregating a total of $2,000 accrued and foreclosures thereof were filed against the property; that the plaintiffs were compelled to and have paid and discharged said claims; that on or about May 5, 1930, these defendants caused the $5,500 note and trust deed to be assigned to a third party for the sum of $4,125, which sum included interest, brokerage, and other items of expense; that this third party promptly began foreclosure proceedings; and that by reason of said foreclosure proceedings in connection with the said trust deed and the said liens, and by reason of the cloud upon the title to their property, the plaintiffs were unable to refinance their property and prevent a foreclosure, so that the same has become lost to them since the beginning of this action. It is alleged that the plaintiffs have been damaged in the sum of $2,000, which amount they were compelled to pay in order to discharge the mechanic's liens, and in the further sum of $1,848.33 by reason of money expended by them from their private funds in completing the building, and the prayer is for $3,848.33, with interest. In the application for the loan, which is alleged to be a part of the agreement and which is made a part of the complaint, the plaintiffs agreed as follows:

"* * * And do further agree that I will fully complete said building or buildings, as the case may be within 120 days from date hereof, free and clear of all claims of mechanic's and other liens; time being the essence of this agreement.

"I further agree that the said sum of \$—— shall be advanced to me in such sum or sums as your appraiser or representative shall recommend as the work progresses, and not otherwise, and that in any event one-fourth ($\frac{1}{4}$) of said sum may be retained by you until time for filing mechanic's liens has elapsed; and thereupon, no such liens having been filed, same shall be paid to me or my order. In the event that any such liens be filed, you are authorized to apply any part of said sum so held by you in payment of any such claim or liens, or, at your option, you may credit the sum upon any indebtedness I owe you, or upon the principal of the note secured by the trust deed hereinbefore referred to, and thereupon you are released from any and all obligation to lend me any such sum so applied."

It thus appears that the plaintiffs agreed to complete the building free and clear of all claims of mechanic's liens; that no particular portions of the loan were to be advanced at any fixed times, but that advances should be made only in accordance with the recommendation of the defendants' representative as the work progressed; and that, in any event, one-fourth of the amount might be retained until the time for filing mechanic's liens had expired. In the event any such liens should be filed the defendant had several options, including one to credit the balance of the loan upon the principal amount thereof, whereupon they should be released from any further obligation to loan such balance. There is no allegation of any breach upon the part of the defendants up to the time notice of completion was filed. Not only was it agreed that, in any event, the defendants might hold back one-fourth of the total sum until the expiration of the time during which liens could be filed, but under the terms of the agreement they were not required to advance all of the remainder unless the same had been recommended by their representative and there is no allegation that any such recommendation was ever made. While this situation obtained, with no allegations showing any breach of the contract on the part of the defendants, it is alleged that mechanic's liens to the amount of $2,000 and considerably in excess of the balance of the loan, were filed in spite of the fact that the plaintiffs had agreed to keep the property free from any such claims. Although the contract then gave the defendants the right, instead of applying the balance of the loan upon any such liens, to credit the same upon the principal sum of the note, not only is there no allegation that the defendants did not take this latter course, but the allegations of the complaint plainly indicate that this was done. The amount of the note was $5,500, of which $3,789 had been previously advanced, and it is alleged that the note was assigned for only $4,125 and that this amount included the advancements with interest, brokerage and other items of expense. Interest alone, at the agreed rate, would have amounted to nearly $300 and a simple computation plainly shows that the $1,711 was so credited. The fact that they paid off the liens filed and used some of their own funds in the building operations does not indicate any damage. The fact that nearly a year later they were unable to prevent a foreclosure in connection with an obligation for $4,125, by complying with the terms of a trust deed, fails to indicate that their position would have been any better had the obligation then been for $5,500. Not only do the allegations of the complaint show that the plaintiffs themselves breached the contract in permitting liens to be filed, but the facts alleged show neither a breach of contract on the part of the defendants nor any damage resulting from any act upon their part.

The judgment is affirmed.

S. S. Hahn and W. O. Graf, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, Presiding Justice.

This is a motion under rule V, section 3, to dismiss appeal or affirm judgment. The record upon appeal consists of a typewritten clerk's transcript and typewritten reporter's transcript. The appeal is from a judgment rendered upon verdict of a jury in favor of the plaintiff. There is not contained in the brief or in any supplement thereto any statement of "the nature of the action and the substance of the pleadings" as required by rule VIII, sections 3 and 4, of the rules of this court. By inference from the evidence quoted in the brief, we might assume that the action was brought to recover damages for personal injuries suffered by the plaintiff, and resulting from negligence of the defendant in driving an automobile at a time when the plaintiff was riding therein as a guest of the defendant. In this connection it further would be necessary to assume that the injury to the guest was an injury "proximately resulting from the intoxication, wilful misconduct, or gross negligence" of the defendant. California Vehicle Act, § 141¾ (as added by Laws 1929, p. 1580).

In the brief of appellant there is a statement of facts, including extensive quotations from the evidence. This is followed by a statement of the sole proposition relied upon by appellant for reversal of the judgment. This proposition is as follows: "Respondent was guilty of independent negligence, contributing proximately to her injuries, in riding, and in continuing to ride with appellant while he was driving the car, when she knew or should have known that he was intoxicated, which independent negligence would bar her right of recovery." But an inspection of the record reveals the fact that upon this issue of contributory negligence the evidence is very much in conflict, and there is evidence upon which the jury reasonably might have reached its conclusion that the plaintiff was not guilty of such negligence.

The motion to affirm judgment is granted, and the judgment is affirmed. The appeal from the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, being an appeal from a non-appealable order, is dismissed.

WORKS, Presiding Justice.

Respondent is a small child who was injured in an automobile accident. She was traveling in a car driven by her father, when it collided with one driven by defendant. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals.

The facts of the case are quite unusual. A caravan of automobiles—so it is called in the briefs—was in procession from Maywood to San Diego, the cars being occupied by members of several branches of a well-known fraternal organization, together with their families. The procession consisted of about 150 cars, with appropriate spaces between them. Mr. Handley was a member of the Maywood branch of the order, which headed the caravan; Handley's car being within a few cars of the head of the procession when it departed from Maywood. The caravan was to proceed through Long Beach, and, when the Handley car was within a little less than a mile of the intersection of American avenue and Wardlow road, in that city, Handley had some trouble with it, and was compelled to pull into the curb on American to rectify the difficulty. In this work he was aided by Officer Nelson of the Maywood police, who, together with other police, was conveying the caravan on its trip. The repairs to Handley's car delayed his party for four or five minutes, during which time the procession moved along American at a speed of from 25 to 30 miles an hour. When Handley's car was again in order, Nelson stopped that part of the parade which had not yet passed the point at which the repairs were made, allowed Handley to pass through the gap thus made, and attempted, on his motorcycle, to lead Handley ahead to his original place in the procession. During this attempt the motorcycle and Handley's car moved southward along American avenue, passing the left or easterly side of the cars composing the parade, moving more rapidly than they, and along a line a little to the right of the middle of the avenue. At all times which are of interest here the Handley car was at least from 100 to 150 feet to the rear of the motorcycle, and the two vehicles, according to the variations in the testimony of the many witnesses, proceeded, even up to the moment of the collision hereafter to be described, at a speed of from 35 to 50 miles the hour. During this strange race to place Handley in his original location in the line of parade, along an important artery of automobile traffic, Nelson constantly operated the siren on his motorcycle and Handley blew the horn on his car with less continuity but always, as he says, when he was about to cross street intersections. Randolph, the appellant, was in the meantime approaching American from the westward, along Wardlow and toward the point at which the two thoroughfares intersect at right angles. Wardlow is an unimproved street, and compared to American it is unimportant. At the intersection there is therefore located a "boulevard stop" sign, warning those temporarily to halt who are about to attempt the somewhat perilous passage across American. Randolph obeyed this mandate, and stopped his car before it reached the edge of the pavement, which marks the westerly line of American. The procession southerly along the latter thoroughfare was at the moment still in progress, and Randolph waited for some time for an opening in the line of cars. One witness said he waited four or five minutes, but it is hardly conceivable that he could have paused so long for the progress of a caravan, which under the law had no greater rights than he, the mandate of the "stop" sign having been heeded by him, unless the occupation of American by the caravan was such as not to admit of his breaking through. At any rate, Randolph finally saw an opening in the parade sufficient for his needs and moved his car forward. He got through the procession, which was apparently composed of two parallel lines of cars, without mishap, although the driver of the car heading the line next the curb almost ran into Randolph's car, for the reason that this driver's brakes, as he testified, were out of order. When Randolph had negotiated the crossing to the extent of getting past the two lines composing the procession and had gotten well into American, he heard Nelson's siren and stopped at once. After Nelson had passed by, Randolph proceeded at a leisurely pace across American, up to the moment when occurred the catastrophe out of which arose respondent's cause of action. Randolph did not hear the sound of a horn from the direction in which Handley was coming, his hearing being good. No witness fixed Randolph's rate of speed as he crossed at more than 10 miles the hour, while one witness, at least, placed it as low as 4. Handley's car, following the motorcycle at a distance of not less than 100 feet and possibly as great as 150 feet, or even more, collided with Randolph's vehicle in the intersection. At the moment of the collision Handley was traveling at the rate of not less than 35 miles the hour—he himself testified that it was between 40 and 50—and the effect of the impact of the two cars may be imagined. Randolph's car was seriously damaged and was overturned, Randolph himself being badly injured and rendered unconscious, in which state he remained for three or four days. The Handley car proceeded for a distance of about 100 feet after the collision, and then toppled over on its side.

[1,2] There are several other conditions surrounding this accident which must be described in order to understand the conclusion at which we have arrived. It was testified by some witnesses that Randolph, after he had waited until Nelson had passed by, apparently proceeded across the intersection without looking either toward the right or toward the left. This evidence must be taken as supporting the findings of the trial court to the extent covered by it, although Randolph testified to the direct contrary. The circumstance makes no difference, however, in the result. If Randolph had looked north, toward the left, he could have seen nothing more than he swears he did see, that the Handley car was more than 100 feet from the intersection as he started anew to make the crossing. His glance would have shown him, incontestably, that he had the right of way over Handley. He was already well out into the intersection and had stopped because of the mad flight of Nelson, advertised by the shriek of the latter's siren. There was nothing to notify him that Nelson was conducting or leading Handley, although we think that, if he had known the circumstance, it would make no difference. Randolph was negotiating the intersection from Handley's right, while Handley was approaching it from Randolph's left. There were structures on the northeast and northwest corners of American and Wardlow which "obstructed" the view of the intersection, by both Handley and Randolph, within the meaning of that word as employed in subdivision (b)2 of section 113 of the California Vehicle Act (Deering's Gen. Laws, 1931, Act 5128). Under the section, a speed of more than 15 miles the hour in crossing the intersection was therefore unlawful. As we have seen, Randolph proceeded at a much less rate than that, while Handley crossed at a speed nearly, if not more than, three times the allowable rate. Handley saw Randolph's car standing in the intersection while Randolph awaited the passing of the siren-bearing motorcycle of Nelson, but did not look in that direction again as he approached, and never saw the Randolph car until near the moment of the impact. Handley testified, also:

"A. * * * I saw a car [Randolph's] had pulled out through the parade, and had stopped to allow Mr. Nelson to go by, and proceeded to get through Mr. Nelson and myself.

"Q. All right. About where were you when you first saw that car? A. I was approaching the intersection possibly 150 or 200 feet when I saw the car had stopped there for Mr. Nelson.

"Q. You saw Mr. Nelson go by? A. I did.

"Q. Then what did you do? A. I kept going, thinking this gentleman would still be there, taking into consideration I was following behind Mr. Nelson. * * *"

Meanwhile Randolph had started, and he proceeded in a right line across the intersection. He never had notice of the on-coming of Handley's car. As already noted, Randolph's car was hurled to the ground, Randolph was thrown out, was rendered unconscious, and remained so for a long time. So far as the record discloses, respondent, a minor aged about three and one-half years, was the only occupant of Handley's car who was injured, although four adults were in the machine at the time. The child, as the car sped to the point of impact, was sitting on her mother's lap. Handley testified that, after he saw Randolph's car standing in the intersection awaiting the passage of the fleeing Nelson, he (Handley) never saw it again until it was in front of him near the middle of the intersection. Handley then veered quickly to the left and proceeded thence at such an angle southeasterly that the right rear portion of his car came into violent contact with the left front part of Randolph's vehicle, with the result that both cars were seriously damaged, and that, as stated, both plaintiff minor and Randolph were injured. There was possibly sufficient testimony that the collision occurred at about the south middle of the intersection to uphold a finding to that effect, although the bulk of the evidence showed that it occurred in the southeasterly quarter of the intersection.

We cannot but perceive that the negligence of Handley was a contributing cause, if not the sole cause, legally, of the catastrophe. The conduct of Handley was not much, if at all, different from that of the defendant in the recently decided case of Nelson v. Westergaard (Cal. App.) 19 P.(2d) 867, although in that case the point was not decided whether the intersection in question was a "fifteen-mile" one. Here, however, respondent relies upon the impossible theory that Nelson, on his motorcycle, had the right to lead Handley at a headlong pace through the street intersections along American avenue, and that Handley had the right to follow his leader. No matter what the rights and duties of Nelson were as he crossed the intersection of American and Wardlow, either as a Maywood police officer acting outside his own territory or even if he had been a Long Beach officer, there is nothing in the law which authorized or permitted Handley to make the crossing at a speed which all the evidence shows he pursued.

[3] Various other points are made, but it is unnecessary to consider them. It is hardly conceivable that upon a new trial the evidence could be so changed as to entitle respondent to recover. We are not, therefore, under the mandate of the law requiring courts of review to decide points likely to arise upon a new trial.

SECURITY-FIRST NAT. BANK OF LOS ANGELES v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR SAN DIEGO COUNTY et al.*

Civ. 1029.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

June 20, 1933.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 17, 1933.

1. Equity ⇨72(1).

To sustain plea of laches, there must be, in addition to unexplained lapse of unreasonable time, circumstances causing prejudice to adverse party.

2. Appeal and error ⇨110.

Order granting motion for new trial after trial before court without jury is not appealable and may be attacked only in special proceeding (Code Civ. Proc. § 963).

3. Certiorari ⇨5(1).

Writ of review is intended to supply remedy where none other exists by appeal.

4. Certiorari ⇨41.

Petition for writ of review to annul order granting new trial, although not filed until six months after entry of order, held not barred by laches.

The defense of laches was not sustained and did not prevent appellate court from considering whether order granting motion for new trial was in excess of jurisdiction of superior court, because lapse of time between making of order granting new trial and application for writ of review had not affected rights of any interested party, and the delay had prejudiced no one, in view of fact that position of none of parties had been changed in slightest degree between the making of the order granting the new trial and the filing of the petition for a writ of review.

5. Common law ⇨9.

It is policy of law, whenever possible, to insure trial on merits.

6. New trial ⇨6.

Motion for new trial is addressed to sound discretion of trial judge.

7. Appeal and error ⇨977(3).

Appellate court will not disturb order granting new trial, except for abuse of discretion, or violation of some positive rule of law.

8. Appeal and error ⇨1.

Right of appeal is remedial, and doubt should be resolved in favor of right whenever substantial interests of party are affected by judgment.

9. Judgment ⇨524.

Opinion of trial judge and of counsel as to status of judgment may not change legal effect.

10. Judgment ⇨527.

Opinion of trial judge and statements of counsel as to status of judgment may be considered in determining whether judgment is interlocutory or final.

11. New trial ⇨116(2).

Plaintiff, in action to quiet title, where judgment was considered interlocutory and question was not raised until after time to move for new trial or appeal had expired, held estopped to assert judgment was final, as respects time to file motion for new trial.

Plaintiff was estopped to assert judgment was final, and not interlocutory, as respects time to file motion for new trial, in view of respectable authority justifying belief that judgment was actually an interlocutory judgment, the apparent belief of the trial judge and all counsel that it was not final, and the fact that the question of the finality of the judgment was not raised until after the time to move for a new trial or appeal from it had expired. Furthermore, the court, subsequently, rendered another judgment in the same action in which the former judgment was referred to as an interlocutory judgment and it was decided that the case had been continued for the purpose of rendering final judgment.

12. New trial ⇨13.

In action to quiet title involving respective rights of mortgagees, granting of motion for new trial after judgment for plaintiff held not abuse of discretion.

Original petition for a writ of review by the Security-First National Bank of Los Angeles to annul an order of the Superior Court of San Diego County, C. N. Andrews, and Lloyd E. Griffin, judges thereof, granting a motion for a new trial.

Order affirmed.

Prior opinion, 19 P.(2d) 309.

Trust & Savings Bank as the "Security Bank" as the change of name does not affect the merits of the controversy.

About March 17, 1927, Harry A. Clark offered to purchase certain real estate in San Diego from the Security Bank for $15,000. He deposited $1,000 with the Union Title Insurance Company to apply on the purchase price, together with an agreement to pay the balance within ninety days. This offer was not accepted by the Security Bank, but immediately after making deposit of the thousand dollars, and before any contract for the purchase was made, Clark took possession of the land and commenced the erection of a bungalow court upon it. By the 21st day of July, 1927, he owed $7,000 for labor and materials used and for which he was unable to pay. In July, 1927, he applied to the San Diego Trust & Savings Bank for a loan of $18,000 secured by a lien on the premises.

On August 12, 1927, the Security Bank sent a letter of instructions to the San Diego Trust & Savings Bank inclosing a deed to Harry A. Clark and Elizabeth Clark, his wife, and a note in the principal sum of $14,000, and deed of trust on the premises securing the payment of the note, both to be executed by Clark and his wife. Under the instructions finally given the $14,000 deed of trust was to be subject to a first deed of trust to secure the $18,000 loan to be made by the San Diego Trust & Savings Bank to the Clarks. The instructions of the Security Bank to the San Diego Trust & Savings Bank contain the following paragraph which is material to the issues before us: "Also it is a further condition of this escrow that the loan of $18,000 obtained by Mr. and Mrs. Clark from the San Diego Trust & Savings Bank be used only for the payment of material and labor claims existing vs. the property on this date and the balance for the completion of the Bungalow Court now in the process of construction to the extent of 32 cottages, under a contractor's bid and bond guaranteeing the completion of such project without further incumbrance."

The $1,000 was paid to the Security Bank, the deed to the Clarks was delivered and recorded, as were the two deeds of trust, the San Diego Trust & Savings Bank securing a first, and the Security Bank a second incumbrance upon the property.

The $18,000 loaned by the San Diego Trust & Savings Bank to the Clarks was expended as follows: $195.99, interest on the loan; $1,000, to repay a prior indebtedness of Clark; $10, interest; $16,794.01, "upon claims existing against the construction of said bungalow court on the property herein involved at the time of the making of said loan and for material and labor used in the further construction of said project." There was neither "contractor's bid" nor "bond guaranteeing the completion" of the bungalow court "without further incumbrance."

The Security Bank learned of the violation of the escrow instructions and instituted its action to quiet title to the real estate. The case was tried and all material facts in issue were found in favor of the plaintiff. The trial court in the exercise of its equity jurisdiction entered what it called an "interlocutory decree" in accordance with its findings of facts and conclusions of law, with the one exception that it was provided that the San Diego Trust & Savings Bank have until October 30, 1931, approximately three months after the rendition of judgment, in which to pay to the Security Bank the sum of $14,000 with interest; and, if the payment were made, then title to the real estate should be quieted in the San Diego Trust & Savings Bank; but if it were not made, then title would be quieted in the Security Bank. This decree continued the trial of the cause until 2 o'clock in the afternoon of October 30, 1931, for the sole purpose of receiving proof as to whether or not the payment had been made by the San Diego Trust & Savings Bank. A hearing was had on that day, and it then appearing that payment had not been made, judgment was rendered quieting the Security Bank's title to the property. This was denominated a "judgment quieting title." It was filed and entered November 16, 1931. Notice of entry of the "interlocutory judgment" was given on July 30, 1931, and the second judgment on November 17, 1931.

On November 19, 1931, the San Diego Trust & Savings Bank gave notice of its intention to move for new trial. The motion was made and argued on January 6, 1932. Counsel for petitioner objected to the hearing of the motion upon the ground that the notice of motion was given and filed too late and that the court had no jurisdiction to hear and pass upon it. The motion was continued until January 14, 1932, when the same objection was again made before another judge of the respondent court. On the following day this objection was overruled and the motion for new trial was granted. Nothing further was done in the case until July 15, 1932, when the petition for a writ of review was filed in this court seeking to annul the order granting the new trial.

It is the theory of petitioner that the so-called interlocutory judgment of July 28, 1931, was in fact and in law a final judgment in the case; that the time within which a motion for new trial could have been made had expired long before the notice of motion was filed on November 19, 1931, and that the respondent court and its judges exceeded their jurisdiction in hearing and granting the motion. This presents the question of whether the so-called interlocutory judgment of July 28, 1931, was in fact a final judgment.

Respondents urge: First, that as the petition for the writ of review was filed six months after the entry of the order granting a new trial it was barred by laches; second, that the so-called interlocutory judgment was in fact an interlocutory judgment and that the judgment entered November 16, 1931, was the final judgment; and, third, that since both parties, as well as the judges who tried the cause, treated and regarded the judgment of July 25th as an interlocutory and not a final judgment, petitioner should not now be permitted to question its being such an interlocutory judgment.

In support of their first contention respondents cite and rely upon three cases decided by the Supreme Court, namely, Keys v. Board of Sup'rs of Marin County, 42 Cal. 252; Reynolds v. Superior Court, 64 Cal. 372, 28 P. 121, and Smith v. Superior Court, 97 Cal. 348, 32 P. 322. In these cases it is flatly held that in the absence of a showing of some special reason for the delay, a writ of review will not be granted after the expiration of the time within which an appeal from the questioned order or judgment might have been taken.

[1] Where the defense of laches is presented it is usually held that in addition to the unexplained lapse of an unreasonable time there must be circumstances causing prejudice or injury to an adverse party in order to sustain the plea. Cahill v. Superior Court, 145 Cal. 42, 78 P. 467; Taber v. Bailey, 22 Cal. App. 617, 135 P. 975; Donovan v. Board of Police Commissioners, 32 Cal. App. 392, 163 P. 69; Carr v. Sacramento C. P. Co., 35 Cal. App. 439, 170 P. 446; La Shells v. Hench, 98 Cal. App. 6, 276 P. 377. If the general rule which we have stated be applied to the facts of the case before us, the defense of laches cannot be sustained because of the lack of any prejudice or injury to respondents and the San Diego Trust & Savings Bank from the mere lapse of time. The position of none of them has been changed in the slightest degree between the making of the order granting the new trial on January 15, 1932, and the filing of the petition for a writ of review in this court on July 15, 1932.

In the case of Diamond v. Superior Court, 189 Cal. 732, 210 P. 36, 39, a writ of review was granted by the Supreme Court annulling an order of the superior court granting a new trial because the order was made upon a ground not authorized by statute after the motion had been denied on all statutory grounds. An examination of such of the original files in this case as are available to us would indicate that the petition for a writ of review was filed in the Supreme Court more than sixty days after the superior court made the order which was there sought to be annulled. While the Supreme Court did not specifically refer to any of the three cases cited by respondents, the rigor of the rule established by them may be somewhat modified by language which it used, as follows: "Respondent resists this application upon the ground that jurisdiction to entertain and dispose of motions for new trials is vested in the superior court, and that therefore certiorari will not lie, the remedy of the aggrieved party being by an appeal from the order. It relies upon a number of cases so holding, but those decisions are no longer authority on the precise point which arises here. Since the amendment to section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Stats. 1915, p. 209) an appeal is no longer allowed from an order granting a new trial in an action tried by the court."

In the case of Dolan v. Superior Court, 47 Cal. App. 235, 190 P. 469, 471, the petitioner sought a writ of review to annul orders made in the respondent court after the rendition of an interlocutory decree of divorce. The appellate court held that the orders were beyond the jurisdiction of the superior court to make and annulled them. In reaching its conclusion the following language was used: "A void order may be swept aside whenever it comes before a court, and the order vacating the judgment without directing what judgment should be entered was such an order. Upon the present state of the record the original judgment stands unaffected by the subsequent proceedings, unless it be modified or set aside on appeal or in some other way permitted by the statutes."

In Reid v. Superior Court, 44 Cal. App. 349, at page 355, 186 P. 634, 636, the rule was discussed as follows: "While there is no hard and fast rule by which to determine whether laches has barred the remedy by certiorari, yet under the facts as existing herein a sufficient excuse should be shown for the delay to justify the application for the writ. Reynolds v. Superior Court of the County of Los Angeles, 64 Cal. 372, 28 P. 121. The question is fully discussed in Donovan v. Board of Police Commrs., 32 Cal. App. 392, 163 P. 69. Therein it is said: 'While it is true, as counsel for the plaintiff contends, that mere lapse of time short of that prescribed by a statute of limitations in any given similar case will not in itself suffice to constitute laches so as to bar a remedy, nevertheless, if in addition it appears from all the circumstances of the case that prejudice must, or from the very nature of the case may, be reasonably expected to result, the remedy will be denied (Cahill v. Superior Court, 145 Cal. 42, 78 P. 467 [and cases cited]).'"

[2-4] After a careful study of the authorities we have reached the conclusion that the defense of laches should not be sustained and that it should not prevent us from considering whether the order granting the motion for new trial was in excess of the jurisdiction of the superior court. The lapse of time has not affected the rights of any interested party and the delay has prejudiced no one. The order granting a motion for new trial was not appealable and could only be attacked by petitioner in a special proceeding. Section 963, Code Civ. Proc. The writ of review is intended to supply a remedy where none other exists (Valentine v. Police Court, 141 Cal. 615, 75 P. 336) and the right of appeal from the questioned order having been removed, the rigorous rule announced by the three early cases relied upon by respondents has lost the reason which supported it.

The second contention of respondents has received consideration by both the supreme and appellate courts of the state, with the result that there seems to be some difficulty in applying the established rule to varying facts. One line of authorities is relied upon by respondents to support the contention that the judgment of July 28, 1931, is strictly interlocutory and not final and is not an appealable judgment. Another line of authorities is relied on by petitioner to support the contention that the same judgment is not interlocutory but is final and must be attacked, if at all, on motion for new trial within the ten days permitted by statute.

Respondents have cited many cases involving dissolutions of partnerships wherein the courts have determined by interlocutory decrees that partnerships have existed and have appointed referees to take testimony in an accounting. In these cases it has been universally held that the interlocutory decrees were not final judgments. See Middleton v. Finney, 214 Cal. 523, 6 P.(2d) 938; Di Blasi v. Di Blasi, 209 Cal. 753, 290 P. 7; Gunder v. Gunder, 208 Cal. 559, 282 P. 794; Clement v. Duncan, 191 Cal. 209, 215 P. 1025; Doudell v. Shoo, 159 Cal. 448, 114 P. 579. It has been universally held that in cases of this kind there remained questions for judicial determination by the trial court and for this reason the decrees have been held to be interlocutory and not final.

The three cases which seem to lend support to the contention of respondents that the interlocutory judgment of July 28, 1931, is not a final judgment are Krotzer v. Clark, 178 Cal. 736, 174 P. 657; AAlwyn's Law Institute v. San Francisco, 39 Cal. App. 365, 178 P. 966, and Los Angeles Auto Tractor Co. v. Superior Court, 94 Cal. App. 433, 271 P. 363.

In the Krotzer Case the plaintiff made a written agreement for the sale of a parcel of land in Los Angeles county, to Clark for the sum of $4,100. A cash payment of $50 was made and the balance was to be paid in installments. The contract contained the covenant that the land was to be free and clear of all roads, easements, or incumbrances and that title should be evidenced by an unlimited certificate of title made by a title insurance company. The action was brought upon the theory that the title was defective and not in a condition to be corrected. The plaintiff offered to restore to the defendant the $50 and prayed that the contract be annulled and his title quieted. During the pendency of the action the incumbrance upon the property was removed. Supplemental pleadings were filed and at the trial findings were made in plaintiff's favor. Upon these findings the trial court entered an interlocutory judgment decreeing that plaintiff should within a fixed time tender to the defendant a deed and a certificate of title, and if the defendant should for twenty days fail to make the payments specified in the contract, plaintiff would be entitled to a decree quieting his title. The tender of the deed and certificate was made and refused, whereupon the court entered a final decree quieting plaintiff's title. The defendant moved for a new trial, which motion was denied. He appealed from the interlocutory judgment and the order denying the motion for new trial. The Supreme Court held that the attempted appeal from the interlocutory decree was not effectual for any purpose, as it was not one of the interlocutory decrees from which an appeal may be taken under section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure and "the court is therefore without jurisdiction of the attempted appeal. * * * The defendant did not appeal from the final judgment." This case supports the contention of respondents and if it is to be followed the motion for new trial was filed in time and the order granting it cannot be disturbed in this proceeding. The cases of AAlwyn's Law Institute v. San Francisco, supra, and Los Angeles Tractor Co. v. Superior Court, supra, seem to lend some support to the position of respondents.

We will now consider the authorities relied upon by petitioner as upholding the view that the so-called interlocutory judgment of July 28, 1931, was in effect a final judgment. Clark v. Dunnam, 46 Cal. 204; Zappettini v. Buckles, 167 Cal. 27, 138 P. 696; Guaranty Trust & Savings Bank v. City of Los Angeles, 186 Cal. 110, 199 P. 35; Olds v. Thorington, 47 Cal. App. 355, 190 P. 496. We have spent considerable time in an endeavor to analyze and harmonize the holdings in Krotzer v. Clark, supra, with those of Zappettini v. Buckles, supra, and have reached the conclusion that while some minor differences appear in the facts of the two cases, these differences are not of sufficient substantiality to enable us to distinguish and harmonize them without being hypertechnical. The facts in Zappettini v. Buckles, supra, and conclusions by the Supreme Court are clearly set forth as follows: "In this action judgment was given, decreeing that the partnership was dissolved, declaring what property belonged to the partnership, describing it, the same consisting of both real and personal proper-

'y, adjudging that all of said property be sold 'together, as a whole and in one parcel at public sale for cash,' by a receiver theretofore appointed by the court, and that said receiver, after deducting the costs and expenses of sale, pay the remainder of the proceeds into court 'to abide the further order of the court'; adjudging that the proceeds of the sale be paid and applied as follows: (1) To the payment of the fees and expenses of the receiver, 'the same to be fixed and determined by this court'; (2) to the payment of the fees and expenses of a referee theretofore appointed, the same 'to be fixed and determined by the court'; (3) 'to the payment of the debts of said copartnership upon the determination thereof by this court, and that the determination thereof be and is hereby reserved by this court until after the return upon the sale of said property'—adjudging that any money remaining after said payments be divided and paid over to the parties in the following proportions, viz.: To plaintiff, John Zappettini, 10.3484 per cent. thereof, and to defendant Joseph Arata, 89.6516 per cent. thereof; such payments to be made 'as ordered by the court, or upon the consent of the parties to this action'—and adjudging further that each party to the action shall pay his own costs. * * * There remains only the question whether the judgment appealed from is a 'final judgment,' within the meaning of those words in our statutes on appeal. Notwithstanding the deferring of the fixing of the compensation of the receiver and of the referee, and the reservation of the determination of the question of the debts of the firm to others, the judgment fully and finally determined all the rights of the parties as between themselves. The partnership was dissolved, all the property was ordered sold, and the manner in which the proceeds should be divided was finally adjudicated, including the respective proportions of the two partners in any money remaining after the payment of the costs of sale, fees of receiver, fees of referee, and the debts of the firm. Nothing remained to be done by the court except the mere ascertainment of the amounts due to others than the parties on account of fees for services in the action and debts owing by the parties as partners, and to see that the decree already made was properly executed. Upon the subsequent ascertainment of the amounts due to others by force of the judgment appealed from, the parties to this action will become entitled to the portions of the remainder adjudged to belong to them. It is sometimes very difficult to determine whether a decree is a 'final judgment,' within the meaning of that term as used in our statutes concerning appeals. We are of the opinion that the decree before us should be held to be such a final judgment. A somewhat similar decree was held to come within this term in Clark

v. Dunnam, 46 Cal. 204, where the decree was one for the dissolution of the partnership, a sale of all its property and effects, the payment out of the proceeds of sale, first, of the expenses of sale; second, any balance due to the receiver; third, certain costs; fourth, a certain sum to a creditor; and, fifth, any balance remaining to the partners in certain proportions fixed by the decree. It was said that this determined the whole matter in litigation, and that nothing remained for the court to do except to see that the decree was duly executed. In this case it is true that we have a reservation by the court of the question of the debts due others from the partnership, with the result that some action is essential before it can be determined what the surplus will be for division between the partners. That the exact amount of surplus for division between the parties has not been ascertained does not, however, prevent the decree from being a final judgment within the meaning of the statute. In Clark v. Dunnam, supra, the balance due the receiver was not ascertained, and, of course, wherever the property to be divided consists of the proceeds of a sale to be had, the exact amount can be ascertained only after the sale is had. The general rule applicable in determining whether a judgment is final or merely interlocutory, as deducible from the authorities, is that if anything further in the nature of judicial action on the part of the court is essential to a final determination of the rights of the parties, the judgment is interlocutory only. Mr. Freeman, in his work on judgments, says that if, after a decree has been entered, no further questions can come before the court except such as are necessary to be determined in carrying the decree into effect, the decree is final. Section 22. In section 24, he says that although other proceedings before the master are necessary to carry the decree into effect, yet if all consequential directions depending upon the result of the proceedings are given in the decree, it is final. He further says that it is none the less final because some future orders of court may be necessary to be carried into effect, nor because some independent branch of the case is reserved for future consideration, nor because an account is directed to ascertain what sum is due from one to the other as the result of the decision. In the case before us, nothing further in the nature of judicial action on the part of the court is essential to a final determination of the asserted rights of the respective parties. Those rights are fully established by the judgment. Other proceedings required before the court are simply such proceedings as are necessary to carry the judgment into effect. They relate solely to the ascertainment of the amount of money to be paid from the net proceeds of the sale to other persons, to creditors of the partnership and for fees and expenses of the receiver and referee, the remainder, after such payment, to be divided between the partners in the proportions specified in the judgment. All consequential directions depending on the result of the subsequent proceedings are given in the decree. It seems to us that, under the general principles declared to obtain in such matters, the reservation by the court of the determination of these matters does not prevent the judgment before us from constituting a 'final judgment' as between the parties thereto, within the meaning of those words as used in our statutes relating to appeal. There appears to be some conflict in the authorities in the application of the well-settled rules bearing on the matter before us, but, so far as we have found, there is no decision of this court at variance with the views we have expressed, and what is said in Clark v. Dunnam, supra [46 Cal. 204], appears to be in line with those views." This rule was followed in Guaranty Trust & Savings Bank v. City of Los Angeles, supra, and also in Olds v. Thornton, supra.

More recent cases in which the rule announced in the case of Clark v. Dunnam, supra, has been applied, are Sondergard v. Breaum, 83 Cal. App. 352, 256 P. 580; People's Ditch Co. v. Foothill Irrigation District, 103 Cal. App. 321, 284 P. 514, and Orton v. Daigler, 120 Cal. App. 448, 8 P.(2d) 161. However, these cases are not direct authority supporting the position of petitioner.

It is our conclusion that Krotzer v. Clark, supra, and Zappettini v. Buckles, supra, and its supporting cases, present a sharp conflict of authority, with the weight in favor of the rule announced in the latter, which we would be required to follow were there no other controlling considerations in the case.

[5-7] It is the policy of the law in California, where possible, to insure a trial on the merits. A motion for new trial is addressed to the sound discretion of the trial judge. An appellate court will hesitate to disturb an order of a trial judge on such a motion, especially where the order grants a new trial of the issues, unless it is found there has been an abuse of discretion on the part of the trial judge, or unless compelled to vacate the order because of some positive rule of law. If any citations of authorities are needed to support this proposition they may be found in the notes in 20 California Jurisprudence, pp. 26, 27, and 28, and in the three supplements to this volume.

[8] A similar policy is announced in regard to the review of judgments on appeal in the case of People v. Bank of San Luis Obispo, 152 Cal. 261, at page 264, 92 P. 481, 482, where it is said: "The right of appeal is remedial, and in doubtful cases the doubt should be resolved in favor of the right whenever the substantial interests of a party are affected by a judgment." See, also, Anderson v. Standard Lumber Co., 60 Cal. App. 445, 213 P. 65; Wright & Hogan, Inc., v. Heide, 72 Cal. App. 16, 236 P. 219.

We are impressed by the fact as disclosed by the record before us that the judge who tried the cause and the attorneys for the Security Bank and the San Diego Trust & Savings Bank all regarded and treated the judgment of July 28, 1931, as an interlocutory and not a final judgment until long after it was entered and the time to move for a new trial or appeal from it had expired.

In the conclusions of law drawn from the findings of fact dated July 21, 1931, the following language was used: "That an interlocutory judgment should be entered herein providing," etc. The judgment of July 28, 1931, was entitled "Interlocutory Judgment" and contains the following: "The court having heretofore filed its written findings of fact and conclusions of law now makes this interlocutory judgment as follows: * * * It is also hereby ordered and adjudged, that hearing and trial of this matter is hereby continued to and until two o'clock p. m. on October 30, 1931, for the purpose of then and there hearing proof and determining whether or not payment has been made as herein provided for and for the purpose of rendering and entering final judgment herein and hereunder." Notice of entry of this judgment was given as follows: "You and each of you are hereby notified that on July 28, 1931, interlocutory judgment in the above-entitled case was signed, entered in Judgment Book 28, page 167, and docketed in Docket 18, page 408, a copy of which judgment is herewith served upon you."

In the judgment of November 16, 1931, the judgment of July 28, 1931, is referred to five times as an "Interlocutory Judgment." It is also recited there that the case had been continued to October 30, 1931, "for the purpose of rendering final judgment herein." The notice of entry of this judgment was given in the following form: "You and each of you are hereby notified that judgment quieting title in favor of the plaintiff was entered in the above-entitled matter on November 16, 1931, in Judgment Book 86 at page 254, and docketed on November 17, 1931, in Docket Book 19, page 56. Demand is hereby made upon you and each of you that you immediately deliver possession of said property to the plaintiff above named, and that you hereafter desist from asserting or claiming any right, title, estate or lien, ownership, possession or right of possession or interest of any kind in or to any of said property."

Another important circumstance which lends force to the conclusion that the trial judge and all counsel regarded the judgment of July 28, 1931, as interlocutory and not final is that the findings of fact contained no express description of the property in controversy, simply referring "to the property described in plaintiff's complaint." There is no description of the property in the judgment of July 28, 1931, it merely referring "to the real property here involved." While similar descriptions have been held sufficient in point of law to identify real property they have been referred to as "inexcusably circuitous." Kelly v. McKibben, 54 Cal. 192; Goatman v. Fuller, 191 Cal. 245-251, 216 P. 35. The judgment of November 16, 1931, contained a full and detailed description of the property to which the title was quieted. If the trial judge and counsel had regarded the judgment of July 28th as final, it is highly improbable that the "inexcusably circuitous" method of describing the property would have been used in that document and that the judgment of November 16th, which, under such circumstances, could have been little more than an order placing a former judgment in effect, would have been encumbered with a detailed description of the property.

[9, 10] It is true that the opinion of a trial judge and of counsel as to the status of a document may not change its legal effect, still there are expressions in several cases indicating that these opinions might have a bearing on the construction of the instrument. Clark v. Dunnam, supra; Etchebarne v. Roeding 89 Cal. 517, 26 P. 1079; Doudell v. Shoo, supra; Clement v. Duncan, supra; Middleton v. Finney, supra. In Wells v. Shriver, 81 Okl. 108, 197 P. 460, at page 479, cited with approval in Middleton v. Finney, supra, it is said: "Neither does the recital in the judgment 'that further order and final decree of the court await the result of said account' definitely fix the status of the judgment, however the view the court rendering the particular judgment takes of it, and the court's intentions may be considered in determining whether it is a judgment or interlocutory order. * * * It is evident that the court rendering this decision did not expect it to be a final judgment. It is evident that it was not so considered by plaintiff in error Shriver at the time of its rendition." In Clark v. Dunnam, supra, it is said: "The plaintiff in this action treated the decree as final when he prosecuted an appeal from it. If it was not final his appeal should have been dismissed on that ground. But we entertained the appeal and decided the cause, and in justice the plaintiff should now be estopped to deny the finality of the decree."

[11] In view of (1) the conflict of decisions in California with respectable authority justifying the belief that the judgment of July 28th was actually an interlocutory judgment, (2) the apparent belief of the trial judge and all counsel that it was not final, (3) the fact that counsel for the San Diego Trust & Savings Bank relied upon such authority (Krotzer v. Clark, supra) the statements in the findings of fact and conclusions of law and the judgment of July 28th, and more particularly the notice of the entry of this judgment served upon them by counsel for petitioner here, as well as the belief of all interested parties that this judgment was interlocutory only, and (4) the fact that the question of the finality of this judgment was not raised until after the time to move for a new trial or appeal from it had expired, we have concluded that petitioner should not now be permitted to question the fact that this judgment was interlocutory, and not final in its nature, especially as the order sought to be annulled gives the right of a retrial of the action.

In 4 California Jurisprudence, 1062, the following rule is announced: "Inasmuch as the writ of certiorari does not issue ex debito justitiæ, but only on application to the court, and for special cause shown, an application therefor ought not to be granted where substantial justice has been done, or where, if the proceedings are quashed, ruinous or very mischievous consequences would ensue, and where, upon such reversal of proceedings, parties cannot be placed in statu quo; and this is the rule even if the record, when returned, appears to be defective or informal. While it is true that mere lapse of time short of that prescribed by a statute of limitations in any given similar case will not in itself suffice to constitute laches so as to bar a remedy, nevertheless, if in addition it appears from all the circumstances of the case that prejudice must, or from the very nature of the case may be reasonably expected to, result, the remedy will be denied."

[12] A study of the record has satisfied us that a retrial of the action may be advisable so that complete equity may be done between the parties. If petitioner's escrow instructions had been carried out to the letter, it would have resulted in a bungalow court of thirty-two units being completed on the real property. The San Diego Trust & Savings Bank would have had a first encumbrance on the property to secure a loan of $18,000 and the Security Bank a second lien to secure $14,000. The bungalow court was not completed, but $16,794.01 of the money of the San Diego Trust & Savings Bank was invested in the building of the court. We are not informed whether it would take much or little money to complete the improvements. This fact was undoubtedly within the knowledge of the respondent judge who granted the motion for new trial. We are informed there are no liens upon the property or any suits pending to enforce a liability for labor or materials. Under the terms of the interlocutory decree the San Diego Trust & Savings Bank was required to pay $14,000 to the Security Bank, the balance of the purchase price. This would leave the San Diego Trust & Savings Bank with liens upon the property to secure the total sum of $32,000, and the Security Bank with all of its money in cash instead of a second incumbrance securing a debt of $14,000 upon a completed bungalow court. The total detriment to the Security Bank resulting from the violation of its escrow instructions could not have been more than the cost of completing the bungalow court. The judge granting the motion for new trial was sitting as a chancellor in a court of equity and these considerations may have appealed to his conscience and caused him to grant the motion.

The order sought to be annulled is affirmed.

TAYLOR et al. v. BUNNELL

Civ. 4874.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

July 5, 1933.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 1, 1933.

1. Appeal and error § 1012(1).

Trusts § 44(3).

To prove trust by parol under conveyance absolute in its terms, evidence must be clear and convincing, and whether evidence is of such character is for trial court.

2. Appeal and error § 1010(1).

Unless appellate court can say that reasonable man could not reasonably have reached given conclusions from evidence, findings will not be disturbed, though appellate court might have reached different conclusions.

3. Trusts § 59(4).

Trustor could not revoke trust by oral direction to trustee (Civ. Code, § 2280).

4. Trusts § 59(1).

Concurrently with passing of title to trustee, beneficiary becomes vested with irrevocable equitable ownership or beneficial interest in trust property unless right to change is reserved by trustor (Civ. Code, § 2280).

5. Evidence § 598(1).

Trial court is not bound to decide in conformity with declaration of any number of witnesses who do not produce conviction in its mind, or against presumption or other evidence satisfying its mind.

6. Trusts § 110.

In action to establish constructive trust in land under deed alleged to have been made by defendant conveying remainder interest to plaintiff at time defendant's wife conveyed land to defendant, evidence held to show that defendant owned only life estate and held legal title to remainder in trust for plaintiff (Civ. Code, § 2280).

7. Trusts § 110.

In action to establish constructive trust in land, evidence held to show that language of trustor was not precatory, but conveyed direction and command (Civ. Code, § 2280).

Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Action by Alma Taylor and husband against Edwin Bunnell. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Shelton, Gray & McWilliams and Robert L. McWilliams, all of San Francisco, Stephen W. Downey, of Sacramento, and George R. Freeman, of Willows, for appellant.

Casper A. Ornbaun and Everett H. Roan, both of San Francisco, and W. T. Belieu, of Willows, for respondents.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; THOMPSON, J., dissenting.

Mr. Presiding Justice PULLEN delivered the opinion of the court.

This case has been reviewed once by the District Court of Appeal (77 Cal. App. 525, 247 P. 240, 244) and once by the Supreme Court (211 Cal. 606, 296 P. 288) the law has been established, and the facts presented during the present trial being substantially the same as were adduced at the prior hearings, need not be again set forth in detail. Briefly, however, this is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment rendered in an action seeking to have a constructive trust impressed upon certain real property.

There is no dispute as to the fact that appellant Edwin Bunnell and Margaret Peterson were married and were husband and wife at the death of Mrs. Bunnell in May, 1921; that there were no children of this marriage, and the real property in question consisted of ranch property in Glenn county, which was the separate property of the wife. About a month prior to her death, Mrs. Bunnell, who was then very ill and had been suffering for some time with an incurable malady, executed and acknowledged a deed to Dr. Bunnell, appellant herein, in consideration of love and affection. At the same time Dr. Bunnell made, signed, and acknowledged a deed for the same land from himself as grantor to Alma Taylor, the plaintiff and respondent herein. Apparently no secret was made of the existence of these deeds and after the death of Mrs. Bunnell, plaintiff asked appellant about the deeds, and getting no information from him, brought this action to have it decreed that appellant held title to the property in trust for her subject to a life estate in him.

The trial court, sitting without a jury, held with the plaintiff that she was the owner of the real property subject to a life estate in defendant.

The principal ground here urged by appellant for reversal is that the evidence does not sustain the decree of the trial court giving him a life estate only in the real property in question impressed with a trust in favor of plaintiff for the remainder.

[1] This contention by defendant is based partially upon an alleged lack of evidence of any legally binding promise, essential before a constructive trust can be found by the court, and also that the testimony established, at most, an incipient interest in plaintiff, which defendant might voluntarily have recognized, and which in the event of his breach of promise would only then give rise to a constructive trust. The Supreme Court in this case, upon the former hearing (211 Cal. 606, 296 P. 288, 291), said, however: "The rule is also well established that to prove a trust by parol under a conveyance absolute in its terms, the evidence must be clear, satisfactory and convincing. [Citing cases.] And whether the evidence in any case is of this character must be determined by the trial court."

And also in the same case said: "It must not be assumed that on the former appeal it was decided that, upon the mere showing of a confidential relationship between the grantor and grantee, a prima facie constructive trust was created and imposed on the grantee. * * * After the showing of the confidential relationship the burden was still upon the plaintiff to prove that the deed was not what it purported on its face to be; in other words, to prove that the transaction did not create a fee-simple interest in the defendant, but that the execution and delivery of the deed to him under all the facts and circumstances surrounding or pertinent to the transaction constituted the defendant a constructive trustee entitled to a life estate with the remainder in fee held for the benefit of the plaintiff. O'Brien v. O'Brien, 21 Cal. App. 620, 623, 624, 132 P. 612."

[2] The trial court found the existence of a constructive trust, and because of appellant's contention that the evidence does not justify such a conclusion, we must examine that evidence to discover if substantial evidence may be found in the record or any inference reasonably be inferred therefrom that will support such finding. It is not sufficient that this court, if sitting as a court of first instance, might have reached a different conclusion; but appellant must show that a reasonable man could not reasonably have reached the given conclusion from the evidence presented. Bedford v. Pacific Structural Welding Corporation, 121 Cal. App. 162, 8 P.(2d) 558.

[3] The contention of appellant that the deceased trustor had the power to revoke the trust once established merely by an oral direction to the trustee, does not seem to be the rule. Section 2280, Civ. Code.

This court at the former hearing said: "Prior to the time those declarations were made, Mrs. Bunnell had conveyed the land to defendant, either absolutely or impressed with a trust in favor of plaintiff. In either case she parted with all her pecuniary interest in the property upon the delivery of her deed to defendant. * * * Plaintiff is not claiming as successor to any interest remaining in Mrs. Bunnell after the execution of the deed to defendant, but she claims an interest conveyed by that deed. Her interest in the land if any, and that of the defendant, were created by the same instrument. * * *"

[4] Concurrently with the passing of title to the trustee, the beneficiary becomes vested with the equitable ownership of or beneficial interest in the property and unless the right to change is reserved by the grantor the beneficiary has an irrevocable right therein. The trial court held, and the evidence supports the finding, that Mrs. Bunnell conveyed the property to defendant upon his parol promise that he would hold it for the benefit of plaintiff, and immediately a trust arose.

Briefly, the testimony in support of the creation of the trust is given by certain witnesses who were personally acquainted with both Mrs. Bunnell and her husband and were frequently in the company of Mrs. Bunnell, both before and after the execution of the instrument in question.

One of the witnesses testified in regard to a conversation had with Mrs. Bunnell and Dr. Bunnell concerning the execution of the deed, as follows:

"Q. During her last illness, did she talk with you at any time about any desire on her part to dispose of her ranch in the case of her death? A. She often talked about her ranch, that she did not want it to go to the doctor's daughters. * * *

"Q. Just tell us what the doctor said to you about that. A. He told me that last night—this was the day after—she had called him into her room and told him that she wanted to fix up her affairs. He said, 'Tell me what you want to do, and I will tell you how to do it.' She said, 'I want to leave you my ranch for your lifetime, but in case of your death, I want it to go to Alma.' So he said, 'I told her what to do, to make out a deed to me, and that I would make out a deed to Alma leaving the ranch to Alma, and in case of her death, would immediately turn over the deed to Alma. She also wanted me to pay her mother $50.00 a month for life, and I told her I would do that; and explained that if she left the property in trust, that would make it difficult for me to pay this money to her mother because the trust would interfere; so she seemed perfectly satisfied with this, and it was all fixed up. I got Samuels up there and we signed the deeds."

The defendant denied having made the foregoing statement, but admitted, referring to the land, on the day after the execution of the deeds he said to a witness, "She has deeded it to me and I have deeded it to Alma to take effect at my death."

Defendant testified further in regard to the making and destroying of the deed as follows:

"Q. Was your wife dangerously ill at the time these deeds were made? A. She was.

"Q. Then why didn't you tell Alma about the deeds? A. It was none of her business, and the way she attacked me, nobody would tell her anything."

Witness continuing:

"Q. Now, when you said to your wife, 'I will make it to Alma,' why did you say, 'I will make it to Alma?' A. To get rid of the conversation, and have the conversation over with, and to stop talking about death before my sick wife.

"Q. Didn't you say to your wife, 'Alma is the best one of the bunch, anyway, and I will make it to her?' A. I did. * * *

"Q. And you did it because of the fact that you felt it ought to be in the hands of somebody who would hold the land and consecrate it to her memory, didn't you? A. Yes.

"Q. Now, with that interview in your mind, why didn't you tell Alma Taylor within the next two or three days or in the next week or so, when she came there, what you had done? A. I was instructed not to; and instructed to destroy the deed.

"Q. Didn't you see Alma Taylor there that very day or the next day afterwards? A. Yes, I presume I did.

"Q. Did you ever tell Alma Taylor you had destroyed that deed? A. No, sir.

"Q. Did you ever tell anybody you had destroyed that deed? A. No, sir."

The same witness proceeding:

"Q. Why didn't you tell them—after you had already told them that Marge had made a deed to you and you had deeded it on to Alma to take effect after your death—why didn't you tell them that your plan had changed? A. Because they didn't ask me, and it didn't enter my head to tell them, and why should I tell them?"

Further the witness said:

"Q. Well, when you made this deed of April 26, 1921, to Alma Taylor, when did you intend to give that deed to Alma Taylor? A. Never.

"Q. When did you intend to tell Alma Taylor that you had made that deed at that time? A. Never.

"Q. When did you intend to tell Alma Taylor that you were making that deed, or had made a deed to her, and that she should hold that land in consecration to your wife? A. Never. I expected her to find it in my safety deposit box at my death."

[5] Appellant conceding for the sake of argument that the testimony offered by plaintiff is sufficient to impress the property with a trust, contends that the obligation originally imposed upon Dr. Bunnell to make the conveyance was subsequently withdrawn by Mrs. Bunnell, but, as already pointed out, the trust having once been created could not be terminated in the manner suggested. Furthermore, the court was not bound to accept the statements of the witness as to the revocation as true, even admitting no witness contradicted him. Although a witness is presumed to speak the truth, a trial court is not bound to decide in conformity with the declaration of any number of witnesses who do not produce conviction in its mind, or against a presumption or other evidence satisfying its mind. Morris v. Morris, 84 Cal. App. 599, 258 P. 616.

"It is a wild conceit that any court of justice is bound by the mere swearing. It is swearing credibly that is to conclude its judgment." Zibbell v. S. P. Co., 160 Cal. 237, 116 P. 513, 515.

[6] A careful reading of the record convinces us that the conveyance in question was made to the appellant in reliance upon his promise to convey the remainder to respondent, and except for that promise, deceased would not have executed the conveyance.

Support for that conclusion is found in the testimony of the witnesses relative to the refusal of Mrs. Bunnell to follow the form of will submitted by Dr. Bunnell making him sole beneficiary.

[7] Appellant claims that the language of Mrs. Bunnell as to the deed was precatory only, but a reading of the entire record fully supports the finding that the language conveyed a direction and command rather than a mere request or suggestion.

We find no error in the conclusions reached by the learned trial court, and the judgment is affirmed.

SCOTT CO., Inc., v. ROLKIN et al.

Civ. 8713.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

July 8, 1933.

1. Evidence ⇨444(2).

Written proposal may be shown to have been accepted with conditions or qualifications, or that accompanying acceptance, and, in reality, forming part of it, additional terms were exacted by acceptor.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1010(1).

Court of Appeal is bound by findings of trial court, where supported by some evidence.

3. Contracts ⇨282.

Contract to perform to satisfaction of parties calls merely for such performance as should be satisfactory to reasonable person.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John J. Van Nostrand, Judge.

Action by the Scott Company, Inc., against Edward Rolkin and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and named defendant appeals.

Affirmed as modified.

J. F. Riley, of San Francisco, for appellant Edward Rolkin.

Jefferson E. Peyser, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This action is upon a contract for the installation of a boiler and automatic oil burner, with the necessary connections and equipment, in an apartment building owned by defendant Rolkin and occupied by defendant Getchell as lessee. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff, and from this judgment defendant Rolkin appeals.

Appellant, desiring to renovate the heating plant contained in said building, entered into negotiations with respondent to perform said work. On October 7, 1929, respondent submitted to Rolkin, in writing, an offer to do the work for a specified sum. This offer, in substance, provided that respondent agreed, for the sum of $2,181, to install a new American Radiator Company's cast-iron sectional steam boiler with smoke and water connections, one Johnson automatic burner with all connections, one 1,500-gallon oil storage tank with all pipe connections, one steel stack outside of building, fire proof boiler room; also to construct a pit in the boiler room floor and to do the necessary excavating, backfilling, and concrete work in connection with the installation of the oil tank and its piping. On October 17, 1929, and before the work commenced, appellant and Getchell entered into an agreement in writing with each other which provided that Getchell would pay to respondent $681 for the work before its commencement, and that Rolkin should pay the remaining $1,500 upon the completion of the installation to the satisfaction of Getchell, and after its acceptance by the fire department of San Francisco. This agreement was delivered to respondent before the work commenced. Appellant contends that this agreement formed a part of the contract for the installation; that it was received and retained by respondent, without objection, before the work commenced. This contention is supported by the fact that on October 25, 1929, Getchell paid $500 on the contract price with his personal check, and by the further fact that after the work was completed respondent mailed to Rolkin the following statement: "Mr. Edward Rolkins, 44 Fourth Street, City. Heating system installed complete in Ruthland Apartments at 691 O'Farrell Street as per agreement $2,181.00 Payment due as per agreement between Mr. Fred W. Getchell and Edward Rolkins $1,500.00."

[1] We are of the opinion that the offer of respondent to perform the work of installing the said heating system was accepted by appellant and Getchell, but that this acceptance was with the conditions set forth in their said agreement which was delivered to respondent before the work was commenced, and received by it without objection. Where a proposal in writing is made and accepted, it is permissible to show that it was accepted with conditions or qualifications, or that accompanying the acceptance and in reality forming a part of it, terms in addition to those set forth in the proposal were exacted by the acceptor. Lawrence v. Premier Indem. Assur. Co., 180 Cal. 688-699, 182 P. 431.

[2, 3] The next contention of appellant is that the installation of the heating plant was not performed to the satisfaction of Getchell, nor placed in first-class running order. The evidence is that, after the completion of the work, it was approved and accepted by the San Francisco fire department. There is also ample evidence to the effect that the said work was completed in full compliance with the said offer of respondent. The trial court found that the work had been fully completed by respondent in a satisfactory manner, and, while there is some conflict in the evidence upon this point, it is well settled that this court is bound by the findings of the trial court when there is some evidence to support such findings. 2 Cal. Jur. 921 and authorities cited. A stipulation in a contract to perform to the satisfaction of the parties calls merely for such performance as should be satisfactory to a reasonable person. Gladding, McBean & Co. v. Montgomery, 20 Cal. App. 276, 128 P. 790; Thomas Haverty Co. v. Jones, 185 Cal. 285, 197 P. 105; Bryan Elevator Co. v. Law, 31 Cal. App. 204, 160 P. 170.

It was provided in the offer made by respondent that the drip line piping and the air valves were in poor condition and that they should be removed and new air valves installed on each radiator; this to be done at an added cost of $53. It appears that this additional work was done by respondent and accepted by appellant without objection. The judgment is therefore modified by making appellant's liability thereunder the sum of $1,553, and as so modified the judgment is affirmed, respondent to recover costs of this appeal.

HIRSCH v. D'AUTREMONT et al.
Civ. 7873.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

June 30, 1933.

1. Trial ☞ 168.

Court's right to direct verdict is, with regard to evidence, same as its right to grant nonsuit.

2. Trial ☞ 142.

Court may direct verdict when disregarding conflicting evidence and indulging in every legitimate inference which may be drawn from evidence, result is that there is no evidence of sufficient substantiality to support verdict for plaintiff.

3. Trial ☞ 142.

Where there is no conflict in evidence, but reasonable men may draw different conclusions therefrom, jury should determine whether conclusion should be drawn that plaintiff acted as ordinarily prudent person would act under same circumstances.

4. Automobiles ☞ 224(6).

Guest held contributorily negligent in not leaving automobile when she knew that driver was intoxicated and was driving carelessly on strange road at 50 miles per hour.

5. Automobiles ☞ 245(87).

Presumption that person takes ordinary care of his own concerns held not to make guest's contributory negligence question for jury, where facts showing contributory negligence were established by uncontradicted evidence of plaintiff under circumstances indicating that testimony was not product of mistake or inadvertence (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 4).

Facts showed that plaintiff knew that driver was drinking; that driver was proceeding at rate of 50 miles per hour on strange road; that plaintiff cautioned driver not to speed; and that 3 miles before accident driver stopped in town, and left automobile, during which time plaintiff had ample opportunity to leave automobile.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Warren V. Tryon, Judge.

Action by Marie L. Hirsch against Maurice D'Autremont and others. Judgment for defendants notwithstanding the verdict, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Mulroney, Murphy & Doherty and William Hinckle, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Joe Crider, Jr., of Los Angeles, for respondent.

ARCHBALD, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff, a guest passenger in an automobile driven by defendant, brought suit for injuries alleged to have been caused by the gross negligence, recklessness, and intoxication of defendant. A motion for directed verdict was denied and the jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff. Prior to the entry of judgment on said verdict defendant moved for a judgment notwithstanding such verdict, which motion was granted. From the judgment thereupon entered in favor of defendant, plaintiff has appealed.

[1-3] In granting the motion above mentioned the court ruled that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. Appellant contends that it was a case for the jury and that the court erred in so ruling. If the defendant's motion for a directed verdict should have been granted, the court properly rendered judgment on defendant's motion, notwithstanding the verdict in plaintiff's favor; but otherwise not. The right of a court to direct a verdict is, "with regard to the condition of the evidence, absolutely the same as the right of a court to grant a nonsuit." Pereira v. International Exposition Co., 179 Cal. 63, 64, 175 P. 454, 455. "It [the court] may grant a nonsuit only when, disregarding conflicting evidence, and giving to plaintiff's evidence all the value to which it is legally entitled, herein indulging in every legitimate inference which may be drawn from that evidence, the result is a determination that there is no evidence of sufficient substantiality to support a verdict in favor of plaintiff." Estate of Caspar, 172 Cal. 147, 150, 155 P. 631, 632. We are of the opinion also that even where there is no conflict in the evidence, if reasonably minded men may draw different conclusions therefrom, it is still a matter for the jury to determine whether or not under such undisputed facts the conclusion should be drawn that plaintiff acted as an ordinarily prudent person would have acted under the same circumstances, or otherwise.

With these rules in mind we turn to the facts in the case. On September 28, 1929, between 8:30 and 9 o'clock p. m., plaintiff, together with her brother and his wife, visited the home of defendant Word's sister, Mrs. D'Autremont, at which Word resided. A late lunch was served, being preceded, however, by the service of a glass of "home brew" beer to each of the members of the party. The glasses were about five inches high, were poured full and the beer "had a kick in it." The lunch consisted of "rye bread, salami and beer," it being testified that each drank a second glass of the beverage with the lunch. During the repast a telephone call was received from Santa Ana, and those present were invited to visit the lady calling at Santa Ana. The invitation was accepted by Mrs. D'Autremont, defendant Word, and the plaintiff. Word went to a nearby drugstore and purchased several bottles of alcohol. He was accompanied by plaintiff, who testified, however, that she did not know what Word had purchased until later. After they returned to the home, Word took a bottle of alcohol out of the package, asked if those present "would like a highball" and proceeded to mix the alcohol with "Pomo" (grapefruit juice) and gave each a glass. The evidence does not show that plaintiff saw Word drink more than we have stated, but the latter's undisputed testimony shows that he consumed several more drinks before leaving for Santa Ana. Shortly after 11 o'clock plaintiff, Mrs. D'Autremont, and Word left for Santa Ana, Word driving. Soon thereafter, however, they stopped at a store, where Word purchased two bottles of ginger ale. Arriving outside the city limits of Los Angeles, Word again stopped the car, poured out about half the contents of one of the ginger ale bottles and filled it with alcohol. Miss Hirsch, the plaintiff, testified that she declined a proffered drink of this mixture but that Word and his sister each took one; that they then continued on their journey, her two companions consuming the contents of the bottle while driving two or three miles. Word then, without getting out of the car, mixed another bottle, half alcohol and half ginger ale, which was also consumed before they reached Anaheim. At Anaheim Word stopped at a store and purchased six bottles of ginger ale, which he put in the car. Shortly after they started again they stopped at a railroad crossing to let a "long freight train" pass. This was on a "detour from the main highway." On this detour plaintiff looked at the speedometer and saw that they were traveling 50 miles an hour, whereupon she said, addressing Word, "Foster, why do you go so fast; what is your rush?" to which the latter replied, "That isn't fast." About five or six seconds thereafter the detour on Vermont avenue ended in Placentia avenue, and in trying to negotiate the turn into the latter thoroughfare the car upset, killing Mrs. D'Autremont, and seriously injuring plaintiff.

No drinking was done after the party left Anaheim. Plaintiff frankly testified that at the time she spoke to Word he was "under the influence of liquor." Asked as to what she based such statement on, she said that "if he hadn't been under the influence of intoxicating liquor he wouldn't have been driving at that rate of speed on a strange road, and I would base it on the fact of the amount of liquor he drank, that I saw him drinking myself." Plaintiff further testified that before they left Los Angeles Word appeared to be sober and showed no evidence of having been drinking; that he had been doing 50 miles an hour before they were stopped by the freight train; that Word was intoxicated "all the way along when he was drinking"; and that she considered the ride dangerous under the circumstances of speed and the drinking.

[4] The evidence is conflicting as to whether Word was or was not under the influence of liquor when the party left Los Angeles and as to whether or not such fact was known to plaintiff; and the question whether or not she was guilty of contributory negligence in commencing the ride to Santa Ana was clearly for the jury. We are also of the opinion that the question as to whether or not plaintiff should have left the car when it stopped at the railroad crossing to let the freight train pass, considering that it was among orange groves and in the middle of the night, even though she then knew that the driver was under the influence of intoxicating liquor, is one upon which reasonable men might well differ and was in consequence one for the jury to determine. Under the testimony of plaintiff, however, all the drinking was done before they reached Anaheim, and under her evidence she knew that Word was at that time under the influence of liquor. In the light of these circumstances we fail to see how reasonable men could differ upon the proposition that ordinary care required, when the car stopped in Anaheim and Word, the driver, entered an open and lighted store to buy more ginger ale, that she should take steps to protect herself from danger that would then appear to be inevitable, by leaving the car or taking some steps to prevent an intoxicated person from operating it further. The accident occurred a few miles, at most, beyond this point, and it was testified that the point of the accident was within two or three miles of their destination. Furthermore, it is evident that the party whom they were to visit had a telephone, as she had previously called the house in Los Angeles from which the three had started.

Appellant urges that by reason of the disputable presumption "that a person takes ordinary care of his own concerns" (section 1963, subd. 4, Code Civ. Proc.), a presumption exists that she exercised ordinary care, which is evidence of sufficient strength to make contributory negligence a question of fact for the jury. Counsel cites and quotes from the case of Smellie v. Southern Pacific Co., decided by the Supreme Court of this state and reported in 287 P. at page 343. In that case the decedent was a guest of the defendant Ireland, with whom he was riding. They were halted at defendant Southern Pacific Company's tracks by a passing freight train. When they later started across the tracks, after the freight train had passed, they were struck by a passenger train coming from the direction in which the freight train was proceeding, and which passenger train was obscured from the view of defendant Ireland and decedent by the freight train until it was right upon them. Ireland was examined by plaintiff under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and stated during such examination that both he and decedent looked before starting the car after the freight train had passed, and did not see the approaching passenger train; that decedent said, "It's all clear; let's go." Such testimony stood uncontradicted by any witness. At the close of plaintiff's case a motion by defendants for directed verdicts was made and granted. It was contended there, as here, that the presumption mentioned created a conflict in the evidence which the jury had to determine. To this respondents answered that such testimony was overcome and dispelled as a matter of law by Ireland's testimony. The Supreme Court held that such presumption was not dispelled by the testimony of an adverse witness examined under the section above cited. A rehearing was thereafter granted and an opinion was handed down thereon which is reported in 212 Cal. at page 540, 299 P. 529. In this latter opinion the court draws a distinction between the effect of evidence contradicting the presumption, given by the party relying on such presumption, and evidence given by the party against whom the presumption is invoked. The court says (page 553 of 212 Cal., 299 P. 529, 534): "It is argued by the defendants that, since the statute itself (section 1963, Code Civ. Proc.), before enumerating the disputable presumptions, declares that said presumptions 'are satisfactory, if uncontradicted,' and that they 'may be controverted by other evidence,' it must follow that, if they are contradicted or controverted, they fade out and disappear from the case. As has been seen, they do disappear when contradicted or controverted by the evidence of the party relying upon them, with the qualification stated in the Mar Shee Case [190 Cal. 1, 210 P. 269], but it is not correct to say that, under the Code section and the effect given to it by the court, they vanish from the case as a matter of law when contradicted or controverted by the party against whom they are invoked." (Italics ours.)

[5] The facts we have hereinbefore mentioned as showing contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff are established by the uncontradicted evidence of plaintiff, "under circumstances which afford no indication that the testimony is the product of mistake or inadvertence," and being "wholly irreconcilable with the presumption sought to be invoked, the latter is dispelled and disappears from the case." Mar Shee v. Maryland Assurance Corporation, 190 Cal. 1, 9, 210 P. 269, 273.

HAUSER v. PACIFIC GAS & ELECTRIC CO.
Civ. 4846.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

July 8, 1933.

1. Electricity ⇨13.

Electric company is not liable for injuries from electric shock, unless it could reasonably have anticipated danger.

2. Pleading ⇨8(17).

Allegations of complaint in action for injuries by electric shock that defendant's wires were "in dangerous proximity" and at "insufficient height" above ground held insufficient, averring pleader's opinion only.

3. Pleading ⇨34(7).

Presumptions being against pleader, appellate court must assume, in absence of contrary allegations in complaint, on appeal from judgment dismissing action for injuries by electric shock, that defendant's wires were over 25 feet above ground as required by law (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 1).

4. Electricity ⇨19(2).

Complaint held insufficient to state cause of action for injuries by electric shock when boom of derrick plaintiff was moving across yard came near electric wire overhead.

The complaint alleged that plaintiff was moving derrick across yard when, because of defendant's negligence in maintaining uninsulated wires in dangerous proximity and at insufficient height from ground, boom came close thereto, that contact was caused solely by defendant's negligence in maintaining power line, and that plaintiff received severe electrical shock as result of defendant's carelessness.

5. Appeal and error ⇨916(3).

On appeal on judgment roll from judgment of dismissal on ground that complaint stated no cause of action, appellate court must assume that plaintiff was satisfied with complaint and proposed amendment, where he took no further steps to amend it, while court held matter under advisement for over two months.

6. Pleading ⇨236(1).

Permission to amend pleadings is within sound discretion of trial courts, who should be liberal in allowing amendments.

7. Pleading ⇨243.

Refusal to grant amendment of complaint stating no cause of action is not abuse of discretion, where facts alleged show that no such cause can be stated.

Appeal from Superior Court, Colusa County; Ernest Weyand, Judge.

Action by Joe Hauser against the Pacific Gas & Electric Company. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Alva A. King and E. Wayne Miller, both of Colusa, for appellant.

Thos. J. Straub, of San Francisco, W. R. Dunn, of Sacramento, and Clinton F. Stanley, of San Francisco, for respondent.

Mr. Presiding Justice PULLEN delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an appeal from a judgment of dismissal. Plaintiff filed a complaint which defendant answered. Thereafter plaintiff moved for leave to file an amended complaint, and at the hearing thereof defendant asked for dismissal and judgment upon the ground that neither the complaint nor the proposed amended complaint stated facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The motion to file the amended complaint was denied, and the motion for judgment on the pleadings granted. It is the contention of respondent that the complaint and proposed amended complaint did not set forth a cause of action and under the facts alleged a cause of action could not have been stated.

Appellant maintains a cause of action existed and was properly alleged and the suit was improperly dismissed. The facts as gathered from the pleadings show that the Pacific Gas & Electric Company maintained a pole line carrying high tension wires along a certain lane and across a yard or corral. Plaintiff, with permission of the owner and lessee, went upon the lands to move a hay derrick; that he hitched his horses to the derrick, and was moving the derrick across the corral when the boom thereof came in close proximity to the electric wire, and the electricity arced across the intervening space and thus into the body of plaintiff.

The complaint alleges the negligence as follows: " * * * Was moving and conveying the same (derrick) across the aforementioned yard * * * toward the * * * power line when, because of defendant's carelessness, recklessness and negligence in maintaining aforesaid wires within dangerous proximity and at an insufficient height from the ground and failing to insulate same the boom came in close proximity * * * and as a result thereof. * * * "

It is further alleged that "the contact was caused solely and due to the negligence of the defendant in the maintenance of said power line" and "that as a result of defendant's carelessness * * * plaintiff received a severe electrical shock" and also, "as a further result of defendant's carelessness," etc., plaintiff required attendance of a physician.

It is obvious that all of the foregoing allegations are as to the cause of the injury, leaving the fact of negligence to inference and innuendo.

In Johnson v. Fletcher, 97 Cal. App. 153, 274 P. 1001, 1002, it was alleged that plaintiff was induced to purchase an apartment house "by reason of the defendants, and each of them, having falsely * * * stated and represented * * * with the intent," etc. In upholding the order sustaining the demurrer thereto, the court, commenting upon the complaint, said: "The above allegation is a recital of facts and not a positive allegation. All matters of substance should be alleged positively and may not be stated in the form of recitals. Philbrook v. Randall, 195 Cal. 95, 103, 231 P. 739. * * * This is true because the very object of drawing a complaint is to frame it in such manner that the defendant can admit or deny and thus form an issue."

In Joseph v. Holt, 37 Cal. 250, the court said: "A complaint should state expressly, that is to say, in direct terms, the facts constituting the cause of action, leaving no essential fact in doubt, or to be inferred or deduced by argument from other facts which are stated. As inference, argument, and hypothesis cannot be tolerated in a pleading, (Green v. Palmer, 15 Cal. 411 [76 Am. Dec. 492].) so material facts cannot be left to inference, argument, or hypothesis, but must be expressly and in terms affirmed."

In Stringer v. Davis, 30 Cal. 318, it was essential that plaintiff allege that certain furniture and upholstery were used in a hotel. The plaintiff alleged "that said furniture and upholstery were furnished for and used in the furnishing of the hotel, in the City and County of San Francisco, known as the Willows."

The court said: "It is not an allegation that the goods were used in a hotel, nor that they were used in a building called the 'Willows,' and that such building was a hotel. There is no direct averment that the 'Willows' is a hotel. If such is the fact, it appears inferentially only. Nor is there any direct averment that, assuming the 'Willows' to be a hotel, the goods were ever used in it, except inferentially. That 'they were furnished for and used in the furnishing of,' etc., is not an allegation that they were thereafter 'used' and non constat that they were."

Examining the present complaint further, we find no allegation of any duty owed by defendant to plaintiff, nor does it appear that defendant might reasonably have anticipated the danger nor that plaintiff unwittingly nor accidentally came in contact with wires negligently maintained.

[1, 2] The rule has oftentimes been expressed that defendant electric company is not liable unless it could reasonably have anticipated the danger. Fairbairn v. American River Elec. Co., 170 Cal. 115, 148 P. 788; Id., 179 Cal. 157, 175 P. 637; McCormick v. Great Western Power Co., 214 Cal. 658, 8 P.(2d) 145, 81 A. L. R. 678, and Anderson v. So. Cal. Edison Co., 77 Cal. App. 328, 246 P. 559. See, also, Sweatman v. Los Angeles, etc., Co., 101 Cal. App. 318, 323, 281 P. 677. If there were an allegation that the wires were maintained in violation of law or of a rule or regulation of the Railroad Commission, then the law would impose the duty. No such allegation is here found except by recital that the wires were maintained "in dangerous proximity" and at "an insufficient height" above the ground. Such words are meaningless as allegations of fact, and are averments of opinion of the pleader only.

[3] The presumptions are against the pleader (section 1963, subd. 1, Code Civ. Proc.), and we must assume, in the absence of the contrary, that the wires were more than 25 feet above the ground, and that the cross-arms were painted a bright yellow, and at designated points bore high voltage signs as required by law.

[4] It appears the accident here was not the result of an accidental contact with the wire while plaintiff was engaged in a rightful occupation. The contact was the deliberate act of plaintiff with full knowledge of all of the consequences.

In 45 C. J. 931, it is said: "A prior and remote cause cannot be made the basis of an action if such remote cause did nothing more than furnish the condition or give rise to the occasion by which the injury was made possible, if there intervened between such prior or remote cause and the injury a distinct, successive, unrelated, and efficient cause of the injury, even though such injury would not have happened but for such condition or occasion. If no danger existed in the condition except because of the independent cause, such condition was not the proximate cause. And if an independent negligent act or defective condition sets into operation the circumstances which result in injury because of the prior effective condition, such subsequent act or condition is the proximate cause."

From the complaint it appears that plaintiff knew of the dangerous character of the wires and their exact location and condition, and deliberately moved a derrick into them and was injured. From the foregoing, it appears the complaint and the amended complaint failed to set forth any cause of action.

[5] We now pass to the contention of plaintiff that the trial court abused its discretion in granting the motion to dismiss and refusing to permit further amendments and dismissing the action. Plaintiff maintains the motion for judgment on the pleadings was made without notice, that it came as a surprise to him, and he had no opportunity to meet the points presented. Here we have a judgment before us which recites that the motion of defendant was regularly made and that no sufficient amendment was offered.

We must assume that plaintiff was satisfied that his complaint and proposed amended complaint set forth all of the essential facts of the case, for the matter was argued and taken under advisement by the trial court on December 29, and held until March 9, and during that period plaintiff took no further steps to amend his complaint.

In the case of Morel v. Morel, 203 Cal. 417, 264 P. 760, the defendant objected to the hearing of the motion on the ground that previous notice had not been given. The court held that the making of the objection was a waiver of notice. "An appellate court will never indulge in presumptions to defeat a judgment. [Citation.] On the contrary, every intendment and presumption not contradicted by or inconsistent with the record on appeal must be indulged in favor of the orders and judgments of superior courts. [Citations.] It is the duty of a litigant complaining of errors committed by a trial court to produce a duly authenticated record affirmatively showing the alleged error, and, if matter relied on to show error has been stricken out by the trial court, he must embody it in a bill of exceptions." Philbrook v. Randall, 195 Cal. 95, 104, 231 P. 739, 742. This is an appeal on the judgment roll, and we are limited in our examination to that alone.

[6, 7] Although permission to amend pleadings is a matter within the sound discretion of the trial court, courts should be liberal in the allowance of amendments, but as here, where a cause of action is not stated and it is apparent from the facts alleged a cause of action cannot by amendment be stated, there is no abuse in refusing to grant the amendment.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

BAKER v. BOARD OF TRUSTEES OF LELAND STANFORD JUNIOR UNIVERSITY (two cases).
Civ. 8864.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

July 11, 1933.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 10, 1933.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 6, 1933.

1. Charities ⇨45(2).

Hospitals organized for charitable purposes are not liable to their patients for injuries resulting from employees' negligence, where reasonable care is used in selection and retention of employees.

2. Charities ⇨45(2).

Hospital had burden of proving that it was charitable institution, and therefore not liable to patient for injury caused by employee's negligence.

3. Charities ⇨1.

"Charity" is gift to be applied, consistently with existing laws, for benefit of indefinite number of persons.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Charity," see Words & Phrases.]

4. Charities ⇨45(2).

Where corporation, administering educational trust, operated hospital which charged customary rates and made no pretense of receiving patients unable to pay for services rendered except where payment was guaranteed by independent organization, hospital held not exempt as "charitable institution" from liability for employee's negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Charitable Institution," see Words & Phrases.]

5. Negligence ⇨121(1).

Where duty exists to maintain property in safe condition, presence of conspicuous defect for considerable time creates presumption of constructive notice thereof.

6. Hospitals ⇨7.

If hospital or its agent had knowledge of defective condition of lamp from which patient received shock, or by exercise of reasonable care could have known of defective condition, hospital was negligent (Civ. Code, § 2332).

7. Hospitals ⇨8.

Where patient received shock from bedside lamp, whether hospital was negligent held for jury (Civ. Code, § 2332).

8. Damages ⇨96.

Amount of damages for personal injury is committed first to jury's and then to trial court's discretion.

9. New trial ⇨157.

In ruling on motion for new trial, trial judge may consider evidence anew and vacate unjust verdict for personal injuries.

10. New trial ⇨77(2).

Verdict for personal injuries will not be vacated unless it is so plainly excessive as to suggest at first blush passion, prejudice, or corruption on part of jury.

11. Damages ⇨132(3).

$10,000 damages for severe electrical shock seriously affecting plaintiff's nervous system and necessitating amputation of little finger and removal of bones in right hand held not excessive.

12. Trial ⇨260(1).

Refusing instructions held not error, where instructions given fairly submitted issues.

Appeals from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by Winifred M. Baker and by R. E. Baker, against the Board of Trustees of the Leland Stanford Junior University, a corporation. From judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

George J. Presley, Redman, Alexander & Bacon, and Herbert Chamberlin, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Edward J. Lynch, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

The plaintiffs in the above actions are husband and wife. Winifred M. Baker sues to recover damages for injuries sustained through the alleged negligence of defendant, and R. E. Baker for the loss of services of his wife and for medical expenses resulting from the said injury. The jury returned verdicts in favor of Winifred M. Baker in the sum of $10,000, and in favor of R. E. Baker for $1,000. Defendant filed motions for new trials, and, same being denied, judgments were rendered for plaintiffs for the aforesaid amounts, and from these judgments defendant appeals.

Appellant relies upon four points for reversal on this appeal: (1) That the Palo Alto Hospital was an eleemosynary institution and that appellant had exercised due care in selecting the hospital employees. (2) That appellant had no knowledge or notice of the defective condition of the lamp. (3) Erroneous instructions regarding charity doctrine and error of the court in refusing instructions requested by appellant. (4) The verdict in favor of Mrs. Baker is excessive.

[1, 2] "The courts of this country have almost unanimously arrived at the conclusion that hospitals organized for charitable purposes are not liable to their patients for injuries arising from the negligence of their employees, where reasonable care is used in the selection and retention of the employee" (citing authorities). Stewart v. California Medical, etc., Ass'n, 178 Cal. 418, 176 P. 46, 47. In that case the court held that the true doctrine was that, if a person accepts the benefit of a public or private charity, he exempts, by implied contract, the benefactor from liability for the negligence of the servants in administering the charity if the benefactor has used due care in the selection of those servants. To the same effect, is, Thomas v. German Gen., etc., Soc., 168 Cal. 183, 141 P. 1186, and the burden of proving that said hospital was a charitable one rests upon appellant. Lewis v. Young Men's Christian Ass'n, 206 Cal. 115, 273 P. 580; Inderbitzen v. Lane Hospital, 124 Cal. App. 462, 12 P.(2d) 744, 13 P.(2d) 905.

E. S. Erwin testified that he was the assistant comptroller of Stanford University; that the number of students was about 3,500; that their tuition fee ranged from $115 to $130 per semester, of which there were three during each year; that $5 of this fee was turned over to the Students' Guild for the purpose of paying the expenses of conducting the hospital; that, when a student becomes ill and needs hospital attention, he enters the hospital and he pays part of the hospital expense, and the balance is paid out of this fund; that the regular rates of that hospital range from $5 per day for a ward, and from $6 to $8.50 per day for a room; that during the fiscal year of 1931 the operating profit of the hospital was $13,909.77. After paying bond interest and sinking fund payments, a balance of $8,959 remained. He further testified that there were no rules or regulations that permit service to be rendered free.

Miss M. Hindman, the assistant superintendent of the hospital, testified that the capacity of the hospital was 35, and that it was filled to capacity all of the time; that at times they received into said hospital patients who were not able to pay for the services rendered them, but were repaid for these services by a charitable organization, composed of ladies in Palo Alto, known as the Palo Alto Hospital Auxiliary; that the hospital furnished no free beds for which it stood the expense itself.

[3, 4] While the appellant corporation was created for the purpose of administering an educational trust, there is nothing in the acts of the Legislature relative to the trust, or creating the corporation, or in the trust itself, which provides that any trust fund shall be used for the said hospital, nor were such funds ever so used. A charity, in the legal sense, may be more fully defined as a gift to be applied, consistently with existing laws, for the benefit of an indefinite number of persons. Estate of Dol, 182 Cal. 159, 187 P. 428; Estate of Sutro, 155 Cal. 727, 736, 102 P. 920; Jackson v. Phillips, 14 Allen (96 Mass.) 539, 556. The city of Palo Alto was the owner of said hospital, and on July 1, 1921, by agreement it delivered possession of said hospital and its equipment to the Leland Stanford Junior University. It was provided in said agreement that during the month of July in each year a statement of the receipts and expenditures of said hospital should be made, and that, after deducting the operating expenses and any working fund that might be agreed upon, the remainder of the receipts should be turned over to the said city. We are of the opinion that the Palo Alto Hospital was not formed and maintained for charitable purposes. No charity was dispensed by it; on the contrary, the usual and customary rates charged by other hospitals were charged by it. It made no pretense of receiving patients unable to pay for the services rendered, except in some instances where the payment was guaranteed by the ladies of Palo Alto under the name of the Palo Alto Hospital Auxiliary, an independent organization. In Stewart v. California Medical, etc., Ass'n, supra, it was held that a corporation organized for a public charity may also conduct an enterprise for gain and be liable for the negligence of its employees in such enterprise, although the profits derived therefrom are devoted to the general purpose of the charity.

Appellant next contends that it had no notice or knowledge of the defective condition of the lamp. Mrs. Baker testified that she was brought to the hospital on April 1, 1931, for an operation; that on April 2 the operation was performed; that for a few days after the operation she had a night and a day nurse, but on the advice of her physician she dispensed with the services of the night nurse; that about midnight of April 6 she awakened and, desiring the services of the floor nurse, pushed the button which was pinned to her pillow and which when pushed caused a red light to appear in the hallway occupied by the floor nurse; that for the convenience of the patient a heavy metal lamp was placed upon a table that stood against the bed; that she reached over with her right hand to turn on the light and received such a shock that she was powerless to release her hand from the lamp; that the floor nurse came into the room shortly thereafter and seeing her condition severed the connection between the lamp and the electric current and thereby released Mrs. Baker's hand from the lamp.

Dr. Wilbur testified that he was connected with the University and that he was one of the staff of the hospital; that he was one of the physicians who attended Mrs. Baker when she was brought to the hospital; that she was placed in room No. 208. On his direct examination he testified that two or three days before the accident he saw the lamp in this room and at that time observed that a portion of the insulation on and surrounding the key which served to turn on the light was broken off, and in answer to a question of the court he stated that he knew this of his own personal knowledge. He further stated the break exposed the metal on the key and that this condition had existed for two or three days before the accident; that he was called a short time after the accident and at that time examined the lamp and found it in the same condition relative to the break that existed before. On cross-examination he testified that he did not personally examine the lamp in room 208 before the accident, that he saw a defective lamp in room No. 212 two or three days before the accident and that he called the attention of a nurse to it and requested her to have it repaired. On redirect examination he testified the insulation on the defective lamp in room No. 212 was broken in the same way as was the lamp in room No. 208, and in every way it appeared to be the same lamp. He further stated that at times the nurses brought lamps from one room to another. There was also evidence that the said broken insulation was plainly visible and that no defective lamp was repaired until after the said accident.

T. Collins, a witness for defendant, testified that he was custodian of the hospital; that he was called to room No. 208 the night of the accident and saw the lamp; that the insulation was broken off of the switch that turned the light on; that a person attempting to turn the light on would receive a terrible shock.

[5-7] Where the duty exists to inspect and maintain property in a safe condition, the presence of a conspicuous defect or dangerous condition of the appliances which has existed for a considerable length of time will create a presumption of constructive notice thereof. Roberts v. Pacific Gas & Elec- tric Co., 102 Cal. App. 422, 283 P. 353; Linforth v. S. F. Gas & Electric Co., 156 Cal. 58, 103 P. 320, 19 Ann. Cas. 1230. Section 2332 of the Civil Code provides that: "As against a principal, both principal and agent are deemed to have notice of whatever either has notice of. * * *" 1 Cal. Jur. 847. Therefore, if appellant or its agents had knowledge of the defective condition of the lamp, or by the exercise of reasonable care would have known of such defective condition, appellant was guilty of negligence. Ocean Steamship Co. v. Matthews, 86 Ga. 418, 12 S. E. 632; Paine v. Eastern R. Co. of Minnesota, 91 Wis. 340, 64 N. W. 1005; Illinois Central R. R. Co. v. Behrens, 208 Ill. 20, 69 N. E. 796. There is evidence from which the jury could conclude that this defect in the lamp existed for two or three days before the accident, and that the defect was patent and obvious. Ordinarily the question of whether or not due care has been exercised to inspect electric equipment to discover defects in the appliances is a matter to be determined by the jury. Roberts v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., supra; 9 R. C. L. 1218; 1 Joyce on Electric Law, p. 726. We are of the opinion that there was sufficient evidence to support the verdict of the jury finding appellant guilty of negligence.

[8-11] Appellant also contends that the verdict in favor of Mrs. Baker is excessive. She was 51 years of age at the time of the accident, and had an expectancy of life of nineteen years. She received a third degree burn to her right hand. It was necessary to amputate her little finger and remove some of the bones in the hand, which has impaired its usefulness one-half to three-fourths. She also received a very severe electric shock which has resulted in seriously affecting her nervous system. Prior to receiving the injury, she did her household work and her own sewing, played the trombone, accordion, and piano, and did designing and painting. Since the accident she has been unable to do any of these things, nor will she be able to do them in the future. At the time the injury was inflicted, she suffered great pain and still suffers pain to an extent. The amount of damages is committed to the sound discretion of the jury, and, next, to the discretion of the judge of the trial court who, in ruling upon the motion for new trial, may consider the evidence anew and set aside the verdict if it is not just. Upon appeal the decision of the trial court and the jury on the subject cannot be set aside unless the verdict is so plainly and outrageously excessive as to suggest, at the first blush, passion or prejudice or corruption on the part of the jury. Hale v. San Bernardino, etc., Co., 156 Cal. 713, 106 P. 83; Lahti v. McMenamin, 204 Cal. 415, 268 P. 644. We cannot say under the conditions shown to exist in this case that the verdict is excessive.

[12] Appellant complains of the action of the trial court in refusing to give certain instructions asked by it. We have examined the instructions and are of the opinion that those given by the court fully and fairly submitted the issues to the jury, and that no error was committed by the court in refusing to give the said instructions asked by appellant.

The judgments are affirmed.

Civ. 1073.

Prohibition ☞ 10(1).

Writ of prohibition to prevent issuance of commitment for disobeying order of court which admitted that it exceeded its jurisdiction was granted.

Application by Frank Hale for a writ of prohibition prayed to be directed to the Superior Court in and for San Diego County, the Honorable Lloyd E. Griffin, as Judge thereof, to prevent the issuance of a commitment.

Peremptory writ of prohibition granted.

James F. Armstrong and Edgar B. Hervey, of San Diego, for petitioner.

Shreve & Shreve, of San Diego, and Ray Miller, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

This is an application for a writ of prohibition to prevent the issuance of a commitment requiring the confinement of petitioner. The petitioner alleges that he appeared before the respondent court and judge on May 13, 1933, in response to an order to show cause why he should not be punished for failure to comply with the terms of a previous order of the court requiring him to pay certain sums of money at certain named dates. It is alleged that a hearing was had on the date named, and the petition purports to set forth the evidence received at this hearing, all of which is to the effect that the petitioner was then entirely without funds and without ability to meet the terms of the previous order; it being also alleged that this evidence was uncontradicted. After alleging that at the conclusion of this hearing the court found the petitioner to be in contempt and ordered him confined in the county jail until such time as he paid the sum of $50 on account of the previous order, the petition alleges that said court and judge will, unless restrained, issue a commitment based upon said order of May 13, 1933, requiring the confinement of petitioner until such time as he pays the sum of $50 on account of said previous order.

An alternative writ was issued prohibiting the respondents from issuing, until the further order of this court, the commitment referred to in the petition. When the matter came on for hearing, the respondents appeared and admitted that in making the order of confinement on May 13, 1933, the court acted in excess of its jurisdiction, and consented that a peremptory writ issue herein.

A peremptory writ of prohibition will issue prohibiting the respondents from issuing the commitment above referred to.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF VENICE v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES.

Civ. 8286.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

July 14, 1933.

Appeal and error ☞ 781(2).

City's appeal, claiming execution against it upon judgment was invalid on ground that city could not legally pay claim voluntarily incurred in one fiscal year out of income of subsequent year, was dismissed as not raising substantial question, where it appeared that if execution issued right to levy would be limited to property subject to execution (Rules for Supreme and District Court of Appeals, rule 5, § 3).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lester R. Roth, Judge.

Action by the First National Bank of Venice against the City of Los Angeles, substituted for the City of Venice. From an order defendant appeals. On motion to dismiss appeal or affirm the order.

Motion granted, and judgment affirmed.

Erwin P. Werner, City Atty., of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Crouch & Crouch and Roscoe B. Hess, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

KIMBALL v. GENERAL ELECTRIC CO.
Civ. 4673.

CONREY, Presiding Justice.

In this action the plaintiff obtained judgment against the city of Venice for balance due on a contract for a municipal improvement constructed for the city by plaintiff's assignor. The judgment was entered October 28, 1925. Thereafter, in accordance with the provisions of law governing such matters, the city of Venice was consolidated with the city of Los Angeles. On December 1, 1931, the court made and entered its order granting a motion of the plaintiff for the substitution of the city of Los Angeles as defendant instead of the city of Venice; and further provided that the judgment be enforced and carried into execution against said substituted defendant and said judgment revived; and the clerk was directed to issue a writ of execution on the judgment as so revived. From this order the defendant appealed.

Briefs having been filed on behalf of appellant and on behalf of respondent, now comes respondent and presents this motion asking that the appeal be dismissed or in the alternative that the order be affirmed upon the ground that the questions on which the decision of the cause depends are so unsubstantial as not to need further argument, and upon the further ground that the appeal was taken for delay only. In other words, the motion is presented under rule V, section 3.

The brief for appellant contains no assignment of error or statement of points relied upon by appellant, except that under the general heading, "Argument," it is contended that a municipality may not legally pay a claim or indebtedness which was voluntarily incurred in one fiscal year out of the income and revenue of any subsequent year, except in the manner provided in section 18 of article 11 of the state Constitution. For this reason it is contended that any order of the court directing the county clerk to issue execution against the city of Los Angeles for the purpose of levying upon and selling property held by the city of Los Angeles in its proprietary capacity for the purpose of satisfying said judgment is clearly erroneous. It seems clear, however, that the rule of law thus relied upon by appellant is not applicable to this appeal. If execution issues on the judgment, the right of levy thereunder will be limited to property which is liable to execution. If the levy shall be made on property exempt by law, appellant will have available the legal remedies for its protection.

The motion is granted and the judgment is affirmed.

PER CURIAM.

Appellant apparently admits that the following authorities, to wit: Hemenway v. Abbott, 8 Cal. App. 450, 97 P. 190, and cases there cited; and 12 California Jurisprudence, 421, and cases there cited, support the statement of this court that the relationship existing between master and servant is confidential, but insists that such relationship imposes a duty only upon the servant of good faith and full disclosure to the master as to all matters affecting the financial welfare of the master arising out of such relationship, but does not require a like good faith and full disclosure on the part of the master toward the servant in transactions or occurrences affecting the financial welfare of the servant arising out of, and dependent upon such relationship. This reasoning does not appear to us to be sound. A one-way application of the rule does not accord with our views of what the law requires in ascertaining and declaring the duties and obligations attendant upon the relationship of master and servant, employer and employee. If an obligation rests upon the servant of good faith toward and of making full disclosure to the master as to all matters affecting the financial welfare of the master, arising out of such relationship, it seems to us clear that a like duty rests upon the master of good faith toward and of making full disclosure as to all matters affecting the financial welfare of the servant, arising out of, and dependent upon such relationship. It is unnecessary to cite authorities to the effect that where one occupying such a relationship makes any disclosure, it must be full and complete. That a duty to make full disclosure rests upon one occupying such relationship is succinctly stated in 12 California Jurisprudence, p. 772.

By reason of an error in typing the opinion of this court, the following correction is necessary:

The paragraph beginning with the word "Irrespective" on the last page of the opinion heretofore filed in this case on the 16th day of June, 1933, should be stricken therefrom, and the following inserted in lieu thereof: "Irrespective of the cases which hold that a right of action for the death of one caused by the negligence of another, given to heirs, is conditioned upon the action being begun within a certain length of time, the argument of appellant is unsound based upon any of the cases involving the death of the injured person, for the simple reason that the right of action for personal injuries inherent in the individual himself who is injured, is a common law right of action and is not given by the statutes."

A reconsideration of the issues involved in this cause leads us to the conclusion that the judgment should stand as affirmed.

The petition for rehearing is denied.

Hillyer & Boldman and F. L. Richardson, all of San Diego, for respondents.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

This is an application for a writ of prohibition to restrain the respondent court from taking proceedings to determine heirship and the right of certain claimants to the money of an estate after the same has been paid into the state treasury.

The facts are not disputed, and are as follows:

In passing upon the final account of the public administrator in the estate of John O. Kelly, deceased, then pending before it, the respondent court on June 6, 1930, entered what the respondents denominate a final decree, which contained, among other things, the following:

"It is further ordered that the final account be approved and settled as presented; that the names, residences and respective shares of the heirs of said deceased cannot at this time be ascertained.

"It is further ordered that the residue of said estate, consisting of Fourteen Thousand, Nine Hundred Eighty-four and 61/100 Dollars ($14,984.61) in cash be paid to the County Treasurer of San Diego County, California, to be held and disposed of according to law."

Pursuant to said decree, the money therein referred to was paid to the treasurer of San Diego county on August 11, 1930. On December 13, 1930, one Patrick Kelly filed a petition in the respondent court in the matter of this estate, alleging that he was a nephew of the decedent and his only heir at law, and praying for an order requiring the county treasurer to pay to him the money in his hands belonging to said estate. An order to show cause why the prayer of this petition should not be granted was issued, but the record discloses neither a hearing thereon nor any continuance. On May 7, 1932, Marie Kelly, Edward John Kelly, and Julia E. Kelly filed a petition in this same estate alleging that they were the widow, son, and daughter, respectively, of the said John C. Kelly, deceased, and praying for an order adjudging them to be his only heirs at law and for an order requiring the county treasurer to pay to them the money referred to. An order was issued requiring all persons to show cause on May 20, 1932, why the prayer of said petition should not be granted. While the record does not show that a hearing in response to this order was ever had or any continuance ordered, the respondents, in their brief, state that a hearing thereon was continued from time to time until the proceedings hereinafter mentioned. On December 30, 1932, pursuant to an order made by the respondent court, the treasurer of the county of San Diego paid the money in question to the treasurer of the state of California. On January 17, 1933, a motion for an order vacating and setting aside the prior order directing the county treasurer to pay the money to the state treasurer, which motion was made on behalf of the four claimants above named, came on for hearing before the respondent court and judge. While the decision upon this motion was held in abeyance, the court, over an objection that it was without jurisdiction in the matter, proceeded to take testimony and receive evidence relating to the right of the claimants to receive said money. The court later denied a motion made by the district attorney to strike out all of the testimony and evidence received on the grounds that the court had no jurisdiction; that the decree of June 6, 1930, had become final, no appeal having been taken and no proceedings having been undertaken to obtain relief under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure; that the res is now in Sacramento county, the money having been transferred there pursuant to the order of the court; and that under the provisions of the Code the superior court of Sacramento county now has exclusive jurisdiction of the matter. The matter having been again set for trial, this proceeding was begun; the petition alleging that the court will proceed to determine the issues referred to unless restrained from so doing.

The question to be here decided is whether, under these circumstances, jurisdiction to determine these claims of heirship in this estate is in the superior court of San Diego county or whether such jurisdiction is now exclusively in the superior court of Sacramento county.

[1] It is the position of respondents that the decree of June 6, 1930, was a decree of distribution to the county treasurer, although not to the heirs of the estate, who were at that time unknown; that under section 1274a of the Code of Civil Procedure it was the duty of the county treasurer to hold this money for one year after he received it; that, under section 1148 of the Probate Code, the court may order such money paid by the county treasurer to the state treasurer only when no heirs or claimants have appeared; and that the respondent court still has jurisdiction since these claimants appeared before the court ordered the money paid by the county treasurer to the state treasurer. Reliance is also placed upon section 1064 of the Probate Code, providing that "when any person appears and claims the money paid into the treasury, the court making the distribution must inquire into such claim, and if satisfied of his right thereto must grant him a certificate to that effect."

It may first be observed that no distribution was ordered in the decree of June 6, 1930. In this respect this case is similar to Estate of Miner, 143 Cal. 194, 76 P. 968, where it is pointed out that the court did not order a distribution, but simply directed the payment of the money remaining in the hands of the public administrator into the county treasury and later ordered it paid by the county treasurer into the state treasury. Not only does the order of June 6, 1930, fail to conform to the requirements of a decree of distribution, but it does not purport to distribute the money to the county treasurer or to any one else.

[2] The statutory provision relating to the deposit of moneys of an estate in the county treasury, and later in the state treasury, when the estate is ready to be closed, and the provisions to enable any one entitled thereto to thereafter withdraw the same from such public depository, fall into two groups, namely, those governing in cases where distribution is made and the distributee for some reason does not appear, and those applying where no distribution is made for the reason that the heirs are unknown at the time the affairs of the estate are settled. Section 1064 of the Probate Code, corresponding to the former section 1696 of the Code of Civil Procedure, section 1274a of the Code of Civil Procedure, and section 1060 of the Probate Code, which is somewhat similar to the former section 1691 of the Code of Civil Procedure, relate in general to property distributed to definite persons who are at the time absent or who cannot be found, or who do not appear and sign a receipt so that the administrator may be discharged. In such cases, it is provided that the money shall remain in the county treasury for one year before being transferred to the state treasury. No such provision is found with reference to a case where the heirs are unknown when the estate is ready to be closed, and where the money is deposited in the county treasury for that reason. In such a case the only provision is that the county treasurer must transfer the money to the state treasurer on the order of the court.

The situation with which we are here concerned is one of those special cases where the heirs are unknown at the time of the final settlement of the estate, and where, instead of entering a decree of distribution, the court orders the money deposited with the county treasurer. At the time the decree of June 6, 1930, was entered, the Probate Code had not been adopted, and the corresponding provisions in the Code of Civil Procedure were in effect. At that time section 1272a of the Code of Civil Procedure provided, and it still provides, that, when any portion of the estate of a decedent has been received by or deposited with the state treasurer pursuant to section 1737 of that Code, the superior court of the county of Sacramento shall have full and exclusive jurisdiction to determine the title to said property and all claims thereto. It further provides for the filing of a petition by any such claimant in the superior court of Sacramento county, or, where the amount claimed is less than $300, for the presentation to and passing upon the claim by the state board of control. Section 1737 of this Code then provided: "After a final settlement of the affairs of any estate, if there are no heirs, or other claimants thereof, the county treasurer must pay into the state treasury all moneys and effects in his hands belonging to the estate, upon order of the court; and if any such moneys and effects escheat to the state, they must be disposed of as other escheated estates."

While section 1737 of the Code of Civil Procedure was repealed upon the adoption of the Probate Code, almost the identical language just quoted is now contained in section 1148 of the latter Code. Section 1737 having been in effect at the time the order of June 6, 1930, was made, the court then had the power, and it was its duty, to order the money transferred to the state treasurer. While such an order was not made until after section 1737 was repealed, the same provisions were continued in section 1148 of the Probate Code, and it could well be held that the court was authorized to complete the order previously made and carry out the provisions of the law existing at the time the affairs of the estate were settled, or that the court could act under section 1272a in conjunction with section 1148 of the Probate Code, then in force.

[3] In any event, we are unable to see that any different result would obtain if the Code provisions in force at the time of the order made in December, 1932, transferring the money to the state treasury, be taken as applying. Section 231 of the Probate Code provides that the proceeds of any estate which has been deposited in the state treasury, either after a final decree of distribution or after a judgment of the superior court, by reason of the failure of heirs to make claim thereto, may be recovered upon judgment of the superior court or order of the state board of control, as provided in the Code of Civil Procedure. While there was no decree of distribution here, there was a judgment of the superior court ordering the money paid to the county treasurer by reason of the failure of the heirs to make claim thereto, and thereafter the proceeds of the estate were deposited in the state treasury. The only provision of the Code of Civil Procedure for recovering money deposited in the state treasury under these circumstances is contained in section 1272a thereof, which provides for a proceeding in the superior court of Sacramento county or, if the claim be for less than $300, for a proceeding before the state board of control.

Nor do we think the situation is changed here because these claimants appeared before the order of transfer to the state treasury was made. If it be conceded that the respondent court had jurisdiction to determine the persons entitled to the money of this estate while the same remained in the county treasury, and if it be further conceded that the court erred in ordering the money transferred to the state treasury after these claimants had filed their petitions, the fact remains that the order was made and the money was paid into the state treasury, where it now is. It can now be withdrawn only in the manner provided by the statutes which, under such circumstances, is by a proceeding over which the superior court of Sacramento county is given jurisdiction. Estate of Miner, supra; In re Kehr, 190 Cal. 401, 212 P. 913. When the money was received by the state treasurer, the probate court in San Diego county lost jurisdiction over the same and over the question of ownership thereof. In effect, the situation is somewhat similar to a case where a probate court loses jurisdiction where money is distributed to a wrong heir. While proper proceedings may be brought to obtain the same by a person in fact entitled thereto, a different proceeding is required. Likewise, a different proceeding is required, when money of this nature is paid into the state treasury, to establish the right of the parties who may be legally entitled thereto to withdraw the same. This proceeding is authorized by section 1272a of the Code of Civil Procedure and takes the place of the equitable remedy available in an ordinary case where an erroneous distribution has been made.

The state has a right to fix the place where it may be sued and whether or not the proceedings provided for such a case as this be considered as a suit against the state, they, like all probate proceedings, are purely statutory, and the Legislature has placed the exclusive jurisdiction thereof in the superior court of Sacramento county. The question of heirship is inseparably connected with the right to receive the money. If the superior court of San Diego county were to attempt to determine whether these claimants were the rightful heirs of the deceased, it could make no effective order because the money has been placed where it can only be reached in the manner provided by law. The respondents urge that these claimants have the right to establish their claim in San Diego county and thereafter look to the county treasurer or his bondsmen for wrongfully transferring the money. Not only does it appear that this officer has transferred the same by order of court, but, if successful in that court, these claimants would then be under the necessity of repeating their showing in a similar proceeding in Sacramento county in order to obtain the money. No such double jurisdiction can exist and, in our opinion, the superior court of San Diego county is now without jurisdiction in the premises. We conclude, therefore, that the prayer of the petitioner should be granted.

Let the peremptory writ issue as prayed.

MARKS, Justice.

The facts in this case were stipulated and are not in dispute. The sole question is whether a recovery against appellant can be sustained on the terms of the "Super Blanket Bond" or "Bankers' Blanket Bond," as it was denominated by the policy, and under the facts here presented.

The facts pertinent to this appeal may be summarized as follows:

At all times material to this action Gordon L. Eby and Lewis H. Homer were attorneys in fact for the Indemnity Insurance Company of North America, which for brevity we will refer to as the Indemnity Company, and each was authorized to execute, acknowledge, and deliver in the name of the company indemnity and fidelity bonds and undertakings including those similar to the one here involved. Homer had offices with and was employed by Eby. He acted as solicitor and salesman for the Indemnity Company and inspected and supervised the work of contractors for whom the Indemnity Company had written indemnity or fidelity bonds and represented the Indemnity Company in cases where such contractors had failed or were about to fail or had abandoned the performance of their contracts. These facts were all known to respondent and its officers.

P. C. Kelley was a vice president of the Security Trust & Savings Bank of San Diego and was authorized to and did act for it in all the transactions involved in this action. R. W. Forsyth was the Pacific Coast manager of the Indemnity Company. Blanche P. Matson was a notary public in and for San Diego county, and was employed in the office of Eby up to about November 17, 1928, on which date her employment terminated. Respondent and its officers knew she was a notary public and that she was employed in the office of Eby, but had no knowledge of the termination of her employment until after March 4, 1929.

On or about December 24, 1928, Homer represented to Kelley that a contractor named R. T. Dawson had obtained two public improvement contracts, one known as the Sweetwater bridge contract and the other as the Dulzura conduit contract, with the Indemnity Company as surety on his labor, material, and completion bonds; that Dawson was unable to complete the contracts, and that the Indemnity Company would be compelled to take over and complete them at a cost to it of $15,000; that the completion would require about six months; that the Indemnity Company had instructed Homer to take charge of the completion work and to borrow money in his own name from the respondent to complete the contracts; that the Indemnity Company would guarantee the repayment of the loan by giving a bond in the penal sum of $16,500. Homer gave Kelley an unexecuted bond which would serve as the form of the bond to be executed to secure this loan. This application for a loan was referred to the loan committee of respondent. Kelley reported the representations made to him by Homer and gave the committee the blank form of bond. While the application was under consideration by the loan committee, and for the purpose of inducing it to approve the loan, Homer presented to respondent the following letter:

"Gordon L. Eby & Co.,

"Gentlemen: Re: Robert T. Dawson S. A. 15148 Sweetwater Bridge. S. A. 14194 Dulzura Conduit. Your wire received. You are hereby authorized to sign Indemnity Bond $16500.00 favor of Security Trust & Savings Bank of San Diego securing note of Lewis H. Homer issued for six months.

"Very truly yours,

"R. W. Forsyth

"RWF/AM R. W. Forsyth, Manager."

Homer represented to the officers of respondent that the foregoing letter was genuine and bore the genuine signature of R. W. Forsyth. The loan committee and officers of respondent believed Homer's representations and authorized the making of the proposed loan, which was to be evidenced by the promissory note of Homer, due in six months and secured by the written guaranty of the Indemnity Company.

On or about December 27, 1928, Homer executed and delivered to respondent the required promissory note in the principal sum of $15,000 and the written guaranty purporting to have been executed by the Indemnity Company and having attached to it the signature of the Indemnity Company by Gordon L. Eby, its attorney in fact. This guaranty bore the acknowledgment of Eby before Blanche P. Matson, a notary public. Homer represented that the guaranty bore the genuine signature of Eby and was in fact duly acknowledged by him. Respondent and its officers did not question the truth of these representations, made the loan upon the security mentioned, and placed $15,000 to the credit of Lewis H. Homer in a checking account subject to his check. All of this money was withdrawn by checks signed by Homer prior to March 1, 1929, except the sum of $28.49. Homer disappeared on this last date and has not since been apprehended.

It is stipulated that respondent would not have advanced the money to Homer had it not believed all the representations made by him and that the letter and guaranty were the genuine acts of Forsyth and the Indemnity Company.

All the representations made by Homer were false and fraudulent except that there was a contractor named R. T. Dawson who had two contracts for public improvements which we have mentioned, that the Indemnity Company had written a labor, material, and completion bond for him, and that the signature and seal of Blanche P. Matson on the certificate of acknowledgment were genuine. The signature of Forsyth on the letter was forged, as was the signature "Indemnity Company of North America by Gordon L. Eby, attorney in fact," on the guaranty. The signature of Blanche P. Matson on the certificate of acknowledgment was her genuine signature. It had been attached to the certificate in blank before it was attached to the indemnity guaranty bond. It was her custom to sign acknowledgment certificates in blank for convenience. These were left in her desk in the office of Eby. The certificate of acknowledgment was filled out by Homer or some other person without her knowledge or consent and the notarial seal attached after she left Eby's office and was attached to the guaranty bond by Homer before its delivery to the respondent. Security Trust & Savings Bank v. Matson, 116 Cal. App. 616, 2 P.(2d) 1001. Neither Forsyth, Eby, or the Indemnity Company had any knowledge of the execution and delivery of the forged letter or of the forged guaranty bond, and neither respondent nor its officers had any knowledge of these forgeries nor of the falseness of the representations made by Homer until after March 1, 1929.

The trial court rendered judgment against appellant in the sum of $14,971.51, the amount of the $15,000 loan less the $28.49 recovered, together with accrued interest and costs.

The only paragraphs of the "Bankers' Blanket Bond" pertinent to this case are as follows: "The losses covered by this bond are as follows: * * * (B) Any loss of property through robbery, larceny (whether common-law or statutory), burglary, theft. * * * Whether effected with or without violence or with or without negligence on the part of the employees while the property is within any of the Insured's offices covered hereunder. * * * "The foregoing agreement is subject to the following conditions and limitations: * * * This bond does not cover: (a) Any loss effected directly or indirectly by means of forgery, except when covered by Insuring Clause (A) or (D) hereof. * * * (d) Any loss resulting from any loan made by the Insured. * * * " It is admitted that insuring clauses A and D do not apply to the facts of this case.

The grounds upon which appellant attacks the judgment are clearly set forth in its brief as follows: "First: Even if exception clauses (a) and (d) of 'Section 2' had been entirely omitted from the bond, the bank's loss still would not be covered, either by Insuring Clause 'B' or by any other provision in the bond; Second: The bank's loss was admittedly 'effected * * * indirectly by means of forgery,' and is for that reason expressly excluded from coverage by exception clause (a) of 'Section 2' of the bond; and Third: The bank's loss clearly 'resulted from a loan', and for that reason is expressly excluded from coverage by exception clause (d) of 'Section 2' of the bond." The arguments advanced under the first and third contentions are so closely connected that it will not be necessary to consider them separately.

It cannot be successfully denied that Homer's conduct in obtaining the loan from the Security Trust & Savings Bank of San Diego and in using the money thus made available to him made him guilty of theft as it is now defined by section 484 of the Penal Code. See, also, 490a, Pen. Code. Every element of the offense is presented in the facts stipulated to by the parties. People v. White, 124 Cal. App. 548, 12 P.(2d) 1078.

Appellant seeks to avoid the results of this conclusion by urging that Homer secured "credit" in the bank by his fraud, and that, as the term "credit" is not included within the definition of "property" in the bond, there is no liability under its terms. We must confess that we cannot follow the refinements of this reasoning. It is true that he did obtain "credit" with the bank by his fraud. It is also true that he turned this credit into money which he used for his own purposes. It was stipulated that "all of said money, except the sum of twenty-eight dollars and forty-nine cents ($28.49) was withdrawn from said account by checks drawn and signed by said Lewis H. Homer prior to March 1, 1929." The argument of appellant stops with one of the steps taken by Homer in the consummation of his scheme. He was given a credit on the books of the bank, was paid the amount of the credit, except $28.49, in money, and decamped with it. It was his ultimate purpose to obtain money by his fraud. He received this money, and "money" is specifically included within the definition of "property", in the bond. Appellant has confused one of the steps employed in accomplishing the purpose with the purpose accomplished—the means with the result.

It is self-evident that, had the bond contained no exceptions or reservations and only the insuring clause B from which we have quoted, there would have been no defense to the action and the judgment would have to be affirmed.

It is also equally true that, if full force and effect be given to the literal language of the exception clauses (a) and (d), from which we have quoted, judgment should have gone in favor of appellant. The loss was certainly effected "indirectly by means of forgery" for without forgery there would have been no loan and no loss. The loss also resulted from a loan, for again, if there had been no loan, there would have been no loss.

We are therefore confronted with this dilemma. Under the insuring clause, literally applied to the facts, the respondent should recover. Under two exception clauses equally literally applied appellant should recover. The bond could have been rendered harmonious in all its terms by adding to the insuring clause B the following: "Excepting from liability hereunder any loss by theft 'effected directly or indirectly by means of forgery' and theft 'resulting from any loan made.'" It could have been rendered equally harmonious by adding to the exception clauses (a) and (d) the following: "But not excepting any loss caused by 'theft.'"

When the exact language of the entire policy is applied to the facts of this particular case, we are forced to the conclusion that insuring clause B and the excepting clauses (a) and (d) are in direct conflict. There are innumerable cases and states of facts which might arise where there could be no conflict in the provisions of the policy. It is only under the facts of this case or one similar to it that the contradictions appear. In a case of loss by theft, where neither forgery nor a loan was involved, there could be no conflict. In a case of loss from forgery or a loan where there was no theft, there again would be no conflict. It is only where a loss resulted from theft in which either forgery or a loan or both occurred that the provisions of the bond become inconsistent. For this to appear it is necessary to read the instrument with facts in mind similar to those of the instant case.

Appellant confidently relies upon the following cases as supporting its contention that a recovery cannot be had because the loss was indirectly occasioned by means of forgery: Century Bank of the City of New York v. Mountain, (Lloyds) 112 Law T. (Eng.) 484 (1914); Trade Bank of New York v. United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co., 249 N. Y. 546, 164 N. E. 578; World Exchange Bank v. Commercial Casualty Ins. Co., 255 N. Y. 1, 173 N. E. 902. A study of these cases has satisfied us that they strongly support the position of appellant.

[1-3] Well-settled rules of construction of indemnity contracts have been announced by the courts of this state and are helpful to us in solving the question presented. Generally speaking, the construction of these contracts should be governed by the rules which apply to other written engagements. They should be considered as a whole and the various provisions read together and, if possible, harmonized and given effect. Burr v. Western States Life Ins. Co., 211 Cal. 568, 296 P. 273. "Repugnancy in a contract must be reconciled, if possible, by such an interpretation as will give some effect to the repugnant clauses, subordinate to the general intent and purpose of the whole contract." Section 1652, Civ. Code; Kelly v. Great Western Acc. Ins. Co., 46 Cal. App. 747, 189 P. 785. "It is a well-recognized rule of law that if any uncertainties or ambiguities appear in an insurance policy which may be solved by either one of two reasonable constructions, the one which is most favorable to the insured and which will give life, force, and effect to the policy should be adopted. The insurance company, having prepared the policy and all documents used in connection with its issuance, should not be heard to put such a construction upon an ambiguity, caused by it, as will defeat the policy and take from the beneficiary the very purpose and object of the insurance, if a reasonable construction upholding the insurance can be had that does no violence to the language used and the clear intention of the parties." Narver v. California State Life Ins. Co., 211 Cal. 176, 294 P. 393, 395, 71 A. L. R. 1374. Since the language in the bond was furnished by the insurer, it is in accordance with the principles of common justice that its own words should be construed most strongly against it, and such language should be used so that the conditions, provisions, and exceptions are made clear to the ordinary mind. Pacific, etc., Co. v. Williamsburgh City Fire Ins. Co. of Brooklyn, 158 Cal. 367, 111 P. 4. In the event it fails to do so, any uncertainty or ambiguity should be construed against it. Goorberg v. Western Assurance Co., 150 Cal. 510, 89 P. 130, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 376, 119 Am. St. Rep. 246, 11 Ann. Cas. 801. "All doubts or ambiguities must be resolved against the insurance company." Dibble v. Reliance Life Ins. Co., 170 Cal. 199, 149 P. 171, 175, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 34. Where a policy of insurance contains exceptions and provisos purporting to relieve the insurer from liability, these provisions will be strictly construed against the insurer and in favor of the insured. Goorberg v. Western Assurance Co., supra. "This is now the settled rule for construing all kinds of insurance policies, rendered necessary, especially in modern times, to circumvent the ingenuity of insurance companies in so framing contracts of this kind as to make the exceptions unfairly devour the whole policy." Berliner v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 121 Cal. 458, 53 P. 918, 920, 41 L. R. A. 467, 66 Am. St. Rep. 49. It is established that an exception which would avoid the policy should be construed against the insurer to prevent such a result if the language employed permits such an interpretation. Summer v. New York Life Ins. Co., 186 Cal. 789, 200 P. 621.

[4] By applying these rules of construction to the facts before us, we believe that any person of ordinary mind, including bankers and members of the legal profession, when reading the bond in question without the particular facts of this or a similar case in mind, would conclude (1) that the bond insured against any loss by theft; (2) that exception clause (a) was intended to relieve the insurer from liability occasioned directly or indirectly from the numerous varieties of forgeries against which a bank must guard and in which theft is not an element; and (3) that the same construction would be applied to exception clause (d). As the insuring clause B and the excepting clauses (a) and (d) are conflicting when considered under the facts of this case, and are not conflicting under the facts of innumerable other cases, we must construe them most strongly against the insurer and conclude that they do not relieve it from liability for loss occasioned by theft.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. McGEE. *
Cr. 153.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

July 17, 1933.

Criminal law ⚡998.

Motion to set aside judgment of conviction of rape where statute of limitations had run before information was filed would lie on ground court had no jurisdiction to pronounce judgment (Pen. Code, § 800).

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Robert B. Lambert, Judge.

John McGee was convicted of rape, and he subsequently filed a motion to vacate the judgment. From an order denying the motion, defendant appeals.

Reversed, with directions.

W. C. Dorris, of Bakersfield, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank Richards, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

TURRENTINE, Justice pro tem.

On November 3, 1930, an information was filed charging the defendant with the crime of rape alleged to have been committed on or about March 30, 1926. Section 800 of the Penal Code, requires that an information must be filed within three years after the commission of the crime. Nothing appears in the information which would bring the case within the exceptions of the rule in Penal Code, § 802. To the information the defendant pleaded guilty, and was by the judgment of the court sentenced to imprisonment in state's prison on November 5, 1930. No objection to the information or any proceedings based thereon were urged until March 18, 1933, when the defendant filed a notice of motion to annul, vacate, and set aside the judgment. Said motion was presented, submitted, and by the court denied. From this ruling defendant appeals.

Respondent calls attention to the case of Ex parte Blake, 155 Cal. 586, 102 P. 269, 270, 18 Ann. Cas. 815, which we cannot distinguish in principle from the case at bar. Appellant relies on the case of People v. Hoffman (Cal. App.) 22 P.(2d) 229, wherein the facts are identical. Ex parte Blake, supra, holds: "That the statute of limitations is mere matter of defense, and is not a ground for discharge of a prisoner on habeas corpus * * * upon the fundamental rule that habeas corpus will not lie for the correction of mere errors which may be reached by motion or on appeal."

People v. Hoffman, supra, holds that a motion to set aside the judgment on the grounds that the court had no jurisdiction to pronounce the judgment would lie on the facts stated.

The statement of law in the two cases directly contradict each other. We feel that the correct principle is laid down in People v. Hoffman, supra, and that it is supported by the greater weight of authority as well as our Supreme Court, when it denied a hearing in the Hoffman Case, supra.

On the authority of People v. Hoffman, supra, the order denying the motion is reversed, with directions to the trial court to grant the motion.

GIST et ux. v. SECURITY TRUST & SAV-INGS BANK et al.
L. A. 13092.

Supreme Court of California.
July 29, 1933.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 28, 1933.

1. Vendor and purchaser ⇨44.

Evidence in purchasers' action for rescission supported findings that purchasers entered contract under mistaken belief that lot described therein was property they had inspected and intended to purchase.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⇨119.

Purchasers' rescission of realty purchase contract held not barred by laches where they promptly protested on discovery of mistake, entered negotiations for peaceful settlement, and filed notice of rescission when advised settlement could not be effected (Civ. Code, § 1691).

⇨For other cases see same topic and KEY NUMBER in all Key Number Digests and Indexes
24 P.(2d)—10½

3. Vendor and purchaser ⇨43(1).

Purchasers' payment of storm drain assessment held not affirmation of purchase contract, or waiver of right of rescission where payment was to enable them to reconvey to vendors should restoration be required.

4. Vendor and purchaser ⇨118.

Vendors held estopped to assert alleged default of purchasers in not continuing payments on purchase contract, or to complain that vendors would suffer because of decline in realty values where purchasers seeking rescission were lulled into security by vendors' acts indicating peaceful settlement.

5. Evidence ⇨258(1).

In purchasers' action for rescission of realty purchase contract, admitting evidence of conversations with defendants' agent held not error, where evidence showing that mistake involved justified rescission was clear and agent's connection with all defendants having interest in transaction was established.

6. Vendor and purchaser ⇨42.

Contract provision that purchasers had purchased realty wholly as result of inspection did not estop them from procuring rescission, where contract failed to describe property they inspected and intended to purchase.

7. Trusts ⇨201.

Trustee executing purchase contract to realty held in trust, as result of negotiations conducted through beneficiaries' selling agents on behalf of all beneficiaries, held liable on rescission only in its representative capacity as trustee for return of money purchasers paid.

8. Judgment ⇨240.

Joint and several judgment for sums paid by purchasers rescinding purchase contract held warranted against beneficiaries sharing jointly and severally in fruits of transaction by which realty held in trust was sold.

PRESTON, Justice.

Action for rescission of a contract for the purchase of real property. Judgment for plaintiffs. Appeal by defendants.

About December, 1925, the Los Feliz Hills Tract in Los Angeles was opened for subdivision and sale to the public. Defendant bank, as trustee, held title to the property to secure an indebtedness to it, under the terms of a trust agreement whereby one Dickson was named as trustor and defendants Edwards & Wildey Company, Cooper, Williams, Laack, and Cotton were named as beneficiaries. Edwards & Wildey and Laack and Williams were selling agents for the tract, and the latter firm employed a licensed real estate salesman, Louis G. Wurtz, through whom the transaction with plaintiffs was consummated.

Plaintiff, Mrs. Gist, had known Mr. Wurtz for many years. For many years also she had coveted, for a home site, one particular knoll, or portion of land in the tract, from which could be had a wide valley view of surrounding territory, which she considered superior to that obtainable from any other point. Shortly after the opening of the tract, she noticed that the land was to be subdivided. She immediately sought Mr. Wurtz, told him of her desire for said certain parcel of land, and later she inspected the territory with him and pointed out the exact spot upon which she wished to build a home. He assured her that the lot was for sale, whereupon she consulted her husband, plaintiff C. Wooster Gist, and the following day again visited the place with him and with Mr. Wurtz. The lot was situated on a steep hillside, fan-shaped and narrowing toward the rear. The front stakes were not visible. There was some conversation as to the location of the side boundaries. The salesman picked up a stone, threw it roughly down the hill toward a tree, and told plaintiffs that the course of the stone marked the approximate border line of the lot; that the tree itself would not be on their property but that the spread of it would extend over the boundary.

A day or two later plaintiffs, a brother-in-law, an architect, and the salesman again inspected the lot; their main object being to determine the cost and feasibility of building on the steep slope. At this time the rear boundary was marked by corner stakes, but the widening of the lot to the front was only estimated as on the previous day. Plaintiffs felt satisfied with their inspection of the property, and soon thereafter, and on March 1, 1926, they made a down payment of $1,187.50 on the $4,750 purchase price thereof, agreeing to pay the balance in three equal yearly installments, with quarterly interest on deferred payments. A document entitled "Purchaser's receipt," setting forth the terms of the sale, was executed by Mr. Wurtz and indorsed "accepted" by Mr. Murray Brophy on behalf of Edwards & Wildey Company. On the same day, March 1, 1926, the formal contract of purchase and sale was executed by plaintiffs and by defendant bank.

Plaintiffs kept up their interest payments and also made the payments of $1,187.50 due on the principal in March, 1927, and March, 1928, but they did not visit the property again until April, 1928, when for the first time they noticed that the laying out of streets and subdivision work had been completed and front stakes marked the property line of their lot. They were surprised at this time to discover that the land they had intended to purchase, and thought they were purchasing, described as "lot 26" in the contract, was in fact a part of lot 26 and a part of lot 27, that lot 26 would not afford them the full view they desired, and that its side boundary line, instead of being some four or five feet west of the above-mentioned tree as estimated, was in fact approximately twenty-five feet from it.

Plaintiffs immediately informed Mr. Wurtz, who was still employed by Edwards & Wildey Company, though not on the tract, that there must be some mistake; he promised to consult his superiors, and, after a number of conversations, a conference was had with Mr. Brophy, who had accepted the contract for Edwards & Wildey. Plaintiffs asked for a delivery of the property they thought they were purchasing, or for a return of the money paid by them. They were told from time to time that the matter was being taken up with the various beneficiaries. The illness of Mr. Gist caused further delay in the negotiations, but Mr. Wurtz later reported that his efforts toward adjustment had been unsuccessful. The matter was then brought before the real estate commission (in November, 1928), and Mr. Brophy, on behalf of defendants, asked for further time to consider an adjustment. Other proceedings were had over a period of weeks, and it was not until about January 18, 1929, that plaintiffs were finally and authoritatively advised that a settlement could not be effected. Their notice of rescission was served the next day, and this action was commenced on March first thereafter.

The court made findings upholding the facts as reflected in the above statement; that is, the court found that said contract was entered into by plaintiffs under the mistaken belief that the lot therein described was the property they had inspected and intended to purchase; otherwise they would not have made the purchase; that, when the mistake was discovered by them, about April 1, 1928, they promptly notified defendants; made no further payments of principal or interest, and refrained from taking direct action toward rescission only until they finally learned from defendants that the controversy could not be settled amicably.

[1, 2] The findings and conclusions of the court below and the judgment have abundant support in the evidence. Indeed, the several contentions of appellants do not merit extended consideration. Their claim that plaintiffs are precluded from recovery because of delay and lack of diligence, the record shows to be without foundation. Immediately upon discovery of the mistake, plaintiffs sought an adjustment from defendants; there was no cessation of their efforts in this direction, and the evidence clearly shows that the lapse of time before formal rescission was made was due to the attitude of defendants themselves in indicating that a settlement without litigation could probably be effected and in asking for extensions of time in which to consider the matter. Section 1691 of the Civil Code provides that a party must rescind promptly upon discovery of the facts which entitle him to rescission, but no definite period is provided, and the question of laches is one for the trial court. Where, as here, a party protests promptly upon discovery of the facts entitling him to rescind, and then immediately enters into negotiations for peaceable adjustment, a rescission made within a reasonable time after failure of compromise or settlement is not barred by laches. Sherratt v. Hellman, etc., Bank, 112 Cal. App. 542, 297 P. 582, and cases cited; Hunt v. L. M. Field, Inc., 202 Cal. 701, 262 P. 730. In this cause the evidence fully supports the findings of the court below on the issue of laches.

[3] The payment by plaintiffs on July 28, 1928, of a storm drain assessment of $47.84 against the property did not constitute an affirmance of the contract or waiver of the right of rescission, in view of the findings of the trial court, well supported by the evidence, to the effect that said payment was made solely for the purpose of protecting and preserving the property so plaintiffs might be in a position to reconvey it to the vendors should restoration ultimately be required.

[4] Appellants contend that, as plaintiffs made no payments of principal or interest after discovery of the mistake, and as time was of the essence of the contract, plaintiffs were in default at the time of rescission and cannot prevail. Had plaintiffs made any payment, appellants would doubtless rely upon the very claim they assert with respect to the storm drain assessment payment, to wit, that such act, being an act of dominion over the property, would constitute an affirmance of the contract or waiver of the right of rescission. However, as above set forth, the evidence shows that plaintiffs were lulled into a sense of security by the acts of defendants; hence defendants are estopped to assert the delay or alleged default of plaintiffs. For the same reason defendants are estopped to complain that they will suffer loss because of a decline in real estate values over the period in question.

[5] The evidence showing that the mistake here involved was such as to justify a rescission is clear and convincing, and the authority of Mr. Wurtz to negotiate the sale and his connection with the other defendants is well established. There was no error on the part of the court below in admitting evidence of conversations had with Mr. Wurtz during the course of the entire transaction.

[6] The contract of purchase contained a provision to the effect that the buyer had inspected the property and purchased it "wholly as a result of said inspection and not upon any representation by the seller, or its agent," and that the buyer therefore waived all claim for damages by reason of any representation other than the covenants of the written contract. Appellants claim that this provision should estop plaintiffs from recovery herein. But plaintiffs have claimed no more at any time than the property they actually inspected. They are not seeking to enforce any representation outside the written contract. They claim that, through mistake, the contract failed to describe the property they inspected and purported to buy. The mistake dates from the inception of the transaction, and plaintiffs could not have ascertained the lot number from their inspection of the land.

[7, 8] It is contended that the court erred in rendering a joint and several judgment against all of the defendants for return of the sums paid by plaintiffs, upon reconveyance by them of the property to defendant bank. Defendant bank was trustee and held the legal title to the property. The other defendants, by their pleadings, admitted a beneficial interest in the trust; in addition, some of them were also selling agents for the tract. Defendant beneficiaries are asserted to have participated proportionately in the distribution of payments made by plaintiffs. Appellants argue that, as the trustee disbursed the payments before any question was raised as to the validity of the contract, it should not be held liable for return of said money, and that the respective beneficiaries should be held liable only for the proportionate amount of the distribution made to each of them. The evidence shows, however, that the bank executed the contract as the result of the negotiations conducted through defendant selling agents on behalf of all the defendants. It should therefore be held liable in its representative capacity, as trustee, only. Defendants, having shared jointly and severally in the fruits of the transaction, are in no position to deny their liability in the matter of rescission. The evidence supports the findings of the court as to the relationship of the parties defendant, and warrants the entry of a joint and several judgment against them.

Paragraph 3 of the judgment is hereby amended to read as follows: "That plaintiffs have and recover of and from defendants and each of them, the sum of $4071.45 principal; the further sum of $1131.37 interest to March 1, 1931; making in all the sum of $5202.82, together with interest on said total sum of $5202.82 from March 1, 1931, at the rate of seven per cent (7%) per annum until paid. The liability of defendant Security Trust & Savings Bank, a corporation, is limited, however, to a judgment against it in its representative capacity as trustee." As so modified, the judgment is affirmed.

LE CLERG et al. v. CITY OF SAN DIEGO
et al.
S. F. 14761.

Supreme Court of California.

July 13, 1933.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 10, 1933.

1. Municipal corporations ⇨1038.

Judgments against municipalities are not enforceable until after levy and collection of annual taxes for payment thereof (St. 1901, p. 794, § 3).

2. Mandamus ⇨3(8).

Judgment creditors' remedy against city, funds in treasury of which were not raised for payment of judgments, is under statutory provision for collection of judgments, not mandamus (St. 1901, p. 794, § 3).

3. Municipal corporations ⇨1038.

City properly refused to pay judgments against it before levy of tax for purpose, though its charter authorized appropriations to satisfy its debts in annual ordinance or auditor's account (St. 1901, p. 794, § 3; St. 1931, p. 2889, § 74).

4. Mandamus ⇨102(1).

Peremptory writ of mandamus to compel issuance of warrants for full amount of judgments against city held inappropriate, where alternative writ was returnable too late to afford relief for current tax year and before time for levy of ensuing year's tax (St. 1901, p. 794, § 3).

PER CURIAM.

Petition for mandate to compel the auditor and comptroller of the city of San Diego to issue warrants to the petitioners for the full amount of judgments held by them against said city. It is alleged in substance in the petition that on or about the 19th day of December, 1927, the San Diego common council duly passed an ordinance numbered 11497, providing for the employment of special deputy engineers in the operating department of said city, prescribing their duties and fixing their compensation; that this employment was created in order to perform a large volume of street improvement work. The ordinance creating these positions provided that the appointments be made from the eligible civil service list. The petitioners were thereafter duly appointed and certified to the positions held by them by the common council, and their duties were designated by resolution of said council. It is then alleged that they performed the preliminary work leading up to the improvements, but, before the same had progressed to award of contract therefor, the city, through its council, abandoned all of the proceedings. Thereafter the petitioners filed actions against the city for their compensation. Their complaints were demurred to, and the demurrers were overruled. The city then answered.

Thereafter the council passed a resolution wherein it was recited that the total amount sought to be recovered in said actions was $125,000; that the superior court had decided that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the reasonable value of their services; that the further defense by the city of said actions would entail great additional costs, and probably result in judgments against it in excess of $67,500; that the city deemed said sum to be a reasonable amount to pay the special engineers for their services. This resolution directed the city attorney to consent to the entry of judgments against the city for said sum of $67,500. It is then alleged that, pursuant to said resolution, the city attorney entered into a stipulation in said actions, consenting to the entry of judgments against the city in favor of the petitioners herein, in respective sums aggregating the above amount. This stipulation provided that the judgments so entered should be as binding and effective as though entered by the court after a full trial of each of the actions on the merits, and that any right of the parties to appeal therefrom should be deemed waived. All the judgments were thereupon made and entered, and they have become final.

The petitioners allege that the clerk of the court then filed with the council and the auditor of the city a certificate and audit of said judgments. Further allegations are to the effect that there is sufficient money in the city treasury to pay the judgments, but, notwithstanding this fact, the city refuses to pay and the auditor refuses to issue his warrant therefor. The petition also recites that, in incurring the obligation to pay the petitioners compensation for their services out of the city treasury in conformity with the terms of the ordinance, the city did not incur any indebtedness or liability exceeding the income and revenue provided for the year in which said obligations were incurred. The judgments here involved are based upon obligations accruing variously in the fiscal years 1929-1930 and 1930-1931. Furthermore, the petitioners advance the theory that the obligations upon which the judgments are based are statutory in character, and that section 18 of article 11 of the Constitution, limiting the power of legislative bodies of municipalities to incur indebtedness or liability in any manner or for any purpose exceeding in any year the income provided for such year, has application to contractual obligations alone, and has no reference to obligations statutory in character.

Even if this be true, and assuming for the purposes of this case that the obligations are statutory, it does not follow that the petitioners are entitled to the specific relief sought, viz., the issuance of warrants on existing funds of the city for the full amount of said judgments.

[1, 2] It is the position of the respondents that a writ of mandate will not lie to compel the municipality to pay a judgment prior to the levy of a tax for that purpose pursuant to the provisions of the act of the Legislature, approved March 23, 1901, entitled: "An act to provide for the payment of judgments against counties, cities, cities and counties, and towns." St. 1901, p. 794. Section 3 provides: "It shall be the duty of the auditor to examine and audit the final judgments so reported by the county clerk, and to certify the amount of such final judgments to the treasurer within five (5) days from the day on which such list of final judgments is filed with him. Thereupon, the board of supervisors, city council, town trustees, or other board of officers, as the case may be, having authority to levy taxes upon the taxable property of such county, city and county, city, or town, must include in the tax levy for the next fiscal year a rate or sum sufficient to pay all final judgments existing against such county, city and county, city, or town. The omission to include the amount of any existing final judgment in the tax levy for any year, shall not of itself invalidate the tax levy as made, but such omission or omissions must be included in the next tax levy; provided, that the board of supervisors or other board or officers having authority to levy taxes may provide for the payment of such final judgments when so audited by including in the tax levy for the next fiscal year an aliquot part or fraction of the amount of such judgments, and thereupon the treasurer shall pay to each judgment creditor a like aliquot part or fraction of the amount of the judgment of the creditor, and thereafter a like aliquot part or fraction of the amount of such judgments shall be levied and paid each successive year until the whole thereof shall be fully paid; but such fractional levy and payment shall in no case be less than one tenth (1/10) of the whole amount of such judgments."

The plain intent of the statute is that the municipality after the rendition of a judgment shall have a proper time in which to raise the money by taxation for its payment. Prior thereto the funds of the city are to be used to pay statutory, necessary, and usual charges provided for in the budget. A writ issued during the fiscal year, compelling the payment of judgments out of the operating funds on hand, might impair the operation of the city, for it is conceivable that a municipality might incur a liability far in excess of the amount of funds of the city's income during the year in which the judgments were obtained. The case of the City of Long Beach v. Lisenby, 180 Cal. 52, 179 P. 198, affords an example of just such a situation. The statute clearly contemplates that judgments against municipalities are not enforceable until after an annual tax has been levied and collected therefor. Frederick v. City of Gloversville, 112 App. Div. 146, 97 N. Y. S. 1105. Where the funds in a city treasury are raised for other purposes, the remedy of a judgment creditor against the city is to proceed under the statutory provision for the collection of judgments. Griswold v. Common Council of City of Ludington, 117 Mich. 317, 75 N. W. 609. This has been the practice followed in this state. Cary v. Long, 181 Cal. 443, 184 P. 857; Cook v. Supervisors, 99 Cal. App. 169, 277 P. 1064; Palace Hotel Co. v. Supervisors, 58 Cal. App. 742, 209 P. 256; Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. Deasy, 41 Cal. App. 667, 183 P. 243.

[3] A petition for a rehearing after an order denying the peremptory writ was granted because of the insistence of the petitioners that the method prescribed by law for the payment of debts of the municipality is set forth in the charter of the city, that such a matter is a municipal affair, and that the act of 1901 is not controlling nor even available to the city in the premises. It is pointed out that section 74 of the charter (St. 1931, p. 2889) provides a method for appropriations to satisfy debts of the city by the inclusion thereof in the annual appropriation ordinance, or, in the absence thereof, by an appropriation account set up by the auditor and controller. It is insisted that the method thus provided is exclusive and uncontrolled by the general law. Assuming that the term "debt" as employed in section 74 of the charter would include a judgment debt, and that the method therein provided for making an appropriation to satisfy the same is a municipal affair, it does not necessarily follow that such method is exclusive. It is true that by that portion of section 2 of the charter which is quoted by the petitioners the city has, in general terms, availed itself of the right and power to make and enforce all laws and regulations in respect to municipal affairs, subject only to the restrictions and limitations provided in the charter. But the concluding part of the section provides that "nothing herein shall be construed to prevent or restrict the City from exercising, or consenting to, and the City is hereby authorized to exercise any and all rights, powers and privileges heretofore or hereafter granted or prescribed by General Laws of the State."

By the enactment of the charter provisions just quoted, the city has been placed in position to avail itself of the rights and privileges extended by general laws. The act of 1901 is such a law, and the attitude of the respondents in this proceeding must be held to constitute an election on the part of the city to be governed thereby in the matter of the payment of said judgments. It is unquestionably the right of the city so to do. Under these circumstances, the most that the petitioners may lawfully demand is that the city proceed to levy a tax for the purpose of satisfying said judgments as provided in the statute. All of the steps preliminary to the levy of the tax for that purpose have been taken. The last step to that end was the audit and certification, on July 19, 1932, by the auditor and controller to the city treasurer of the amounts of said judgments. The common council adopted the tax ordinance on or before the last Tuesday in August, 1932, as provided in section 75 of the charter, but failed to include therein a levy for the payment of said judgments or an aliquot part thereof. Assuming that the common council should have done so, the petition does not disclose that any request was made by the petitioners that such be done, and for the obvious reason that the petitioners were then demanding that the full amount of the judgments be paid by warrants on existing funds in the city treasury.

[4] When the alternative writ herein was made returnable, to wit, December 6, 1932, it was too late to afford the petitioners any relief for the tax year 1932-1933 under their prayer for general relief, and the time for the levy of the tax for the year 1933-1934 has not arrived. The respondents insist that it may not be assumed that they will not perform their duty in the premises in fixing a tax levy in accordance with the act of 1901 and on or before the last Tuesday in August, 1933. This attitude of the respondents renders the issuance of the peremptory writ at this time inappropriate and unnecessary.

The peremptory writ is therefore denied without prejudice.

CURTIS, Justice.

This appeal is from a decree of distribution in the estate of Thomas L. Lewis, deceased, by the two sisters of said deceased. The controversy is between the heirs, or blood relatives of said deceased, and the heirs at law of the wife of said deceased, whose death occurred some eighteen years prior to the death of the deceased, Thomas L. Lewis. The point involved is whether certain property left by the deceased was his separate property, or the community property of himself and his predeceased wife, Melvina Maxfield Lewis. The property involved is an eighty-acre tract of land and $6,233.31 in money. Other property, both real and personal, was owned by said deceased at the time of his death, but it was of only slight value, and by decree it was distributed in the same manner as the court distributed the sum of $3,103.31, hereinafter mentioned. If the court made a legal distribution of said sum of $3,103.31, then the decree, in so far as it relates to this miscellaneous property, should not be disturbed.

[1] The court found that 32 per cent. of said eighty-acre tract of land was separate property, and that 68 per cent. thereof was common property of Thomas L. Lewis and his deceased wife. This property was conveyed to Lewis by Robert Maxfield by deed dated March 27, 1893, after his marriage and during the lifetime of his wife, who died May 7, 1910. The evidence shows that Lewis purchased for $2,500 said land, and that he contributed $800 of his separate property toward the purchase price thereof, and borrowed the balance from a man named Jackson. The sum of $800 is 32 per cent. of $2,500. Evidently the trial court concluded that this loan was paid off by Lewis from community funds. Appellants make no direct contention that it was not, except that they do contend that Lewis had between $1,200 and $1,500 in money at the time of his marriage, and this sum may have gone into the purchase price of said land. There is some evidence that years after Lewis' marriage he made certain statements which might bear out appellants' contention that Lewis possessed in the neighborhood of $1,250 in money at the time of his marriage. On the other hand, there is evidence in the record to the effect that Lewis was practically without any money or property at the time of his marriage. A brother-in-law of the deceased so testified, and he is corroborated by Annie Maxfield, who testified that, when Lewis returned from his honeymoon, he had but $40. As the evidence as to Lewis' possession of any substantial sum of money or property at the time of his marriage is conflicting, it must be construed in favor of sustaining the decree. The trial court evidently was of the opinion that Lewis was without funds at the date of his marriage, and the evidence amply supports such a conclusion.

[2] Appellants further contend that the finding of the court regarding the community character of said eighty-acre tract was erroneous, as the trial court in reaching such conclusion disregarded the effect of a deed of said eighty-acre tract made to Lewis by his mother at or about the time Lewis acquired said property from Robert Maxfield. The theory of appellants appears to be that Lewis only acquired a one-half interest in said eighty acres by his deed from Maxfield and that the other one-half interest in said real property came to him by deed of gift from his mother. If this theory could be sustained, then the separate interest of Lewis in said land would be 66 per cent. thereof instead of 32 per cent. as found by the trial court. But the contention of appellants that Lewis received one-half interest in said real property, or any interest therein, through the deed from his mother, cannot be sustained. The evidence shows that this tract of land was formerly owned by Thomas Morris, Lewis' grandfather. On the death of Morris, Lewis was the administrator of his estate. He returned the whole of this eighty-acre tract of land in the inventory as property of the estate, appraised at $3,000. As administrator of the estate, he sold it to Robert Maxfield for $2,400, and subsequently purchased it from Maxfield for $2,500. In all the proceedings of the estate, and in the two deeds through which he acquired said property, it was described as the full eighty acres, and not as any lesser interest. It does appear that there was possibly a cloud upon the title to said real property caused by a confusion in a prior deed by which Thomas Morris acquired title thereto, and Lewis' mother, who was the daughter of Thomas Morris, acquired title to an adjoining eighty-acre tract. Evidently the deed from Lewis' mother to Lewis was given simply to clear up this cloud on the title to said land, and no interest in said land passed from her to Lewis by said deed. This disposes of appellants' contention that the court erroneously found that only 32 per cent. of said eighty-acre tract of land was the separate property of said deceased.

[3] We will now direct our attention to the sum of $6,233.31 distributed by the decree of distribution. The court found that $3,130 of this amount was "community property of said decedent and Melvina Maxfield Lewis," and that of the balance (or $3,103.-31) 32 per cent. was "the separate property of Thomas Lewis, and 68 per cent thereof was the common property of said Thomas Lewis and Melvina Maxfield Lewis." At the date of the death of Melvina Maxfield Lewis, Thomas L. Lewis had on deposit the sum of $1,385. This money the court found was at that date the community property of Lewis and his wife. The probate court computed interest on this sum from the date of the wife's death to the date of the death of Lewis, eighteen years, at 7 per cent. per annum, the principal and interest amounting at the death of Lewis to $3,130, which sum the court distributed as community property. We see no objection to this method of the probate court in ascertaining the accumulations to said original sum of $1,385. Especially is this true in view of the undisputed evidence in the case that Lewis during his lifetime, both before and after the death of his wife, was continuously engaged in loaning money, and usually at rates of interest from 8 per cent. to 10 per cent. Appellants call to our attention the state of Lewis' bank account after the death of his wife, which shows that frequent withdrawals therefrom were made by Lewis, and as a result thereof said account was reduced in September, 1911, to $80. But the fact that Lewis made these withdrawals is no proof that the money so withdrawn was spent or otherwise dissipated by Lewis. It is more than likely, judging from the business habits of Lewis, that the money withdrawn from the bank was loaned out by him at rates of interest even higher than 7 per cent. per annum. We find no justification for disturbing the finding of the court regarding said sum of $3,130.

As to the balance of the money on hand for distribution, that is, the sum of $3,103.-31, it will be noted that the probate court followed its finding regarding the eighty-acre tract of land, and found that 32 per cent. of this money was separate property and 68 per cent. was community property, and distributed it accordingly. The only theory upon which this finding of the court can be sustained is that Lewis, after the death of his wife, engaged in no gainful occupation, and that during that period of time, from 1910 to 1928, Lewis' sole income was from the property owned by him at his wife's death. There is evidence to sustain this theory of the case. It is not uncontradicted, but it is substantial and is sufficient to justify the implied finding of the trial court that there were no accumulations to Lewis' property during this period due to his own personal efforts. While some of the witnesses for the appellants testified that Lewis after his wife's death was seen to be performing manual labor, the preponderance of evidence was to the effect that, after Mrs. Lewis' death, Lewis to all intents and purposes led a retired life. He rented his farm to Japanese, and lived off of the income of his property. The evidence on this point may be summed up in the testimony of Charles F. Maxfield, his brother-in-law. This witness was a lifelong acquaintance of Lewis, and the two lived near each other during practically the lifetime of Lewis. Maxfield testified in answer to a question as to what work Lewis did after the death of Mrs. Lewis: "Just rented the vineyard out to Japanese—just chored around the house—done a little garden work about the trees and flowers—that is about all. He said he never would work."

This disposes of all questions raised by the appellants.

The decree is affirmed.

Action by Hjalmar A. Rapp against Edith Rapp. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

WASTE, Chief Justice.

On May 1, 1924, the plaintiff and defendant, who were then husband and wife, entered into a written agreement for the settlement of their property rights. Among other things, the written agreement provides "that said second party [Hjalmar Rapp, plaintiff herein] does hereby accept and receive from first party [Edith W. Rapp, defendant herein] in full settlement of his right, title, interest, claim or demand in and to said property, community or separate, and whether the same consists of real property, money or other securities, the sum of Seven thousand four hundred ($7,400) dollars, payable as follows: One thousand ($1,000) dollars upon the execution of this agreement, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, and the sum of Six thousand four hundred ($6,400) dollars upon the sale of the premises situate in the City and County of San Francisco and known and designated as No. 1650 Jones Street, but, and provided, that on the sale of said property, said second party agrees to accept the sum of Six thousand four hundred ($6,400), but should the sum of $14,800 cash be not obtained from said sale then the second party agrees to accept on account one-half of the cash received, after first deducting the aforesaid sum of One thousand ($1,000) dollars to be paid to first party, and to accept jointly with first party a mortgage on said property for any balance that may be due second party; said mortgage when executed and delivered by the purchaser to be deposited with the Wells Fargo & Union Trust Company of San Francisco, the costs of said escrow to be borne equally, and said escrow to provide that thereafter all payments made on account of said mortgage, principal and interest, to be equally divided between the parties hereto until second party shall have been paid said balance in full with interest on said balance and to be paid to them by said Trust Company."

The present controversy concerns itself with the rights of the plaintiff under the quoted provision. The court below found and concluded that the apartment property, though standing in defendant's name alone, was community property; that at the time of the execution of the property settlement agreement it was mutually understood that it would be sold without unreasonable delay; that more than a reasonable time has elapsed since the execution of the agreement without any sale having been made; that one year following the execution of the agreement was and is a reasonable time within which the defendant could and should have sold the apartment property; that plaintiff is entitled to judgment against defendant in the sum of $6,400, with interest; that he is entitled to a lien on the property to secure the same; and that, if the judgment remain unpaid three months from entry, the property is to be sold by a designated referee subject to confirmation by the court. Judgment was accordingly entered, and this appeal followed.

[1] Defendant contends that the written agreement does not contemplate a sale of the apartment property at any particular time, and contains no provision, express or implied, requiring her to sell. We are of the opinion that the court below has properly construed the agreement. It was intended by the parties to effect a settlement and division of their property rights. The plaintiff accepted as his share the sum of $7,400, of which $1,000 was paid upon execution of the agreement, the balance to be paid upon the sale of the apartment property. Such an agreement necessarily implies a covenant on the defendant's part to sell the property within a reasonable time. Especially is this true under Civil Code, §§ 1655 and 1657. Section 1655 provides that stipulations which are necessary to make a contract reasonable are implied in respect to matters concerning which the contract manifests no contrary intention. Section 1657 provides that, if no time is specified for the performance of an act required to be performed, a reasonable time is allowed. To adopt defendant's construction of the agreement would be to place it within her power to indefinitely delay the sale of the premises, thereby defeating plaintiff's rights under the agreement.

We find nothing in Foley v. Euless, 214 Cal. 506, 6 P.(2d) 956, contrary to our conclusion herein. Plaintiff testified that at the time the agreement was executed nothing was said as to the time within which the property would be sold, but that on divers subsequent occasions defendant stated she would sell it "as fast as she can." It was within the province of the trial court to accept this testimony as against defendant's contradictory evidence.

[2] At the time of the commencement of this action, the defendant had permitted approximately six years to elapse without having made the sale contemplated by the agreement. This was an unreasonable delay and warranted the judgment entered by the court below. In reply to the defendant's contention that she had in good faith attempted to dispose of the property during this six-year period, suffice it to say that examination of the record satisfies us that, had a determined effort been made, the property in all probability could have been sold for a reasonable price. One of defendant's witnesses testified that in his opinion the property at the time of trial had a market value of approximately $25,000, and that for about a year following the execution of the agreement had a reasonable value of $33,500. The evidence tends to indicate that defendant had several times listed the property with real estate agents at a figure considerably higher than its reasonable market price. Of course, this tended to preclude the consummation of a sale.

We have examined the entire record, and find no merit in the contention that the evidence and findings fail to support the judgment. Nor do we think there was a failure to find on material issues. The trial court very properly concluded that the issue of fraud had been abandoned and that the cause therefore resolved itself into a proposition of law having to do with the reasonableness of defendant's conduct in failing to sell the property over a period of years.

Defendant next urges that plaintiff's theory of the case fluctuated throughout the trial. Defendant was not prejudiced thereby. A reading of the complaint and the written agreement upon which it is based immediately suggests the material issue to be as found by the court below. The relief granted is well within the pleadings and warranted by the evidence.

[3] In view of the trial court's finding that one year constituted a reasonable time within which to sell the property, defendant contends that the statute of limitations commenced to run at the expiration of such period, and that plaintiff's cause of action is therefore barred. With this we cannot agree. Repeatedly during the six-year period which elapsed between the execution of the contract and the commencement of this action the defendant verbally stated to the plaintiff that she would sell the property "as soon as she could." There is evidence to the effect that in 1927 defendant stated in response to plaintiff's query that "she would do her best to sell the house," but that "she could not sell it." Plaintiff testified that he "would always write, and all the answer I would get was that it could not be sold." There was also introduced in evidence a letter bearing date December 17, 1928, addressed by defendant to plaintiff, in which she states: "Have been to every real estate office in town they won't even list a twenty year old house." The present action was commenced on September 5, 1930, within two years after defendant's written statement that she was exerting every effort, though unsuccessfully, to sell the property. In view of the foregoing evidence, we are of the opinion that defendant is estopped to set up the bar of the statute. Phillips v. Phillips, 163 Cal. 530, 535, 127 P. 346; Perry v. Magneson, 207 Cal. 617, 621-622, 279 P. 650; Roper v. Smith, 45 Cal. App. 302, 305, 187 P. 454; Quanchi v. Ben Lomond Wine Co., 17 Cal. App. 565, 567, 120 P. 427. Defendant's repeated assertions, both oral and written, that she was endeavoring to sell the property, induced the plaintiff to forbear suing until 1930. Under the circumstances, plaintiff is not to be penalized. To hold otherwise would permit the defendant to take advantage of an omission induced and caused by her own conduct.

In conclusion, we find no error in the trial court's order overruling the demurrer to the complaint.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Frank M. Ogden, Judge.

Action by the Alameda County Title Insurance Company against Joseph Panella, R. Perrott, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and the last-named defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Molkenbuhr & Molkenbuhr, of San Francisco, and R. O. Bordner, of Oakland, for appellant.

McKee, Tasheira & Wahrhaftig, of Oakland, and Henry H. Irwin, for respondent.

SEAWELL, Justice.

This action was brought to quiet title to three parcels of real property situate in the city of Piedmont, county of Alameda, this state. In addition to denying plaintiff's title, possession, and right to possession, defendant R. Perrott set up an affirmative defense as to parcels 1 and 2. The court below sustained plaintiff's demurrer to said affirmative defense, and the cause went to trial on plaintiff's allegations of title and possession and defendant's general denial thereof, resulting in judgment for plaintiff as to all three parcels. On this appeal defendant does not attack the judgment as to parcel 3, but his sole contention is that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to his affirmative defense as to parcels 1 and 2, and excluding evidence based thereon.

Appellant in said affirmative defense alleges that plaintiff title company claims title in fee as purchaser at a trustee's sale held un-

ALAMEDA COUNTY TITLE INS. CO. v. PANELLA et al. S. F. 14784.

Supreme Court of California.
July 18, 1933.

1. Pleading ⇨214(1).

On demurrer, allegations of answer must be deemed true.

2. Evidence ⇨444(6).

Lender's alleged oral agreement when borrower executed note and trust deed, to carry note until borrower sold land, held inadmissible under parol evidence rule (Code Civ. Proc. § 1856; Civ. Code, §§ 1625, 1640, 3399).

3. Evidence ⇨434(8).

Fraud in execution or inducement of written contract may be shown and revision sought where mistake or imperfection of writing is pleaded (Code Civ. Proc. § 1856; Civ. Code, §§ 1625, 1640, 3399).

4. Contracts ⇨245(2).

Negotiations or stipulations concerning subject-matter, preceding or accompanying written contract, are superseded thereby, in absence of fraud or mistake (Code Civ. Proc. § 1856; Civ. Code, §§ 1625, 1640, 3399).

5. Evidence ⇨433(9).

If, through mistake, note and trust deed failed to embody parties' agreement, maker should have pleaded mistake and sought ref-der a deed of trust executed by appellant to said title company as beneficiary. He further alleges that said trustee's sale and the declaration of default in pursuance to which it was held were wrongful and fraudulent and in violation of an alleged oral agreement had between him and plaintiff at the time of execution of said deed of trust, in consequence of which he prays that it be decreed that plaintiff holds parcels 1 and 2 in trust for him to abide said alleged oral agreement. If proof of said oral agreement is inadmissible under the parol evidence rule, the court below acted in accordance with law in sustaining plaintiff's demurrer to the affirmative defense.

[1] It sufficiently appears from the allegations of the answer, which must be taken as true in passing on the demurrer thereto, that in March, 1927, defendant asserted a claim against plaintiff title company based on a policy of title insurance issued to him in December, 1926, on parcels 1 and 2 involved in the action herein. He had purchased said property, which included a number of lots, from one Ruth E. Mathews. The policy of title insurance showed Parkside drive, upon which the lots fronted, to be a public street, when in fact the city of Piedmont had not accepted it as a public street and refused to improve it. In adjustment of this claim, defendant alleges plaintiff title company, in July, 1927, agreed to acquire and pay the purchase price for an additional five-foot strip to meet the width requirements of the city of Piedmont for public streets. It is alleged that plaintiff did in fact acquire said strip, but the answer is silent as to whether the city of Piedmont thereafter accepted Parkside drive as a public street.

Plaintiff company also "orally specifically agreed," following the allegations of the answer, to "take over and carry" the three existing incumbrances against the property, including a purchase money deed of trust executed by defendant to the seller, Ruth E. Mathews, and two deeds of trust, in the aggregate amount of $6,550, to which the property was subject when defendant acquired it. Plaintiff was "to take over and carry" said incumbrances until defendant was able to sell the property advantageously, at which time the proceeds of sale were to be apportioned to the incumbrances. It is not alleged whether plaintiff company made any payments to the holders of said incumbrances for the account of defendant between July, 1927, when the alleged oral agreement was made, and September 15, 1927. On that latter date, it is alleged, defendant and his wife executed a note and deed of trust for $4,350 in favor of plaintiff company, "in substitution" for the balance due upon two of the three deeds of trust to which the property was subject. It is to be inferred that plaintiff title company advanced funds with which said deeds of trust were paid and discharged, and took therefor the note of defendant and his wife, secured by deed of trust on said property. It does not appear from the answer whether the remaining deed of trust lien, which was a first lien originally for $1,750, had been paid before defendant's execution of the $4,350 note to plaintiff. As to said note for $4,350, defendant alleges that plaintiff "orally specifically agreed" at the time of execution thereof "to hold and carry" it until defendant should be able to sell the property advantageously, and that defendant and his wife relied on this agreement at the time they signed the note and deed of trust, and upon the faith of said oral agreement thereafter expended $3,300 in improvements on the property.

On June 20, 1930, it is alleged, plaintiff company, in violation of said oral agreement, wrongfully and fraudulently recorded notice of default, and thereafter purchased the property at trustee's sale for $3,000.

[2-4] The terms and conditions of the note and deed of trust for $4,350 do not appear upon the face of the answer either in hæc verba form or by description, but it is inferable from the answer as a whole that said note provided for certain payments which defendant has failed to make, and that plaintiff company became the purchaser at trustee's sale in full compliance with the provisions of the trust deed. To defeat the title of plaintiff, defendant relies solely on the alleged oral agreement of plaintiff, made prior to and at the time of execution of the note and deed of trust and admittedly resting entirely in parol, "to hold and carry" said note and deed of trust. Defendant construes the agreement, as he alleges it, to mean that plaintiff company should receive no payments due by the terms of the note until he sold the property, and should have no right to exercise the power of sale conferred by the deed of trust. Plaintiff company's demurrer to the answer averred that the allegations of the agreement "to take over and hold" the note and deed of trust for $4,350 were uncertain, unintelligible, and ambiguous. Aside from any question of uncertainty, the admission in evidence of the alleged oral agreement would be in direct violation of the parol evidence rule. Fraud in the execution or inducement of a written contract may be shown, and revision of a written contract may be sought where mistake or imperfection of the writing is put in issue by the pleadings. Section 1856, Code Civ. Proc.; sections 1625, 1640, 3399, Civ. Code. With these qualifications the execution of a contract in writing supersedes all the negotiations or stipulations concerning its matter which preceded or accompanied the execution of the instrument. Pacific States Sec. Co. v. Steiner, 192 Cal. 376, 220 P. 304; Thomson v. Langton, 45 Cal. App. 415, 187 P. 970; College Nat. Bank v. Morrison, 100

Cal. App. 403, 280 P. 218; Wright v. Shoenhair, 100 Cal. App. 163, 280 P. 174; Rottman v. Hevener, 54 Cal. App. 474, 202 P. 329; McArthur v. Johnson, 216 Cal. 580, 15 P.(2d) 151; Murphy v. Craig (C. C. A.) 28 F.(2d) 963.

[5] If through mistake the note and deed of trust for $4,350 as executed failed to embody the true agreement of the parties, defendant should have put the mistake in issue by the pleadings and sought reformation. Harding v. Robinson, 175 Cal. 534, 541, 166 P. 808; section 1856, Code Civ. Proc.; section 3399, Civ. Code. He has not adopted such a course. Nor does he charge plaintiff company with fraud. He makes no claim that he was induced not to read the instruments, or that he did not fully understand their import and perceive that they were at variance with the alleged oral agreement. He offers no suggestion as to why, if the oral agreement was made as alleged, it was not embodied in the note and deed of trust.

Defendant's main contention is that the answer states a good defense based on the doctrines of equitable estoppel and constructive trusts. He contends that, in reliance on the alleged oral agreement of plaintiff company, made at and prior to execution of the note for $4,350, "to hold and carry" said note, he forebore to prosecute his claim on the policy of title insurance, and instead signed said note and thereafter expended $3,300 in improvements on the property. Defendant relies on cases holding that a party sought to be charged on an oral contract required by the statute of frauds to be in writing may be estopped to raise the defense of the statute where the other party, in reliance upon the oral agreement, has changed his position or prejudiced himself to such an extent that if the oral agreement were not enforced he would suffer irremediable injury. The leading California case on this subject is Seymour v. Oelrichs, 156 Cal. 782, 106 P. 88, 134 Am. St. Rep. 154, where plaintiff gave up his position as a captain of detectives on the San Francisco police force in reliance on an oral promise of defendants to employ him for ten years at a stated salary, and served several years before he was discharged. The court held that defendants were estopped to plead the statute of frauds. Vogel v. Shaw, 42 Wyo. 333, 294 P. 687, 75 A. L. R. 639, with note; Glass v. Hulbert, 102 Mass. 24, 3 Am. Rep. 418.

The statute of frauds and the parol evidence rule are distinct, although both aim to secure purity of evidence. In the statute of frauds cases there is no written contract which it is sought to vary and contradict by parol evidence. It is one thing to permit proof of an oral agreement required by the statute of frauds to be in writing on the basis of estoppel and another to permit contradiction of a written contract to which the parties have reduced their agreement by proof of oral agreements made prior to and contemporaneously therewith. The oral negotiations are merged in the written contract, which is conclusive in the absence of a plea of actual fraud or mistake.

In Union Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Mowry, 96 U. S. 544, 549, 24 L. Ed. 674, a case frequently cited on this phase of the doctrine of estoppel, Mr. Justice Field declared: "But the doctrine has no place for application when the statement relates to rights depending upon contracts yet to be made, to which the person complaining is to be a party. He has it in his power in such cases to guard in advance against any consequences of a subsequent change of intention and conduct by the person with whom he is dealing. For compliance with arrangements respecting future transactions, parties must provide by stipulations in their agreements when reduced to writing. The doctrine carried to the extent for which the assured contends in this case would subvert the salutary rule, that the written contract must prevail over previous verbal arrangements, and open the door to all the evils which that rule was intended to prevent."

[6] Defendant relies strongly on statements in certain of the cases cited by him to the effect that an estoppel may be based on an intended abandonment of an existing right, which statements, he contends, are precisely applicable to the facts alleged, in that he abandoned his right to proceed against the company for breach of the title insurance policy issued to him. This pronouncement has been made where it was contended that the representations to constitute the basis of an estoppel must relate to existing facts rather than to a mere promise of future performance, and it has been held that an estoppel may arise as well where the representations relate to an intended abandonment of an existing right. These statements have reference to an intended abandonment of a right by the person sought to be estopped, and do not relate to a person in the position of defendant, who is the party relying on the estoppel. Banning v. Kreiter, 153 Cal. 33, 94 P. 246; Rottman v. Hevener, supra; Faxton v. Faxton, 28 Mich. 159; Vogel v. Shaw, supra.

[7] A case for application of this doctrine would be presented had plaintiff title company subsequent to execution of the note and deed of trust, by representations that it would waive payments due on the note pending sale of the property and forbear to exercise its right of sale for default, induced plaintiff to make valuable improvements and otherwise irrevocably alter his position. The promisor may be estopped to raise the defense that a written contract can be modified only by a contract in writing or an executed oral agreement, in like manner as he may be estopped to plead the statute of frauds upon an original contract required to be in writing. In this situation there is a subsequent oral agreement or representation. In the statute of frauds cases there is no written contract. But in the instant case an attempt is made to contradict a contract reduced to writing solely by alleged oral representations made prior to and contemporaneously with the written contract. The answer contains no allegations as to a subsequent waiver. There are absolutely no allegations as to what took place with reference to the note and deed of trust between their execution on September 15, 1927, and June 20, 1930, when the notice of default was recorded. It does not appear whether or not any payments were made. It is not alleged that with the consent of plaintiff company no payments were made.

[8] The doctrine of those cases which raise a constructive trust upon a conveyance by deed absolute in reliance on the oral promise of the grantee to hold for the benefit of the grantor or a third party cannot properly be extended to permit proof of a contemporaneous oral agreement that no payments should be made on a promissory note expressly providing for payments, or proof that an unconditional power of sale in the deed of trust securing said note should not be exercised pending sale of the property.

The rule as restated in Rottman v. Hevener, 54 Cal. App. 484, 202 P. 329, 331, is as applicable to the instant case as it was to that case. It may therefore be said in the instant case: "It is not claimed that by reason of fraud, accident, or mistake there was any failure to cause the written instrument to express the intention of either of the parties. There is no allegation * * * that defendant was induced by fraud or mistake to agree to the insertion of the clause making the note payable one day after date. * * * What he [defendant] did he did with his eyes open. And he is charged with knowledge that under the law of this state (Civil Code, § 1625) a written contract supersedes all preceding or accompanying oral negotiations or stipulations. In the absence of fraud or mistake, the time of payment as fixed by the written terms of the note cannot be varied by any contemporaneous oral agreement. The rule that a writing which purports to be the complete contract of the parties is deemed in law to be the full repository of the agreement or contract, that the whole contract is expressed by it, and that evidence of oral stipulations is not admissible to incorporate other elements in it or to alter or enlarge its terms, is applicable to negotiable as well as to nonnegotiable instruments"—citing cases.

[9] The demurrer was properly sustained. The fact that an order sustaining a demurrer is silent as to leave to amend does not constitute reversible error where the record fails to show that leave to amend was requested. Haddad v. McDowell, 213 Cal. 690, 3 P.(2d) 550; Consolidated Reservoir, etc., Co. v. Scarborough, 216 Cal. 698, 16 P.(2d) 268; Philbrook v. Randall, 195 Cal. 95, 231 P. 739.

The judgment is affirmed.

PER CURIAM.

The defendant and appellant herein, George Smith, and John Kazarin were jointly tried and convicted in the superior court of the county of Alameda of murder of the first degree, and sentenced to suffer the death penalty for having murdered Reinhold A. Frey. Both appealed to this court. Pending said appeal Kazarin committed suicide. Smith's appeal, after a lengthy review of the facts and the law applicable to his case by this court, resulted in the judgment of conviction being affirmed. People v. Smith, 215 Cal. 749, 12 P. (2d) 945. It appeared from the evidence by the testimony of a large number of eyewitnesses and other incontrovertible facts that the defendants, both making their headquarters in the city of San Francisco, had planned to apprehend the deceased, who was a frail man in stature and past fifty years of age, as he was returning to his place of business from a nearby bank in the city of Oakland carrying a satchel containing moneys, which he had deposited the evening before for safe-keeping, as was his custom, and to rob him and escape by means of an automobile which they were operating under a license plate which they had stolen from another automobile. As Smith assailed Frey, at about the hour of 9 o'clock in the forenoon, and was using force and violence in an attempt to wrench the satchel from Frey's possession, the latter by outcries attracted the attention of passersby. Smith, thwarted in his attempt, backed away from Frey, who was close to the building line, to the edge of the sidewalk, drew his pistol and wickedly fired the shot which proved fatal. He then escaped from the scene in a waiting automobile operated by his accomplice, Kazarin. Both were in due time apprehended and convicted, as herein set forth. The appeal taken by Smith resulted in an affirmance of the judgment, filed June 30, 1932. A petition for a rehearing upon due consideration was denied.

After said judgment had become final and at the time judgment was to be reimposed on said Smith, as provided by law, Ernest Spagnoli, attorney for said Smith, appeared before said superior court of the county of Alameda in presentation of a motion for an order striking the indictment from the files and for an order vacating, annulling, and setting aside the judgment of conviction. People v. Smith (Cal. Sup.) 18 P.(2d) 329, 330. The trial court denied the motion, which possessed not a semblance of merit, and an appeal was taken to this court from the trial court's order denying defendant relief by reason of his unwarranted proceeding. This court upon the matter presented said:

"We have examined the proceedings and say unhesitatingly that there is not a scintilla of merit in the showing made on the delayed motion to set aside the indictment or annul the judgment. We would be justified in dismissing the proceedings, but have concluded that in the circumstances of the case we should affirm the order." In the face of what we there said the attorney for appellant Smith again prepared and filed in the court in which Smith was convicted another proceeding of like character, which is equally as devoid of merit as was the first motion. In fact this is but another attempt, fashioned after the same theory as the first, to set aside the indictment and annul the judgment of conviction. Every objection which appellant attempts to make specifically upon this appeal could and should have been presented before or during the trial of appellant, and doubtless would have been presented if counsel believed that it possessed any real merit. Many of the objections here made were necessarily involved in the general propositions of law which are so well settled as to become axiomatic. Appellant has pursued a course of attacking by piecemeal the judgment which has foreclosed every issue included in his motion.

[1] We are forced to the conclusion by the history of the matter before us that appellant, in again coming to this court on an appeal which involves nothing of substance, has done so either from a lack of understanding of substantive criminal law and procedure, or else he is moved by a willful purpose to obstruct by unwarranted methods the enforcement of judicial decrees and orders. If the appellant may assign as grounds for separate appeals specific questions which he may have presented upon his appeal, and in some instances which he did actually raise, upon the denial of a motion to set aside the indictment and annul the judgment after said judgment has become final, under the guise that said denial is an order made after judgment affecting the substantial rights of the parties (section 1237, subd. 3, Pen. Code), there would scarcely be a procedural finality to criminal cases. In certain cases execution of the judgment would practically be blocked by the employment of dilatory tactics. Of course, it was not intended that section 1237, Penal Code, should be turned to any such purpose. The substantial rights of the defendant therein referred to do not include justiciable questions which have been foreclosed by an appeal taken in the law's forms. Substantial rights are not denied where the person charged had a full and fair opportunity to invoke every privilege or right which the law accords to the accused, and where no deceit or fraud has been practiced upon him. Certainly no substantial right was violated by the trial court's disposal of appellant's motion.

[2] Appellant challenges by his unusual proceeding the constitutionality of section 190, Penal Code, on the ground that it contravenes article 1, § 7, California state Constitution, as amended in 1928, permitting the accused in criminal cases to waive a trial by jury. Appellant contends that section 190, Penal Code, is unconstitutional, and, if not in conflict with it, it has been repealed by said constitutional amendment of 1928. This argument is based upon the phrasing of said section 190, which omits to provide that the court is empowered to impose the penalty in first degree murder in case a jury is waived. The statute provides for the fixing of punishment at the discretion of the jury trying the case, but makes no mention of the power of the trial court sitting without a jury to fix punishment. The section does empower the court to fix the penalty in case the accused pleads guilty to a charge of murder of the first degree. Said section has not been amended since the adoption of said constitutional amendment of 1928, and as a matter of course trial of felony cases by the court upon a waiver of a jury trial was not permitted by the Constitution prior to said amendment. The proposition whether the power given to courts by the Constitution to try criminal cases without the aid of a jury upon a waiver of a jury trial by the accused, and also to determine guilt in all such cases, does also, by necessary implication, confer upon said trial courts the power to determine and impose the penalty of the law—as favorably as the proposition may appeal to us—is not necessarily involved herein, inasmuch as the defendant in this case did not offer to waive a jury trial, or in any way indicate that he desired to waive a trial by jury and be tried by the court. His conviction in no wise involves the waiver of a jury trial, or the power of the court to pronounce sentence in waiver cases. He was convicted by a jury in the usual way, and there is no foundation for the claim that the procedure did not literally conform with both the statute and the Constitution, or that it violated either. Even if there was no provision expressly authorizing a court to fix the penalty in cases tried by the court upon waiver of trial by jury, appellant would still come within the ample provisions of section 190, as all murder cases have come since it was first adopted many years ago.

[3, 4] It is finally claimed that section 190 is void as not having a uniform operation, and as violative of the granting of privileges and immunities clauses, and as being in other respects in conflict with constitutional provisions enacted for the protection of life and liberty which are usually cited in criminal cases. One specific ground urged is that it exempts youths under eighteen years of age from suffering the extreme penalty of the law for murder committed when under the age of eighteen years, while other sections of the criminal code provide, without regard to the age of the offender, for the infliction of the death penalty for the commission of certain crimes, such as the derailment or wrecking of trains; setting fire to railroad bridges; perjury or subornation of perjury in procuring the conviction and execution of an innocent person; assault by a person undergoing a life sentence in a state prison with a deadly weapon. We have not been given the benefit of any reasons which would tend to support the claim that said cited sections have any relevancy or bearing upon the validity of section 190. That the Legislature may classify crimes, and prescribe severer punishment for the commission of one class than for another as a deterrent against the commission of more heinous crimes in the exercise of its police power and in the protection of life and property, is no longer open to question. The brief of appellant presents no argument germane to the violation of any constitutional provisions, state or national. Appellant cites no code section which supports his appeal on any ground.

This appeal is entirely frivolous. While this court has always yielded ready willingness to the examination of records upon which criminal convictions are obtained, especially those carrying the death penalty, it is not willing to extend its sanction to the unauthorized and utterly unwarranted proceedings which characterize this and the former appeal from the order of dismissal of a similar motion. People v. Smith (Cal. Sup.) 18 P. (2d) 329. It must have occurred to appellant's attorney that he has long since exhausted all legal remedies which this court is empowered to grant. A repetition of the practice herein attempted will call for the exercise of the disciplinary powers of this court.

The appeal or proceeding, being frivolous and without merit, is dismissed with directions to the trial court to proceed with the execution of its judgment as provided by law.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by the Anglo-California Trust Company against C. H. Holbrook, Jr., and wife. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Erwin C. Easton and Isla V. Davies, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Stanley Pedder, of San Francisco, for respondents.

IRA F. THOMPSON, Justice.

Plaintiff appeals from a judgment decreeing that it has no interest in a certain certificate of membership in the San Francisco Golf and Country Club formerly belonging to defendant C. H. Holbrook, and from a decree quieting the title of defendant Nellie V. Holbrook thereto. Defendant C. H. Holbrook disclaimed any interest in the certificate, pleading that the certificate was the property of his wife, defendant Nellie V. Holbrook. The facts out of which the controversy arose are as follows:

Prior to June of 1925 Mr. Holbrook was admittedly the owner of the membership in question and in possession of the certificate evidencing the same. Prior to this date Mrs. Holbrook, from her personal estate, had loaned various sums to her husband aggregating well over $5,000. On June 2, 1925, as evidence of this indebtedness, Mr. Holbrook executed and delivered to his wife a demand note in the sum of $5,410, and pledged his membership in the club as collateral security therefor. The certificate of membership was indorsed and delivered by Mr. Holbrook to Mrs. Holbrook at the time of the execution of the above note, and the evidence shows that Mrs. Holbrook has been in sole and exclusive possession of the same ever since. Appellant concedes that after June 2, 1925, the certificate was validly pledged to secure the debt owing to Mrs. Holbrook. The collateral security agreement executed by Mr. Holbrook expressly empowered the pledgee, in case of default by the pledgor, to sell the pledged property at public or private sale without notice to the pledgor, and waived presentment, protest, and notice of protest. As already stated, the note in favor of Mrs. Holbrook was a demand note, and for that reason the statute of limitations started to run from the date the note was executed. It therefore follows that the statute ran against the note in June of 1929. No payments of principal or interest were ever made on the note, nor was any written renewal or extension thereof ever executed.

In August of 1930 Mrs. Holbrook learned that appellant was intending to execute on the membership for a judgment debt of her husband. She talked the matter over with her husband, and several days before August 18th notified him that she intended to sell the membership under the pledge agreement. The evidence shows that Mr. Holbrook not only had actual notice of the proposed sale, and consented thereto, but also advised Mrs. Holbrook that to sell under the pledge was the only way to protect her rights. On August 18, 1930, a private sale of the pledged property was held in Mr. Holbrook's office. Mr. Holbrook was present and consented to the sale. Several other persons were also present. Mrs. Holbrook produced the certificate, read it to those present, and asked for bids. None being made, she bid the property in for $1,000, and applied the same on the indebtedness due her. The next day she notified an employee in the office of the club of the change in ownership of the certificate. The trial court held that this was a valid sale, and that thereafter the entire interest in the membership vested in Mrs. Holbrook.

Appellant's claim to an interest in the certificate is based on the following circumstances: On July 29, 1930, appellant secured a judgment by default against Mr. Holbrook in the sum of $2,204.04. Early in August appellant attempted to levy on the certificate, but this attempt was abandoned; appellant now conceding that this first levy was ineffectual for all purposes. On August 27, 1930, however, appellant did levy on the certificate, and on September 3, 1930, at a sheriff's sale, appellant purchased all of the right, title, and interest of Mr. Holbrook in and to the certificate.

It is at once apparent that if the pledgee's sale of August 18th was valid, appellant secured nothing by its subsequent levy and sale under the writ of execution. This is so for the obvious reason that on September 3, 1930, appellant merely purchased the interest of Mr. Holbrook in the membership, and if that interest was terminated on August 18, 1930, the levy of August 27th and the sale of September 3d could confer no rights on appellant. Appellant contends that the sale of August 18th was invalid, for the reason that on that date the note for which the pledge was given as security was barred by the statute of limitations, and for that reason the lien of the pledge was extinguished. Section 2911 of the Civil Code provides: "A lien is extinguished by the lapse of the time within which, under the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, an action can be brought upon the principal obligation." Appellant contends that under this section after the running of the statute of limitations on the debt all affirmative rights of the pledgee, including the right to sell the pledged article, are lost. Appellant, however, concedes that even after the running of the statute the pledgee retains the negative right of retention of the pledged article, and that neither the pledgor, nor those claiming through him with notice of the pledge, can secure the return of the pledged article without paying the debt. Appellant, therefore, concedes that Mrs. Holbrook has the right to remain in possession of the certificate as against appellant until her debt is paid, but contends that it, as successor in interest to Mr. Holbrook, can redeem the certificate upon paying the debt owing to Mrs. Holbrook. No offer to pay this debt has ever been made by appellant.

[1-4] Although it is true that in this state, contrary to the common law, the rule is that the lien of a pledge is extinguished "by the lapse of the time within which * * * an action can be brought upon the principal obligation" (Civ. Code, § 2911), and that thereafter all affirmative rights of the pledgee are lost as against the pledgor, or those who have a lien on the pledged property (Puckhaber v. Henry, 152 Cal. 419, 93 P. 114, 125 Am. St. Rep. 75, 14 Ann. Cas. 844; 6 Cal. Jur. 601), it is equally true that this is a right of the pledgor alone and may be waived by him. In the present case, before appellant had any claim to the property at all, the pledgor consented to and in fact advised a sale of the pledged property to satisfy in part the debt admittedly owing to the pledgee. On August 18, 1930, the pledgor, or any other person with a lien on the property, could undoubtedly have taken advantage of the provisions of section 2911 of the Civil Code and thus prevented a valid sale. But, in the present case, on August 18, 1930, the only persons with any claim to the property were the pledgor and pledgee. On that date Mr. Holbrook could have given his wife the property and, in the absence of fraud, which admittedly was not present in this case, no one could complain. Mr. Holbrook did not give the property to his wife, but he consented to her selling the property under the pledge in partial satisfaction of the debt. Such consent and approval must be held to have validated the sale and to have ratified any irregularities therein as to Mr. Holbrook and any one claiming through him subsequent to and with notice of the sale. The principle that the consent of the pledgor validates what otherwise would be an improper sale is well settled. Hill v. Finigan, 62 Cal. 426; Bell v. Bank of California, 153 Cal. 234, 94 P. 889. See, also, Cushing v. Building Association, 165 Cal. 731, 134 P. 324, where the rule was indirectly recognized. After the pledgor had consented to such a sale, and after the sale had been held, thus vesting in Mrs. Holbrook the title to the property as against her husband, the appellant, claiming through a subsequent levy and sale under an execution against Mr. Holbrook, and with notice of the claims of Mrs. Holbrook, could get no more right to the property than Mr. Holbrook had. As was said in Richman v. Bank of Perris, 102 Cal. App. 71, 88, 282 P. 801, 809: "The lien of an execution and attachment proceedings attaches to the real and not to the apparent interest of a judgment debtor in and to his property, and the purchaser at an execution sale takes subject to such existing liens and equities as the property was subject to in the hands of the debtor, unless he can show he purchased the same without notice, either actual or constructive of the existence of such liens or equities. Whitney v. Sherman, 178 Cal. 435, 173 P. 931; Riley v. Martinelli, 97 Cal. 575, 33 Am. St. Rep. 209, 21 L. R. A. 33, 32 P. 579; De Celis v. Porter, 59 Cal. 464; Weston v. Bear River, etc., Co., 6 Cal. 425."

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

JOHNSON et ux. v. EHRGOTT et al.

S. F. 14821.

Supreme Court of California.

July 14, 1933.

1. Appeal and error ⇨757(2).

Appellants' opening brief sufficiently complied with rule requiring that brief present each point separately under appropriate heading, and set forth any part of pleading involved with proper reference to transcript (Rules of the Supreme and District Courts of Appeal, rule 8).

Appellants' opening brief contained a brief narrative of the contents of the complaint, and, on page 2 thereof, definite reference, by page and line, to the court's transcript, wherein could be found the material allegations of the complaint having to do with the circumstances surrounding the discovery of the alleged fraud for which appellants sought to have canceled a written agreement for the exchange of real properties after the expiration of the three-year period prescribed in Code Civ. Proc. § 338.

2. Appeal and error ⇨801(1).

Hearing on merits is favored over dismissal of appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by Albert N. Johnson and wife against Mabel De Witt Ehrgott and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. On motion to dismiss appeal.

Motion denied.

T. L. Christianson, of Oakland, for appellants.

Robert B. Gaylord, of San Francisco, for respondents.

WASTE, Chief Justice.

Appellants brought this action to have canceled a certain written agreement for the exchange of real properties and to recover damages for alleged misrepresentations asserted to have induced the execution of such exchange agreement. Respondents' demurrer to the tenth amended complaint was sustained without leave to amend. This appeal followed.

[1, 2] Respondents move to dismiss the appeal on the ground that appellants' opening brief does not comply with rule VIII of the rules governing appellate procedure in that it fails to present each point separately under an appropriate heading, and fails to set forth any part of the pleading involved with proper reference to the transcript.

While the brief assailed is not a model document, it sufficiently satisfies the provisions of the cited rule to preclude a dismissal. It contains a brief narrative of the contents of the complaint, and on page 2 thereof definite reference, by page and line, is made to the clerk's transcript wherein may be found the material allegations of the complaint having to do with the circumstances surrounding the discovery of the alleged fraud after the expiration of the three-year period prescribed in section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Under the circumstances, we are not inclined to dismiss the appeal, thus affording to both sides a hearing on the merits, which is always to be favored.

Motion denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; Percy S. King, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Electa B. Hartson, deceased. From an order of the superior court denying protests to the eighteenth account of trustee and from an order approving trustee's account, Margaret Halley and Clarence Ryan, executor of the estate of Catherine Tydd, deceased, appeal.

SEAWELL, Justice.

This is an appeal from an order denying appellants' protests to the eighteenth account of the trustee under the will of Electa B. Hartson, and from an order approving the account of said trustee. The facts giving rise to the controversy are as follows:

In the year 1902 Electa B. Hartson died testate in the city of Napa, Cal. Her will was duly admitted to probate and the final decree of distribution made and entered in 1903. By the decree of distribution it was directed, in conformance with the provisions of the will, that certain property should be held in trust, and that the income therefrom should be paid monthly to certain named beneficiaries for and during the lifetime of her three children or the survivor of them. So far as pertinent here, the decree of distribution provided as follows:

"* * * The income from the balance of said trust property said trustees shall pay:

"One-third (1-3) thereof to her daughter, Dasie A. Hartson: one-third (1-3) thereof to her son, Channing K. Hartson; and the remaining one-third (1-3) to her son, Burnell C. Hartson, and his daughter, Ethel Hartson, as follows: One quarter (1-4) of said one-third (1-3) to said Ethel Hartson, and the remainder to Burnell C. Hartson.

"That said trustees shall pay the income of said property as above set out, for and during the term of the natural lives of her said children, and upon the death of any one of her said children, then the amount which should have been paid to said deceased child as his or her share therein, shall be paid by the said trustees to the legal heirs of her said deceased child, if there should be any living at such time, and if not, then the share of such deceased child shall be divided between the remaining living children."

The trustees entered into possession of the properties, and for many years the monthly income was paid to the four persons above named in accordance with the above-quoted provisions of the decree. On April 30, 1928, Burnell C. Hartson, one of the children of Electa Hartson, died, leaving surviving him as his only legal heirs Elizabeth Hartson, his wife, and Ethel Hartson Turner, his daughter, being the same Ethel Hartson named and provided for in the will of Electa Hartson. After the death of Burnell, the trustees paid his share of the monthly income to his wife and daughter in equal shares. On April 19, 1930, Elizabeth Hartson, wife of Burnell, died, leaving as her legal heirs, and devisees of the residue of her estate, her two sisters, appellant Margaret Halley and Catherine Tydd. The latter died in November, 1930, and Clarence Ryan, the other appellant, was duly appointed executor of her will. The sole point involved on this appeal is, Who is entitled to the monthly income formerly paid to Elizabeth—Ethel Hartson Turner, the sole surviving heir of Burnell, or the legal heirs of Elizabeth? The trustee filed its eighteenth report and account for the period June, 1929, to March, 1931, in which it was disclosed that after the death of Elizabeth the trustee had paid the monthly income formerly paid to Elizabeth to Ethel Hartson Turner. The two sisters of Elizabeth filed a protest on the ground that they, as the legal heirs of Elizabeth and as the residuary legatees under her will, were entitled to the income formerly paid to her. The trial court determined that upon the death of Elizabeth her share of the income was properly paid to Ethel Hartson Turner. From the order denying their protests and from the order approving the eighteenth account of the trustee, the protestants appeal.

[1] Before discussing the merits of this appeal, attention is called to the fact that all of the briefs filed in this case fail to comply with the rules of this court as to form. Section 2 of rule VIII of the Rules of the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal as amended in July, 1932, requires that "a statement of the question involved * * * shall be set forth on the first page of the appellant's opening brief, and without any other matter appearing thereon. * * * If the respondent does not agree with the appellant's statement, he may frame his own and incorporate it, in like form and content, as the first page of his brief." Neither counsel has favored us with such a statement. The latter part of the same section of the rule requires that "the brief or petition must present each point separately under an appropriate heading, showing the nature of the question to be presented or the point to be made." Appellants' briefs contain the following headings: "Statement of the Case," "Law of the Case," "Argument," "A," "B," "C," "D," and "E." Respondent's brief contains the following headings: "Statement of the Case," "Respondent's Points and Authorities," "I," "II," "III," "IV," "V," and "VI." Those headings are not a sufficient compliance with the rule. Under section 4 of the same rule this court could dismiss the appeal, but in the interests of justice, and for the reason that the issues involved are readily ascertainable, we will consider the appeal on its merits.

[2, 3] As stated above, the sole question presented is whether upon the death of Elizabeth Hartson, wife of Burnell Hartson, the monthly income formerly paid to Elizabeth should be paid to Elizabeth's heirs or to Ethel Hartson Turner, the sole surviving heir of Burnell. The proper solution of this question turns upon the proper interpretation of the last paragraph of the quoted portion of the decree of distribution. In interpreting this provision there are certain well-settled rules of construction which must be applied. The paramount rule of construction is, of course, that effect must be given, if possible, to the intent of the testatrix, if that intent can be ascertained. Probate Code, § 101. It is also well settled that, where the provisions of a will are capable of two interpretations, under one of which those of the blood of the testator will take, while under the other the property will go to strangers, the interpretation by which the property goes to those of the blood of the testator is preferred. Estate of Wilson, 65 Cal. App. 680, 689, 225 P. 283. Another rule of construction should also be referred to. Section 122 of the Probate Code provides: "Words in a will referring to death or survivorship, simply, relate to the time of the testator's death, unless possession is actually postponed, when they must be referred to the time of possession."

[4, 5] Keeping these rules of construction in mind, we have no hesitancy in holding that the trial court correctly held that upon the death of Elizabeth the monthly income formerly paid to her should be paid to Ethel Hartson Turner, the sole surviving heir of Burnell, son of the testatrix. The decree of distribution provided that upon the death of any child of the testatrix, including Burnell, the income formerly paid to that child "shall be paid by the said trustees to the legal heirs of her said deceased child, if there should be any living at such time, and if not, then the share of such deceased child shall be divided between the remaining living children." Upon the death of Burnell, his legal heirs being his wife, Elizabeth, and his daughter,

Ethel, his share of the income was properly paid to those two under the above provision. There can be no doubt that this bequest of monthly income to the legal heirs of a deceased child was a bequest of income to a class; i. e., the legal heirs of the deceased child. 26 Cal. Jur. p. 946, § 253. Upon the death of Elizabeth, Ethel has now become the sole surviving member of that class. Under the terms of the will as incorporated into the decree of distribution, the income is to be payable monthly. Since the death of Elizabeth, Ethel is now the only member of the class in existence at the time the income is to be distributed. The heirs of a deceased child are to be paid the income monthly; that is, they are to come into possession of the income monthly, and therefore, under section 122 of the Probate Code, supra, we must interpret the will to mean that the income is to be paid to the heirs of a deceased child living at the time of the distribution of the income. This conclusion is strengthened by the fact that under this interpretation the income is paid to those who are of the blood of the testatrix, and will not go to strangers. We must presume that this was the intent of the testatrix. This conclusion is strengthened also by the fact that upon the death of the last surviving child of the testatrix the trust is to terminate and the corpus thereof is to be distributed to the "surviving heirs of each of her children," indicating a clear intent to keep the property in the hands of the heirs of the children. It is therefore our opinion that the interest devised to the heirs of Burnell was contingent, not only upon their surviving at the time of the death of Burnell, but was also made contingent upon their being alive at the time the income was directed to be distributed to them; i. e., monthly. Upon the death of any of such heirs, the remaining surviving heirs are entitled to the income. To hold that the interest of the heirs of Burnell vested upon his death, as contended for by appellants, would be to do violence to the obvious intent of the testatrix and to violate the well-settled rules of construction above enumerated. This we cannot do.

For the foregoing reasons, the orders appealed from are affirmed.

I concur in the decision and the opinion if my understanding of the paragraph relating to the nonobservance of section 2 of rule VIII governing appellate procedure is correct, which is: That it is a warning to the profession generally that there must be a compliance with the rules, and that for failure in that respect the appeal may be dismissed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Axel Stratton, Jr., pleaded guilty of robbery and burglary, and from an order denying his motion to set aside a judgment pronouncing sentence, he appeals.

Reversed in part, cause remanded with directions, and affirmed in part.

Axel Stratton, Jr., in pro. per.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

Mr. Justice PLUMMER delivered the opinion of the court.

On October 2, 1931, the district attorney of Stanislaus county filed an information in the superior court of that county against the defendant, in four counts. Count 1 charged the defendant with the crime of robbery committed in the county of Stanislaus on or about the 25th day of August, 1931. Counts 2 and 3 charged the defendant with the crime of burglary committed at different times in the county of Stanislaus. Count 4 charged the defendant with having been convicted of a felony in the state of Nevada and having served a term therefor in the state penitentiary of the state of Nevada. Count 1 simply charges the crime of robbery. Counts 2 and 3 simply charge the offense of burglary. There is nothing in any of the counts contained in the information from which it can be determined whether the offenses charged are of the first or second degrees.

Upon arraignment the defendant entered a plea of guilty to each of the charges contained in the information. The record shows that after the defendant had entered his plea of guilty to each of the charges contained in the information, the following occurred:

"The Court: I will have now to determine the degree of the crime.

"Mr. Fowler, do you make any point on that?

"Mr. Lehane: As far as the defendant is concerned it will be first degree."

This proceeding was had in relation to count one charging the defendant with the crime of robbery. No testimony was taken to determine the degree, and no evidence was introduced showing whether the offense charged was accomplished through torture, or at a time when the defendant was armed with a deadly or dangerous weapon.

Section 211a of the Penal Code, defining the offense of robbery, reads as follows: "All robbery which is perpetrated by torture or by a person being armed with a dangerous or deadly weapon is robbery in the first degree. All other kinds of robbery are of the second degree."

The court, just preceding the pronouncing of sentence upon the defendant, and as a part thereof, made the following findings: "That the degree of robbery as set forth in the first count of the information, is robbery in the first degree. That the degree of burglary, as set forth in the second count of the information, is burglary in the second degree. That the degree of burglary as set forth in the third count of the information, is burglary in the second degree." The court then sentenced the defendant in the following language, so far as pertinent here: "That whereas, the said Axel Stratton, true name, Axel Stratton, Jr., having been duly convicted in this court of the crime of robbery, a felony, as charged in the first count of the information, and it being determined that said crime is robbery in the first degree: It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said Axel Stratton, true name Axel Stratton, Jr., be punished by imprisonment in the State Prison of the State of California, at Folsom." This was followed by sentences upon the two counts charging the defendant with burglary in the second degree. No question is made upon this proceeding as to the correctness of the sentence pronounced by the court following the plea of guilty, as to counts 2 to 3 charging the defendant with the offense of burglary.

The proceedings referred to were all had upon the 2d day of October, 1931. No appeal was taken by the defendant from the judgment so pronounced upon him.

On the 18th day of May, 1933, the defendant gave notice that on the 25th day of May, 1933, at 10 o'clock a. m. of said day, in the courtroom of said court, he would move the court to vacate, annul, and set aside the judgment pronounced against him on the 2d day of October, 1931. Three grounds were alleged as the basis for the defendant's motion, as follows, to wit: (1) That the court pronounced a higher and different punishment than that prescribed by law on count one of the information," etc. That without any evidence to prove the degree of robbery, the court fixed the degree of robbery as first degree, contrary to the provisions of section 1097 of the Penal Code. (2) That the judgment imposed by the court is without due process of law, and without equal protection of the laws. That the judgment on count 1 is void and uncertain, and cannot be executed, in that the commitment is for robbery in the first degree, with one prior conviction, without evidence to show whether the offense became first degree as a result of torture, or the use of a deadly weapon. And that under the provisions of section 1168 of the Penal Code, the minimum time of punishment for robbery differs when accomplished through torture, from that fixed when the offense is accompanied by the use of a deadly weapon. (3) That the sentence is neither definite nor certain. And, further, that the court did not fix a maximum term in accordance with the provisions of section 671 of the Penal Code. This motion was denied, and from the order of the court denying such motion, this appeal is prosecuted.

As reasons for reversal, our attention is first called to section 1018 of the Penal Code, which specifies that: "A plea of guilty can be put in by the defendant himself only in open court," etc. This precise question does not appear to have been passed upon directly by any of the California cases called to our attention. Prior to the adoption of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, it has been held that a plea of not guilty cannot be entered by an attorney for a defendant.

In the case of People v. Tomskey, 20 Cal. App. 672, 130 P. 184, this court had before it an instance where a plea of not guilty was entered by counsel in the presence of the defendant, and after reviewing the various decisions having to do with the authority of counsel so to do, came to the conclusion that under the constitutional provisions to which we have referred, the entry of such a plea by counsel for the defendant, rather than by the defendant himself, constituted only an irregularity not justifying the reversal. A hearing in this case was denied by the Supreme Court. The basis for the holding in the Tomskey Case really is in the provision of the law that if a defendant stands mute, the court may enter a plea of not guilty. In other words, the whole proceeding is had upon the theory that the defendant is not guilty, and that in law such a plea is entered in his favor and the trial then proceeds to determine whether such defendant is or is not in fact guilty.

[1, 2] The provisions of section 1018, supra, appear to be mandatory, and we have no reason to conclude that the legislature intended that it should be otherwise construed. It appears to be a personal privilege which the defendant may exercise and waive the formality of a trial which the law otherwise accords him. The question then occurs: Was the requirement of section 1018 violated? We think not. The defendant in this case, the record shows, personally entered a plea of guilty to the charge of robbery. That plea included everything which might be determined by the court as to whether it was first or second degree. This, however, is not determinative of the issues here involved. As we have stated, the counsel for the defendant, when the court queried as to the degree, replied: "As far as the defendant is concerned, it will be first degree." That is not a plea of guilty; it was only counsel's opinion as to the offense being robbery in the first degree. No facts were placed before the court as to whether the offense was accomplished through torture or in the commission of the offense the defendant was armed with a deadly weapon. The finding of the court, as we have stated, was only that the offense of robbery was of the first degree. Nothing is stated as to the accompanying conditions. This leaves an indefinite and uncertain basis for the board of prison terms and paroles upon which to base the term of years that the defendant should serve in the state prison. Section 1168 of the Penal Code as amended in 1931 (St. 1931, p. 1053, § 1), fixing certain minimum penalties, provided as follows: Subdivision b of subdivision 2 reads as follows: "For a person previously convicted of a felony either in this state or elsewhere, and armed with a deadly weapon, either at the time of his commission of the offense, or a concealed deadly weapon at the time of his arrest, ten years." Subdivision c of subdivision 2 reads: "For a person previously convicted of a felony either in this state or elsewhere, but not armed with a deadly weapon at the time of his commission of the offense, or a concealed deadly weapon at the time of his arrest, five years."

[3] In order that the minimum term of sentence should be definitely fixed and the requirements of section 1168, supra, be complied with, the judgment of the trial court should have specified therein whether the offense of robbery was accompanied by torture, or whether the defendant at the time was armed with a deadly weapon.

[4, 5] While under the provisions of the Code, and especially of the provisions of section 1239 of the Penal Code, the alleged defects in the judgment in this case might have been remedied upon appeal, it appears that the procedure adopted in this case has been twice approved in this state, once in the Supreme Court, in the case of People v. Walker, 132 Cal. 137, 64 P. 133, where no appeal was prosecuted, and after the pronouncement of the judgment a motion was made to set it aside on account of its invalidity. The motion was denied, and from the order denying the motion, an appeal was prosecuted and the order of the trial court reversed. The second case is that of People v. Paraskevoopolis, 42 Cal. App. 325, 183 P. 585, in which this court approved the procedure had in the instant case. There, it appears that on the 1st day of October, 1917, the defendant entered a plea of guilty to the charge of murder. The court, without taking any testimony to ascertain the degree, pronounced judgment upon the plea so entered by the defendant. Thereafter, and on the 1st day of October, 1918, being slightly over a year after the pronouncement of judgment, the defendant moved to vacate and set aside the judgment pronounced upon his plea of guilty. This court, after reviewing the cases holding that under the requirements of section 1192 of the Penal Code it is the duty of the trial court to take evidence in order to determine the degree of the offense, reversed the order of the trial court and remanded the cause for further proceedings in accordance with the opinion in that case. The court held that no testimony being taken to determine the degree of the offense to which the defendant had pleaded guilty, the judgment is not a legal judgment and is subject to be set aside upon motion. The opinion prepared by Mr. Justice Hart, reviewing the cases holding that it is obligatory upon the court to take testimony in order to determine the degree of the offense to which the defendant has pleaded guilty, is so full and complete that further consideration of that question on our part is unnecessary. The two California cases which we have cited do not, however, authorize the discharge of the defendant even in cases where the defendant has pleaded guilty to only one count in an information. The holding in both cases is to the effect that the cause should be sent back to the trial court and proceedings had therein for taking testimony to determine the degree of the offense, and again pronouncing sentence. That this is the direct procedure is likewise supported in all habeas corpus cases where the judgment pronounced is found to be invalid, in support of which we cite the following: In re Lee, 177 Cal. 690, 171 P. 958; In re Peter Stroff (Cal. App.) 22 P.(2d) 770. Likewise, in cases prosecuted upon appeal. See People v. O'Brien, 122 Cal. App. 147, 9 P.(2d) 902; People v. Scott, 39 Cal. App. 128, 178 P. 298.

[6] The defendant in this case having pleaded guilty of robbery, his plea of guilty is either first or second degree robbery, as the court might determine upon the evidence presented to it, and if guilty of first degree robbery, it was accomplished either by means of torture or at a time when the defendant was armed with a deadly weapon. To determine these facts, evidence should be taken in the trial court, and for such purpose the order is reversed in so far as the motion of the defendant is directed to the sentence based upon the count in the information charging the defendant with the crime of robbery, and the cause remanded to the trial court with directions to take such proceedings as may be necessary to bring the defendant before it for the purpose of again pronouncing sentence upon the defendant after taking testimony upon a hearing had in the presence of the defendant, determining the facts and circumstances accompanying the commission of the offense, and stating in the judgment, if found to be robbery in the first degree, whether it was accomplished by means of torture or whether the defendant was armed with a deadly weapon. In all other respects the order of the trial court is affirmed.

Other questions have been presented by the appellant, but their consideration here is not deemed necessary in the determination of the issues involved.

HOUSER, Justice.

By each of five counts contained in a complaint filed in the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles, defendant was charged with the commission of the crime of grand theft. At the close of his preliminary examination thereon in said court, the presiding magistrate therein orally announced that defendant would be discharged as to each of four counts, but that he would be held to answer in the superior court on one specified count only contained in the complaint, and thereupon directed the prosecuting attorney to prepare a special commitment in accordance therewith for the signature of the magistrate. However, in either attempted or purported compliance with the pertinent provisions of section 872 of the Penal Code, at that time the magistrate indorsed upon the complaint a written order of which the following is a copy: "It appearing to me that the offense in the within deposition mentioned, to-wit: ——— has been committed, and that there is sufficient cause to believe the within named ——— guilty thereof, I order that he be held to answer to the same, and that he be admitted to bail in the sum of $2500.00 Dollars and that he be committed to the custody of the Sheriff of Los Angeles County until he give such bail."

Ten days later, without the presence of either the defendant or his counsel, and without any opportunity being afforded to either of them to be heard in connection therewith, the magistrate signed a second or "special" order of commitment of defendant by which he was held to answer to the superior court on each of two counts of grand theft, but which commitment embraced all the several counts contained in the complaint. Thereafter and in pursuance either of the original commitment indorsed on the complaint, or of the second or "special" commitment, an information was filed in the superior court against defendant by which, in each of five counts contained therein, he was charged with the commission of the crime of grand theft. Subsequently, an amended information was filed in the latter court, by which information, in each of five counts thereof, defendant was likewise accused of the commission of the said crime of grand theft; and, in addition thereto, by a sixth count therein contained, purportedly in pursuance of evidence adduced on the preliminary examination of defendant, he was charged with the commission of a separate crime of the same kind and character. By order of the trial court, a motion presented by defendant to set aside the said amended information on the ground that he had not been "legally committed" (section 995, Pen. Code) was granted. It is from such order that the instant appeal is prosecuted.

By the terms of section 995 of the Penal Code, on motion of a defendant in a criminal action, the information must be set aside when it appears that before its filing "the defendant had not been legally committed by a magistrate"; and the ultimate point at issue on this appeal relates to the question of whether, within the facts as hereinbefore set forth, and within a correct construction of the provisions of the statute, defendant was "legally committed." The significance which should attach to the words "legally committed," as employed in the statute, has been indicated in each of several decisions by the appellate tribunals of this state. The appeal in the case of People v. Beach, 122 Cal. 37, 54 P. 369, was from an order setting aside an information on the ground that the defendants had not been legally committed, and it was contended that because the evidence did not show that a public offense had been committed, the defendants in the action had not been "legally committed by a magistrate." In commenting upon the question thus presented, in part the Supreme Court said:

"It is contended that the defendants had not been legally committed, because the evidence before the magistrate did not show that a public offense had been committed. If the magistrate had no power or jurisdiction to hold the examination, if no complaint had been made charging the defendants with a public offense, and perhaps if no evidence at all was taken by the magistrate, and there was no waiver by the defendants, it might be held that the defendants had not been legally committed. People v. Howard, 111 Cal. 655, 44 P. 342. The phrase 'legally committed' refers to the examination of the charge and holding the defendant to answer by the magistrate. Ex parte Baker, 88 Cal. 84, 25 P. 966. If a magistrate, upon a complaint duly made, and charging a public offense, has heard the evidence, and has committed the defendant, that ends the matter so far as concerns this motion.

"The question here is not, as upon habeas corpus, whether a person is illegally deprived of his liberty, but whether he can legally be tried upon a criminal charge. * * *

"The right to have a charge dismissed is regulated by statute, and, as we have seen, the phrase 'legally committed' means only that the accused has been committed by a magistrate who has jurisdiction to hold the examination, and who has actually heard the evidence, and determined that probable cause exists for holding the defendant."

In Ex parte Baker, 88 Cal. 84, 25 P. 966, 967, which is cited in the case to which reference has just been had, it appears that on motion of the defendant in the action in the superior court, on the ground that the defendant had never been "legally committed," the trial court had granted the motion to set aside the information which had been filed against the defendant and ordered that the district attorney file another information. Following the filing of a second information, on the application of the defendant therefor, the Supreme Court directed the issuance of a writ of habeas corpus. The opinion of the Supreme Court on the return of the writ is directed toward what appears to have been a failure on the part of the district attorney to pursue the correct procedure precedent to the filing of a second information against the defendant. It is ruled that, in the absence of a second preliminary examination of the defendant, the filing of the second information against him was "unwarranted and void." The only reference to the meaning of the words "legally committed" occurs in the course of the opinion, where it is said: "The phrase 'legally committed,' as used in the foregoing section, refers to the examination of the case, and the holding of the defendant to answer. * * *"

In the case of People v. Howard, 111 Cal. 655, 44 P. 342 (also cited in People v. Beach, supra), the appeal was from the judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial in a criminal action in which the defendant was charged with the crime of perjury. As indicated in the syllabus, the ruling was that: "A complaint for perjury alleged to have been committed in a criminal proceeding in a recorder's court which fails affirmatively to state facts showing that the recorder's court had jurisdiction of the subject matter of the action in which the oath was taken, or that the offense charged in that action was committed within the jurisdiction of the recorder's court, is insufficient as a basis for an examination or commitment for the crime of perjury, and a motion to set aside an information for such crime, upon the ground that the defendant had not been legally committed by a magistrate, should be granted."

The case entitled In re Williams, 52 Cal. App. 566, 199 P. 347, was a ruling on a return to a writ of habeas corpus. Therein it was held that the magistrate had no authority to order the commitment of a defendant upon testimony given partly before another magistrate.

The case of People v. Hinshaw, 194 Cal. 1, 227 P. 156, included a question regarding the legality of the commitment of the defendant therein and was based upon the alleged insufficiency of the complaint upon which the defendant was preliminarily examined before the committing magistrate. The decision thereon by the Supreme Court is indicated by the syllabus as follows: "When a charge has been examined by a magistrate and the evidence taken, and the examination warrants an order holding the defendant to answer, the imperfections of the complaint are cured, and the commitment is legal."

In each of the several cases respectively of People v. Naphaly, 105 Cal. 645, 39 P. 29, People v. Salas, 80 Cal. App. 318, 250 P. 526, and People v. Miller, 123 Cal. App. 499, 11 P. (2d) 884, it was held that where it appeared that on the preliminary examination of the defendant either that his right to aid of counsel had been denied him, or that he had not been officially informed of the existence of such right, an information filed in the superior court against such a defendant based upon such a preliminary examination was properly subject to attack upon the statutory ground that the defendant "had not been legally committed by a magistrate."

In People v. Wilson, 93 Cal. 377, 28 P. 1061, it was held that in order to sustain an information, an order of commitment by which the defendant was held to answer to the superior court must be in writing, signed by the magistrate; and that an oral order reduced to writing by the stenographic reporter, but not signed by the judge, was not a compliance with the statute and would not justify the overruling of a motion to set aside the information for want of a legal commitment by a magistrate.

[1] From a consideration of the facts and the law as announced in the foregoing authorities, it becomes manifest that the bald declaration in the case of People v. Beach, 122 Cal. 37, 38, 54 P. 369, hereinbefore quoted, to the effect that "if a magistrate, * * * has heard the evidence, and has committed the defendant, that ends the matter," as far as concerns a motion to set aside an information on the ground that the defendant had not been legally committed by a magistrate, is entirely too broad. Indeed, by other statements contained in said opinion it is clearly indicated that the language to which attention has been directed is not to be understood as a declaration subject to no qualifications or exceptions, because it is there said that "if the magistrate had no power or jurisdiction to hold the examination, if no complaint had been made charging the defendants with a public offense, and perhaps if no evidence at all was taken by the magistrate, and there was no waiver by the defendants, it might be held that the defendants had not been legally committed." It is apparent that by no judicial statement, however accurate and justly applicable to the case under consideration, may later cases, perhaps dependent upon altered facts or conditions, be conclusively defined, limited, or determined. In other words, no general rule announced in connection with the particular facts of a given case can furnish a safe and infallible guide for the administration of justice in any other case in which the facts, conditions, or circumstances may materially differ from those present in the case in which the rule has been declared. The statute itself furnishes the controlling legal principle; and primarily the rights of parties dependent upon the facts in each particular case should be determined with reference to the law as announced in the statute. Not that judicial construction of a statute is to be cast aside and set at naught, but that its usefulness should be measured by its applicability to the facts at hand.

[2] With so much in mind as a foundational authority for the trial court to consider the motion presented by the defendant in the instant action, it may be opportune to devote attention to the several reasons urged by him in support thereof:

Perhaps the principal circumstance relied upon by the defendant is the conceded fact that none of the witnesses who testified at the preliminary examination was sworn by the magistrate personally. That duty was performed by the clerk of the court; and on this appeal by the people it is insistently urged by the respondent herein that such facts present a situation from which it necessarily follows that defendant was not "legally committed by a magistrate." It is his contention that no one but the magistrate was authorized to administer an oath to a witness; that although in form each witness was sworn by the clerk, he not having the required authority in the premises, the result was the same as though no attempt had been made to swear the witness, and consequently that no evidence was received by the court upon which its commitment of the defendant might lawfully be based. In that connection, respondent cites the case of People v. Cohen, 118 Cal. 74, 50 P. 20, which was an appeal from a judgment and order denying a motion for a new trial in an action in which the defendant therein had been convicted of the crime of perjury. It appeared that in the action in which it was alleged that the perjury had been committed, a judge of the superior court had sat as the committing magistrate, and that the oath to the defendant as a witness in the action was administered to him by a deputy county clerk, who ex officio was a clerk of the superior court. As far as is here pertinent, it was held that in such circumstances the clerk of the superior court was not authorized to administer an oath to the witness, and consequently that the defendant was not guilty of perjury.

In that case, it should be particularly noted that the ultimate question was not whether a clerk of a municipal court, or of a justice court, or of a police court, had authority to administer an oath to a witness in an action pending in such court; but that the question was confined to whether the clerk of the superior court, while acting in the assumed capacity of a clerk in either a justice or a police court, possessed such power. On the appeal the Supreme Court was not called upon to decide, nor did it intimate, that in an action pending in a justice, or in a police court, a clerk of such court was unauthorized to administer an oath to the witness. Nor does an examination of the opinion therein disclose that the several statutes which on a date when applicable to a decision of the question therein involved purportedly conferred such authority on a clerk either of a police court, a justice court, or a municipal court, were under consideration. It results, as far as the issue here is concerned, that the authority may be accepted as a precedent in establishing the one point only, to wit, that a clerk of the superior court in attempting to perform the duties of a clerk of a justice, a police, or a municipal court, has no authority to administer an oath to a witness in an action on trial in such court. But the issue here involved is different. The question is whether a clerk of the municipal court, acting as such, is possessed of such power. However, aside from any pertinent judicial decision, the general statute relating to the matter would seem conclusive. Section 2093 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides as follows: "Every court, every judge, or clerk of any court, every justice, and every notary public, and every officer or person authorized to take testimony in any action or proceeding, or to decide upon evidence, has power to administer oaths or affirmations." If more authority were necessary, the several statutes which relate to justice's courts and police courts, and their appropriate consolidation into municipal courts, clearly confer upon the clerk of each of such courts the power to administer oaths. See particularly section 101, Code Civ. Proc.; section 6 of Act 6027, Gen. Laws of 1923; section 27 of Act 5238, Gen. Laws of 1931. See, also, People v. Vasalo, 120 Cal. 168, 52 P. 305; People v. Burns, 121 Cal. 529, 53 P. 1096.

As another reason for adjudging that the commitment of defendant was illegal, respondent takes the position that neither the oral order of the magistrate, nor his said indorsed order on the complaint was valid, and that the second or "special" order of commitment, having been made not only in the absence of defendant, but as well without any notice to him or to his counsel that any application either had been or would be made for such order, and without permitting defendant or his counsel to be heard in opposition to the granting of said order, was likewise invalid.

[3] In that connection, it may suffice to state that, after examination of the authorities suggested by respondent, this court is of the opinion that none of them is controlling of the issue. It may be conceded, especially in the circumstances here present, that the oral order of commitment was of no validity. People v. Wilson, 93 Cal. 377, 28 P. 1061, People v. Upton, 67 Cal. App. 445, 228 P. 50. Also, assuming that the order indorsed on the complaint was complete and valid, that the magistrate had no authority to modify it by a second or "special" order. People v. Bomar, 73 Cal. App. 372. The alleged invalidity of the first order of commitment, being the one that was indorsed on the complaint, consisted in the fact that the blank spaces occurring in such order were not filled. As indorsed, the pertinent part of the order was as follows: "It appearing to me that the offense in the within deposition mentioned, to-wit: ——— has been committed, and that there is sufficient cause to believe the within named ——— guilty thereof, I order that he be held to answer to the same * * *."

At most, it is clear that the omissions in the order, if not typographical, were nothing more than irregularities which the magistrate was empowered to correct at any time. A part of the syllabus in the case of Ex parte Branigan, 19 Cal. 133, is as follows: "Where an examination has been had by a magistrate and a commitment has been issued by him which is defective in form or substance, a second commitment, omitting or correcting the defects of the first, may be issued, provided there is any order, or judgment, or entry of the magistrate made at the conclusion of the examination, to which he can refer for guidance, but he cannot resort merely to his own recollection for the facts of the case."

In the case of People v. Wilson, 93 Cal. 377, 28 P. 1061, it is said (syllabus): "The provision of section 872 of the Penal Code, requiring that where it appears upon a preliminary examination that a public offense has been committed, and there is sufficient cause to believe the defendant guilty thereof, an order to that effect, and that the defendant be held to answer the same, shall be indorsed upon the deposition, may be regarded as directory, in so far as it requires such indorsement; yet it is essential that the order be reduced to writing and signed by the magistrate, and entered either upon the official docket of the magistrate or upon the complaint or depositions." See, also, People v. Tarbox, 115 Cal. 57, 46 P. 896.

In each of the cases of People v. Van Horn, 119 Cal. 333, 51 P. 538, and In re Mazuran, 57 Cal. App. 411, 207 P. 569, the principle of law is clearly announced that any irregularity in conducting the preliminary examination of a defendant which does not affect his substantial rights in the premises furnishes no ground for setting aside an information thereafter filed in the superior court against the defendant. Likewise, in People v. Flannely, 128 Cal. 83, 60 P. 670, and People v. Wiitt, 170

Cal. 104, 148 P. 928, alleged irregularities in the former case in not having the defendant present at the time when the date and place of his execution was judicially determined, and in the latter case, when the date of his execution was adjudged, were declared not to be violative of either the statutory or the constitutional rights of the defendant.

From a consideration of the situation here presented, it would seem apparent that the order of commitment indorsed on the complaint was not violative of the substantial rights of the defendant; that it was either sufficient in itself, or was capable of judicial correction; or that, failing in either of those respects, as far as was applicable, that part of the second order which supplied the defects in the first order would suffice as a legal foundation upon which the filing of an information in the superior court would be authorized.

[4, 5] It is also contended that because of the terms of section 809 of the Penal Code, which in substance provides that within fifteen days after the date of commitment of a defendant it shall be the duty of the district attorney to file in the superior court an information against the defendant, the information in the instant case was filed too late. In the first place, it is clear that, however great might be the delay of the district attorney in filing an information, his action in the premises could not affect the legality of the commitment, and hence could furnish no ground upon which to base a motion in that regard. But even considering the point as available to defendant, the basic facts do not support him. The record herein shows that the original information was filed within fourteen days after the date of the commitment. On principle, as determined by analogous cases, particularly in connection with the operation of statutes of limitation, the fact that an amended information was later filed by the district attorney was of no consequence. It becomes unnecessary to rule as to what would have been the result had the original information not been filed within the prescribed statutory period.

[6] Respondent also attacks each of the informations filed by the district attorney on the ground that he had no power to include in either of them any greater or different offense than that for which defendant was committed by the magistrate. If the question were new in this jurisdiction, or had it not been passed upon by the Supreme Court of this state, undoubtedly there might be room for argument (see dissenting opinion in People v. Sanders, 102 Cal. App. 237, 283 P. 136); but considering the provisions of section 809 of the Penal Code and the authority to which reference just has been had, together with the additional cases of People v. Bird, 212 Cal. 632, 300 P. 23, and People v. Wyatt, 121 Cal. App. 180, 8 P.(2d) 931, it is neither profitable nor advisable to devote further attention to the point advanced.

[7] Finally, respondent presents additional argument for the purpose of establishing the conclusion that the evidence adduced at the preliminary examination of defendant was insufficient to justify the making of the order of commitment. In that connection, it need only be noted that by each of several decisions by the appellate courts of this state it has been held that, on a motion to test the validity of an order by the magistrate of the commitment of a defendant, the point that the evidence was insufficient for that purpose is not available to him. People v. Hinshaw, 194 Cal. 1, 11, 227 P. 156; Ex parte Baker, 88 Cal. 84, 25 P. 966; People v. Beach, 122 Cal. 37, 54 P. 369; People v. Serrano, 123 Cal. App. 339, 11 P.(2d) 81; People v. Howard, 111 Cal. 655, 44 P. 342; In re Williams, 52 Cal. App. 566, 199 P. 347.

All other questions submitted by either of the parties litigant being necessarily dependent upon those herein considered, it is deemed unnecessary to devote further and separate consideration to them.

The order is reversed.

I concur: YORK, J.

CONREY, Presiding Justice (concurring).

I concur in the judgment. But I cannot agree entirely with the foregoing opinion in its interpretation of the decision in People v. Cohen, 118 Cal. 74, 50 P. 20. I think that the limitation placed by that decision, upon the right and power of a judge while sitting as a magistrate, to avail himself of the services of the clerk of the court in which he is a judge, is too narrow; and I venture so far as to doubt that it will be completely approved if brought before the Supreme Court for re-examination.

TURRENTINE, Justice pro tem.

On October 23, 1930, while defendants were owners of stock therein, the Caterpillar Tractor Company, a California corporation, through its board of directors, lawfully passed the following resolution: "Be it resolved that this company declare a dividend of seventy-five cents per share, and an extra dividend of twenty-five cents per share on its outstanding capital stock, payable on or before the 29th day of November, 1930, to stockholders of record on the 15th day of November, 1930, at the close of business on said day." On November 12, 1930, defendant sold and delivered to plaintiff six hundred shares of stock of the corporation. Plaintiff remained the owner of the stock until after November 29, 1930; the transfer was not made on the books of the corporation until November 26, 1930. The corporation, pursuant to its resolution, paid the dividends to defendants on November 25, 1930, in the sum of $600. At the time of the sale of the stock nothing was provided by the parties either reserving or transferring the dividends especially as distinguished from the transfer of the stock. At the time the resolution was passed there were surplus earnings on hand sufficient to pay the dividends in question. Thereafter, plaintiff demanded of defendants payment to him of the $600 received by them as dividends pursuant to the resolution, and upon a refusal to make the payment, plaintiff brought this action against the defendants to recover the $600 paid to them, alleging the facts as herein set out. The answer admits the allegations of the complaint. Plaintiff made a motion for judgment on the pleadings and the parties submitted said case on the complaint and answer. Thereupon judgment was entered for defendants, from which judgment plaintiff appeals.

[1-5] Upon the declaration of a dividend by the board of directors of a corporation, the share of each stockholder vests in him as an individual. Cogswell v. Second National Bank, 78 Conn. 75, at page 81, 60 A. 1059; Jerome v. Cogswell, 204 U. S. 1, 27 S. Ct. 241, 51 L. Ed. 343. It makes no difference when the assets were accumulated. 14 Cor. Jur. 818. It is universally held that the mere declaration of a dividend creates debts against the corporation in favor of the stockholders as individuals. Where the resolution declares a dividend as payable on a future date, title to said dividend vests in the stockholder on the date fixed in the resolution. By the terms of a resolution so declaring, a dividend may be vested in the stockholders of record on a date later than on the date the resolution was passed. Richter & Co. v. Light, 97 Conn. 364, 116 A. 600; 6 Fletcher's Encyclopedia of Law on Private Corporations, 6149; Ford v. Ford Manufacturing Co., 222 Ill. App. 76; Buchanan v. National Savings & Trust Co., 57 App. D. C. 386, 23 F.(2d) 994; Nutter v. Andrews, 246 Mass. 224, 142 N. E. 67. We are satisfied by principle and by authority that the declaration of the dividends in question must be interpreted and given the effect which the directors evidently intended it should have, that is, that the dividends declared on October 23, 1930, belonged to the stockholders on the 29th day of November, 1930, unless sooner paid to the stockholder, in which event it vested on the date payment was made. On November 25th the dividend was paid to defendants when plaintiff was, in fact, the owner of these shares. The unrecorded transfer was good between the parties and, therefore, the plaintiff had the right to the dividends as against the defendants. 6 Fletcher's Cyclopaedia of Law on Private Corporations, 6342; 14 Cor. Jur. 818; Ashton v. Zeila Min. Co., 134 Cal. 408, 66 P. 494; Cates v. Consolidated Realty Co., 25 Cal. App. 531, 144 P. 301. On the facts of the case and the law, as we have herein announced it, plaintiff is entitled to judgment against defendants for the amount of dividends received by defendants which, in fact, belonged to the plaintiff.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment be reversed, and the trial court is directed to enter judgment for the plaintiff on the pleadings as prayed for in his complaint.

PEOPLE v. EDWARDS et al.
Cr. 2369.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

July 18, 1933.

Rehearing Denied.

Aug. 2, 1933.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 17, 1933.

1. False pretenses ⇨2.

Amendment to law to include offenses formerly charged as grand larceny, embezzlement, and false pretenses did not repeal quantum of evidence required by statute to sustain conviction for variety of grand theft denounced under statute as obtaining money, labor, or property by false pretenses (Pen. Code, §§ 484, 532, 1110).

2. False pretenses ⇨49(3).

Evidence in prosecution for grand theft held insufficient by reason of lack of corroboration to sustain conviction on count based on false pretenses (Pen. Code, § 1110).

3. Larceny ⇨65.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction of grand theft on certain counts on theory of larceny by trick and device.

4. Criminal law ⇨254.

Trial judge may as trier of facts reconcile and adjust apparent inconsistencies in testimony.

5. Criminal law ⇨1159(3).

Appellate court is not authorized to disturb on appeal result based on conflict in testimony.

6. Larceny ⇨62(2).

Offense of theft by trick and device does not require corroboration specified by statute before conviction can be sustained in case of false pretenses (Pen. Code, § 1110).

7. Criminal law ⇨1170½(2).

Any error in permitting prosecution to ask question will not require reversal where answer elicited was favorable to defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

William F. Edwards and another were convicted of grand theft, and they appeal.

Reversed as to one count, and otherwise affirmed.

George Beebe, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Bayard Rhone, of Los Angeles, for the People.

HENDERSON, Justice pro tem.

By an information filed against them the defendants were jointly charged with four separate acts of grand theft, in a like number of counts of the moneys of one Elizabeth Bushey. They were tried by the court without a jury and found guilty as charged. Both defendants have appealed from the judgments of conviction and the order denying their motion for a new trial on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence and alleged errors in the admission of testimony.

While the defendants concede that the evidence, although conflicting, is sufficient to show that complainant was induced to part with her money, which aggregated $2,800, by means of their fraudulent representations, they urge, however, that such evidence was insufficient to support the judgments by reason of a lack of the corroboration required by section 1110 of the Penal Code. The defendants claim that the money was paid to them in consideration of the assignment to Mrs. Bushey of their interest in a certain oil lease in Fresno county by the terms of which there remained but less than a year within which to commence drilling operations.
